Mr. HENDRICKS said he had no objection to whatever course the gentleman was pleased to take with the bill, it was his own, proposed and advocated by him—but this was the first time he had ever heard it objected that any proposition made to the Senate stood in the way of a bill that was pending. The proposition he had submitted, said Mr. H. was based on constitutional grounds, and it surely was not his intention ever to submit any proposition to impede the progress of any bill. It seemed strange that any thing of the kind could possibly obstruct the regular business of the Senate. In relation to any excitement which might have existed in Indiana, he was conscious of never having written one single line, or of having said one word calculated to produce it. But he did say that he hoped to see the time when the new States should be restored to the rights of their own soil. He did not believe, however, that any excitement had existed in his State.

Mr. NOBLE said a few words in reply. The bill was not his own, it belonged to the Senate. He did not charge his colleague with having produced any excitement; he only spoke as to the fact of its having existed. His colleague might be right, and he might be wrong—his only wish, however, was, to place his sentiments fairly before the people, which he would do at a proper time. Whenever the proposition of his colleague came before the Senate, he should go back to the act of cession of the State of Virginia, and judge for himself.

The bill was then laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the bill to provide for the settlement of private land claims in the several States and Territories was taken up; the amendment offered by Mr. BERRIEN, yesterday, still pending.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that the appeal ought in his opinion to be made imperative in certain cases. In smaller cases it was not important. The law ought to be imperative in such cases on the Attorney General. He had prepared an amendment, which he thought would cover this point and some others satisfactorily. There was now, according to the bill, no person pointed out as the permanent prosecutor for the United States. He thought there should be some individual appointed to look to the interests of the Government. His amendment, therefore, authorized the President of the United States to appoint a law-agent; or, in certain cases, to appropriate money for the employment of additional counsel. It was not supposed that the District Attorney, in all cases, would feel competent to the defence of the more important cases without advice; although he did not mean to insinuate, that any one of those, to whose hands the prosecution might be entrusted, would not do his duty.

Mr. BERRIEN accepted the amendment offered by Mr. VAN BUREN, as a substitute for that offered by him on Friday.

Mr. HAYNE said, that, as the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York consisted of two distinct propositions, first, in relation to appeals, and secondly, to provide additional compensation for the employment of a law-agent, he would suggest the propriety of dividing the question upon it. He expressed his objection to that part of the bill which included the large grants in the adjudication of judicial tribunals. He thought it was not the policy of the Government that they should be so adjudicated. This had been long his opinion; but he would content himself with stating it to the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER made some inquiries as to the organization of the courts which would try these cases.

Mr. BERRIEN replied to Messrs. WEBSTER and HAYNE, and supported the bill generally.

Mr. EATON objected particularly to the provision for adjudicating on the larger claims.

Mr. BERRIEN replied to the remarks of Mr. EATON at some length.

The question being then put on the first part of the amendment offered by Mr. VAN BUREN, it was agreed to.

Mr. VAN BUREN moved the division of the second clause of his amendment, so as to take the question first on the appointment of a law-agent, and then on appropriating money for the employment of assistant counsel. Both propositions having been agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill for the graduation of the prices of public lands, was then taken up.

Mr. BENTON accompanied the reading of a letter from a Land Agent in Tennessee, with some prefatory remarks. The writer of the letter made some statements of the effect of the system of graduation in that State, and gave a schedule of lands sold under the system, detailing the benefits derived from the plan of graduation, and wishing success to the bill proposed by Mr. B.

Mr. BARTON replied.

Mr. MCKINLEY said—the great interest felt by the people of Alabama in the fate of this subject, made it his duty to offer, to the consideration of the Senate, his views upon the various provisions of the bill, connected with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. [Mr. HENDRICKS.]

The bill contains, said Mr. McK. what I conceive to be a wise and salutary change in the mode of selling the public lands; and it is proposed by the amendment to confine the operation of the bill to the Territories of the United States, and to cede in full property to the States the public lands within their limits.

Sir, I am fully apprized of the difficulties I have to encounter on this subject. The strong partiality of the Senate for the present system has been too often manifested to leave a doubt on that point, but the difficulty and embarrassment is greatly increased in advocating the amendment, as I shall endeavour to show that the United States have no constitutional right or claim to the lands in the new States. Here I have to encounter the long pre-conceived opinions of many of the Senators, the influence of an established system, long in practice, and the force of precedent. Under these circumstances it will not be surprising, if some of the doctrines, which duty requires me to advocate, should be regarded by some as wild, visionary, and untenable. Let that be as it may, they are the result of the most mature and deliberate reflection I have been able to give to a subject of so much political and pecuniary importance. I have long entertained the opinion that the United States cannot hold land in any State of the Union, except for the purposes enumerated in the Constitution; and whatever right they had to the soil while the country remained under territorial governments, passed to the States formed over the same territory on their admission into the Union, on an equal footing with the old States.

A slight attention to the history and character of this Government, will satisfy the most sceptical, that the United States did not, as a Government, under the articles of confederation, acquire by conquest from Great Britain, any title to the waste and unappropriated lands (formerly called Crown lands,) lying within the chartered limits of any of the parties to that league or compact. Whatever might have been the opinions or wishes of some of the States upon the subject, it is obvious that it was not the opinion of the Congress of that day, that the United States would (in the event of success attending the war in which they were then engaged,) be entitled to these lands. If such had been the opinion of Congress, why did they pass the resolution of the 15th of September, 1780, asking that as a favor which they might demand as a right? On the contrary, it was then believed that the States would, in virtue of their sovereignty, succeed to all the rights of the crown over these lands, if they succeeded in the establishing their independence. And this doctrine has been fully sustained by the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases of Fletcher and Peck, and Johnston and McIntosh. As the resolution referred to, and the subsequent proceedings under it, form the basis of right now exercised over the public lands by the United States within the new States, it will be proper to examine the resolution, the cession by Virginia to the United States of her waste and unappropriated lands north-west of the Ohio river, the ordinance of Congress of 1787, and the cession by Georgia to the United States in the year 1802. By this resolution Congress requested the States having waste and unappropriated lands in the Western country, to make liberal cessions to the Union; and promised that the lands so ceded should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which States should become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom and independence, as the other States. 1 vol. Laws U.S. p. 475.

Virginia, with that spirit of patriotism and liberality which characterizes all her public acts, granted this request, by conveying to the United States all her waste and unappropriated lands Northwest of the Ohio river. But the same patriotism which induced this great sacrifice of interest on the part of Virginia, induced her to secure, as far as practicable, the sovereignty, freedom, and independence of the States thus to be created. And, therefore, in the act of the Virginia Legislature and the deed of cession, the grant is made upon this express condition: "That is to say, upon this condition, that the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into States containing a suitable extent of Territory; not less than one hundred, nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; and that the States so formed shall be distinct republican States, and admitted members of the federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom and independence, as the other States." After the execution of this deed of cession, Congress thought proper, on the 13th of July, 1787, to pass an ordinance for the Government of the territory Northwest of the Ohio, in which the terms and conditions expressed in the deed of cession are essentially altered, and the following restricted terms for the admission of these new States into the Union, are enacted. "The legislatures of these districts or new States, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchaser. No tax shall be imposed on the land, the property of the United States." "The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and for ever free, as well to the inhabitants of said Territories as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor." By this article of the ordinance, Congress violated the compact with Virginia. The conditions contained in the act of the legislature and deed of cession, are entirely disregarded; and new, contradictory conditions imposed upon the people of the Territory. Sir, Congress had no power to change or alter these conditions, not even with the consent of Virginia; because they were made for the benefit of the people who were to become citizens of these new States. Those who had purchased land from the United States, and settled there under this compact, and for whose government this ordinance was intended, had a vested right in those conditions; which could not be divested by one, or both of the original parties to the compact. Therefore, that portion of the ordinance was wholly void and inoperative, which changed the conditions of admission.

Sir, I have already shown that all the States of the Union, at the close of the war, became sovereign and independent; and, in virtue of their sovereignty, were entitled to all the waste and unappropriated lands within their limits. I have shown that this was the opinion of the old Congress: that it is the opinion of the Supreme Court. It follows, then, as a necessary conclusion, that some of the rights of sovereignty to which the old States were entitled, the new States have been deprived of, by extending the restricted conditions of the ordinance of 1787 to their admission.

All the writers on public law, the ablest jurists of ancient and modern times, agree that sovereignty is necessarily and inseparably connected with the territory and right of soil over which it is exercised. So essential is this right, that sovereignty cannot exist without it Vattel, 165—112—99. By the conditions on which the new States were admitted into the Union, they have been deprived of the right of disposing of, or in any manner interfering with the disposition of the public land, or any regulations that Congress may choose to make for securing to the purchasers any title it might choose to grant; they have been deprived of the right of taxing the lands belonging to the United States, for any length of time they may choose to withhold it from sale; they have been deprived, for ever, of the right of collecting tolls upon their own navigable waters, although they may improve their navigation at their own expense, and of the right of charging tolls for turnpike roads, which they may make between those waters. Under these circumstances, can any one say that the new States have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the old?

Sir, the creation of a sovereign State over this territory with the consent of Congress, was of itself a transfer of the whole title to the land, and right of domain of the United States to the new States. If it would not have had that effect, why annex these restrictions upon their sovereignty to the acts of admission? The very necessity which induced the United States to pass the ordinance of 1787, and the subsequent acts extending its conditions to other States admitted into the Union, proves that, without these restrictions, the new States would have been entitled to all the land within their limits, and all other rights of eminent domain. I have shown that the ordinance of 1787, was a violation of the compact with Virginia. I will now endeavor to show that the ordinance was repealed and superseded by the constitution of the United States, even if it had been consistent with the compact with Virginia, and valid under the articles of confederation.

Before any of these new States were organized, or admitted into the Union, a new era in the political history of the United States occurred. The articles of confederation were found to be wholly incompetent to effect the national purposes for which they were designed; and it became necessary to new model the General and State Governments. The Constitution of the United States was formed in 1787, and adopted by the requisite number of States in 1788. By this Constitution, the States conferred upon the Government of the United States all the national, and as much of the municipal sovereignty, as they deemed necessary for the great purposes of foreign intercourse and national defence. The residue of the municipal sovereignty was, by the 10th article of the amendments to the Constitution, reserved to the States, or to the people. The States, fearing what might be, and now is, called a liberal construction of the new Constitution, might, by the influence of implication, result in a consolidated, instead of a confederated Government, suggested and carried this, among other amendments. By this amendment it is expressly declared, that "The powers not delegated to the United States, by this Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." This provision plainly fixes the boundaries of National and State power: where one ends the other begins; and when taken in connexion with the powers granted to the United States, and those prohibited to the States, furnishes an unerring rule of construction of the whole instrument; which, if adhered to, will for ever keep the Federal and State Governments within their proper orbits; and the exercise of power by either, within its legitimate channels. It is impossible to avoid error of construction if the Constitution of the United States be regarded (as it most frequently is, by American statesmen,) as furnishing the whole fundamental law governing the action of the Federal Government. The Constitutions of the several States form as much a part of the great code of constitutional law, as the Constitution of the United States. The latter is but an emanation of the former, and depends essentially for the character, extent, and exercise of its powers, upon a correct understanding of the powers reserved to the States. The States intended to grant no power to the United States, that they could exercise, separately, themselves. The creation of this Government was the result of necessity, and not of choice. There was no municipal power that the States could not exercise; and therefore it was not necessary to confer upon the United States any such power, except so far as it became absolutely necessary for the exercise of national power. If this view of the subject be correct, we must agree that the United States have no power to hold land in any of the States, to restrain the States from taxing the land, from controlling the navigable waters and public highways within their jurisdictions, unless such power is expressly granted by the Constitution. The only grant of power upon this subject, is to be found in the enumeration of the powers of Congress, in the 8th section of the 1st article, in these words: "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district, (not, exceeding ten miles square,) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." So much municipal sovereignty over the soil within the States, and no more, was deemed necessary for national purposes; and thus far, it has been found amply sufficient. The power to purchase land for the erection of "other needful buildings," than those specified, authorizes the purchase of land for navy yards, custom houses, court houses, jails, &c. Here, the whole power of Congress to hold land within a State of the Union, or to make compacts with a State for land, ends; and here, also, terminates the exclusive legislative powers of Congress over land within the States; unless these powers can be derived from the power granted to Congress to admit new States into the Union. That is a simple and unconditional grant, in these words: "New States may be admitted by the Congress, into the Union." In the same section, Congress is restrained from erecting a new State within the jurisdiction of any other State, or forming a State by the junction of two or more States, without the consent of the legislatures of the State concerned, as well as Congress. If the Constitution is to be confined in its operation to its plain and obvious meaning; if to infer powers not granted, would be an illegal accretion of power to the United States, and an encroachment upon the reserved rights and municipal sovereignty of the States; then Congress have no right to annex any condition whatever to the admission of the new States into the Union, and such conditions are unconstitutional and void.

Sir, suppose it were within the competency of Congress and the States to enter into compacts, could they enter into such as would abridge the sovereignty of the States, and confer upon the United States the sovereignty thus surrendered? Vattel, in discussing this question, as between nations, says: "A nation ought to preserve itself, it ought preserve all its members, it cannot abandon them; and it is under an engagement to support them in their rank as members of the nation. It has not a right, then, to traffic with their rank and liberty, on account of any advantage it may expect to derive from such a negotiation. They have joined the society for the purpose of being members of it; they submit to the authority of the State, for the purpose of promoting, in concert, their common welfare and safety, and not of being at its disposal, like a farm or a herd of cattle."—Page 118. Again, 194, he says: "A treaty pernicious to the State, is null, and not at all obligatory, as no conductor of a nation has the power to enter into engagements to do such things as are capable of destroying the State for whose safety the government is entrusted to him. The nation being necessarily obliged to perform every thing required for its preservation and safety, cannot enter into engagements contrary to its indispensable obligations. In the year 1506, the States General of the kingdom of France assembled at Tours, engaged Louis XII. to break the treaty he had concluded with the emperor Maximilian, and the archduke Philip, his son, because that treaty was pernicious to the kingdom. They also decided that neither the treaty nor the oath that had accompanied it, could be binding on the king, who had no right to alienate the property of the crown." High and respectable as this authority is, I will call the attention of the Senate to one still higher, the obligations of which operate directly upon our legislative power; it is the Constitution itself.

By the 10th section of the 1st article of which, the States are expressly prohibited from entering "into any treaty, alliance, or confederation," whatever. Every compact between sovereign States is a treaty. "A treaty, in Latin, foedus, is a compact made with a view to the public welfare, by the superior power, either for perpetuity or for a considerable time."—Vattel, 192. "As a State that has put herself under the protection of another, has not, on that account, forfeited her character of sovereignty, she may make treaties and contract alliances, unless she has in the treaty of protection expressly renounced that right. But she continues forever after bound by this treaty of protection, so that she cannot enter into any engagements contrary to it."

Sir, a just application of these principles of the law of nations, taken in connexion with the prohibition on the States to enter into "any treaty," proves that the States of this Union have no power to enter into any compact with the United States, and much less with Congress, for any purpose whatever, except those enumerated in the Constitution. By the law of nations, just referred to, it appears that a State, binding herself by a treaty of protection not to enter into treaties or alliances, is forever precluded from that right. The States of this Union have bound themselves by a much more sacred and obligatory instrument, not to "enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." Surely, then, they have no power to enter into compacts to abridge their sovereignty. If the Constitution prohibits the States from making such treaties with the United States, it is equally prohibitory on the United States to enter into such treaties or compacts with the States. If the United States can enter into treaties or compacts with the new States for the acquisition of sovereignty, land, or money, not warranted by the Constitution, she may do the same with the old States, and thereby change, amend, or destroy the fundamental law of the land by compacts with the States. These compacts, if valid at all, are the supreme law of the land, and as obligatory on all the people of the United States as the Constitution itself. The States cannot, by any act of theirs, release themselves from their operation; they can pass no law violating them, nor can Congress. But, by the concurring consent of both parties, like all other contracts, they may be cancelled. Thus, then, the constitutional law may be changed, by the simple operation of making and cancelling a contract. But, sir, are the conditions annexed to the admission of the new States, treaties, compacts, or contracts? All the essential qualities necessary to constitute a valid contract between individuals by the common law, are required by the law of nations to constitute a valid treaty or compact between nations or sovereign States. In either case, the parties must be able; that is, they must have legal power; they must be willing; the subject-matter of the contract must be authorized or permitted by the law governing it; and the contract must be made according to the forms of that law. Testing the conditions annexed by Congress in the statutes for the admission of the new States into the Union, (which by a singular misnomer are called compacts,) by these simple rules, it will be found that they do not possess one of the legal requisites of a compact. The only compacts that Congress can make with the States on such subjects, are those enumerated in the sections of the Constitution already referred to. By the consent of Congress, and the cession and consent of particular States, the United States may acquire right to the soil within the jurisdiction of any of the States for the seat of Government of the United States, for the purposes of erecting forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings; and, when thus acquired, Congress can exercise exclusive legislation over it. Congress may enter into a compact with a particular State for the purpose of erecting a new State within its jurisdiction, or with two or more States for the purpose of consolidating them into one. The first of these powers authorizes the acquisition of soil and jurisdiction, but the latter authorizes neither. It has been shown that the States conferred upon the United States these rights of acquiring soil and exercising municipal sovereignty for national purposes only, and as auxiliary to the national powers. Here, then, the sphere of the municipal action of the United States is limited to specified objects, to be effected by specific modes. It has been shown that all other municipal sovereignty over the residue of the soil was expressly retained to the States.

From these propositions the induction is plain, that Congress had no constitutional power to enter into a compact with the new States for the land, and jurisdiction over it, within those States, and, therefore, Congress was unable to make the compacts. The other party had still less power. The people of the Territories had no political power, whatever political rights they may have had. Those Territories were not States; the inhabitants were not citizens of States, nor of the United States. They could not vote for a President or Vice-President of the United States; they could not vote by their Representatives in Congress. It has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the inhabitants of the Territorial Governments are not citizens of States or of the United States. They were, therefore, the mere subjects of the United States, and bound by their laws, in the enacting of which they had no participation, and, of course, could oppose no political resistance to their operation. The people of the Territorial Governments, standing in this relation to the United States, were politically passive. And, therefore, when Congress passed laws authorizing them to elect members of a convention, and authorized that convention to form a Constitution for the Government of the State, the people were as much bound by that as by any other law of the United States. The convention, when thus organized, had not even the nominal option of accepting or rejecting propositions in relation to the right of soil, taxation of land, and jurisdiction over navigable streams, and certain carrying places between them, (as seems to be generally supposed.) No, sir, these provisions of the ordinance of 1787, were, by these statutes, made the basis of the Constitutions to be formed. After pointing out the mode of electing members and organizing the conventions, the statutes authorized the conventions "to form for the people of the said State, a Constitution and State Government; provided the same was republican, and not repugnant to the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787."—Laws U. S. 3 vol. 497. Would any lawyer call this a compact? Here, to be sure, are conditions tendered to the people of the Territories, but they are the only conditions upon which they are permitted to form a Constitution and State Government. These conditions were not propositions for a compact, but were the law of the United States prescribing to these people a rule of action, and the only authority by which they were permitted then to act on that subject; and this is called a compact between the United States and the new States! Upon the same principle, whenever the people obey a statute, a compact is thereby formed between them and the Government. It surely cannot be necessary to carry this inquiry further, to prove that there never was a compact between the United States and the new States, by which the latter yielded their right to, and sovereignty over the lands within their limits; and even if there had been, I have shown that all such compacts are unconstitutional and void.

Sir, if this reasoning be correct, the advocates of the right of the United States to the lands in the new States, and the concomitant rights contended for, are reduced to the necessity of sustaining them upon the statutes of the United States alone, and of maintaining the paradoxical doctrine, that Congress can by statute acquire any right belonging to the States, of property or sovereignty, the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. And paradoxical as this doctrine may appear, if the right of the United States to these lands, and the right of Congress to exercise exclusive legislation over them, be sustained, the whole power is admitted, and the most dangerous precedent ever yet established will remain in full force.

The compact between Georgia and the United States is not liable to one of the objections taken to those with the new States. Georgia was at the time of making it an organized and an old State, but she was one of the States that adopted the Constitution of the United States, by which she bound herself never to enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; therefore, so much of that compact as extended the operation of the ordinance of 1787 to Mississippi and Alabama, was void, upon the reasons and authorities applicable to the compacts with the new States. But so far as the compact related merely to the erection of new States within the territory ceded by Georgia, it is valid and binding, because Congress may erect a new State within the jurisdiction of another State, with the consent of the Legislature of such State.—See 3d sec. 4th art. Const. U. S. The consent of the Legislature of Georgia, as well as of Congress, being had to the erection of these States, for that purpose, the compact is constitutional and binding.—See the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and Georgia, 1 vol. Laws U. S. 448.—See also act of Congress extending the ordinance of 1787 to the Mississippi Territory, 3 vol. Laws U. S. 380.

Sir, I have shown that all compacts between sovereign States are treaties; that Congress had no power to make compacts for land or jurisdiction over it, except for certain specified purposes. I have shown that the land and jurisdiction over it, and all other rights of eminent domain, belong to the old States in virtue of their sovereignty, except so far as they have been conferred upon the Government of the Union for national purposes; that the new States would have been entitled to all the rights which the old States enjoyed, if these compacts had not been made; and I have shown, by irresistible implication, that Congress believed that the new States would be entitled to the land within their limits, and all the other rights of eminent domain, of which they have been deprived, if the principles of the ordinance of 1787 had not been extended to them in the manner mentioned. If all these propositions be true, these compacts (admitting them to be such) must be null and void, unless it can be shown that the United States have the constitutional right to hold land in the States, for other purposes than those enumerated in the Constitution; and upon proving that proposition, another equally difficult of proof remains to be established before the title of the United States to these lands can be made out. All compacts between sovereign States being treaties, and Congress having no right to make treaties, it must be shown that the treaty-making power of the United States was employed in making these compacts. The treaty-making power being vested in the President and Senate of the United States, by the Constitution, and these compacts not having been made by them, they are void upon that ground also, even if they would otherwise have been valid.

Sir, there is another view of this subject worthy of consideration. There was nothing in the conditions contained in the deed of cession by Virginia, which rendered that part of the ordinance of 1787 necessary for carrying them into effect. The first condition was, that the land ceded should be disposed of for the common benefit of all the States, Virginia included; and the second, that the ceded territory should be laid out and formed into distinct republican States, and that these States should be admitted into the Union, with all the rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, of the old States. There was no limitation of time in the deed of cession within which the United States was bound to do all these things. The ordinance, fixing the time when these new States should be admitted at the period when they should have sixty thousand free inhabitants, was the voluntary act of Congress, and not required by the terms of the compact. Before any State formed out of this territory was admitted into the Union, Virginia had given an interpretation and her meaning of the words employed in one of these conditions by her compact with Kentucky, by which the latter became a sovereign, free, and independent State, and was admitted into the Union. At the time the compact was made between the United States and Virginia, Kentucky formed a part of what was then her waste and unappropriated lands in the Western country. She had commenced appropriating and settling them. In 1789, the Virginia Legislature passed an act authorizing the people of Kentucky to form a State Constitution; by which act they gave up all the unappropriated land within Kentucky, to be disposed of as the new State might think proper. This shows what Virginia meant by the condition, "having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States," contained in her deed of cession to the United States. Because, if she had believed it consistent with the sovereignty, freedom, and independence of a republican State, to be deprived of eminent domain—if she had thought it consistent with that equality which ought to subsist between sister States of the same Union—it is not probable that she would have given to Kentucky land worth more than two millions of dollars. But Virginia was not so money-wise as some of the States are at the present day. She was not disposed to deprive a State of its sovereignty for the sake of money. So far as the course pursued by Virginia towards Kentucky shows her meaning of the conditions contained in her deed of cession to the United States, it is a good rule of construction: for she had then no particular interest in the matter; at least, her interest, if any, was the other way.

Sir, if the United States might have performed all the conditions in the deed of cession, and chose to violate a part of them, she must abide by the consequences; and the people of the States are, nevertheless, entitled to all their constitutional rights, even if the United States shall get less by this voluntary cession made by Virginia, than her avarice seems willing to demand. The same course of reasoning, in a great degree, applies to the cession made by Georgia. The conditions of that cession were, that the land ceded should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, Georgia included; and when the territory should have sixty thousand free inhabitants, it was to be formed into a State, and admitted into the Union. The United States had all the time from the date of the cession until there should be sixty thousand free inhabitants in the territory. If she failed to dispose of the land within the time limited in the compact, the right to it legally and necessarily passed to the sovereign, free, and independent States formed over it; that being the legal effect of the contract. Sir, notwithstanding the people inhabiting these Territorial Governments had no political powers, they had political rights. They had a right, by the Constitution, to the benefits of self-government. When the Territories were formed into State Governments, they had a right to unconditional admission into the Union upon an equal footing with the other States. These people, with all these rights, were placed under the entire control and government of the United States. Under these circumstances, Congress could no more make a contract with them than a guardian can with his ward. Suppose A, by his will, were to convey to B the whole of his estate in trust for his only son, to be conveyed to him when he arrived at full age, and to confer upon him, also, the guardianship of the son. And suppose this testamentary guardian and trustee were to say to the ward, when arrived at the age of twenty years, (who, like the people of Territorial Governments, would be anxious for self-government,) if you will agree never to interfere with my right to dispose of your manor of C, for my use, I will release you from your wardship, and permit you to do as you please with the rest of your estate; and the ward were to agree to this proposition, and were even to execute a release to the guardian, the law would pronounce this contract to be void. And yet this is not so strong a case as that of the Territories and the United States: for the latter did not even give the former the right to decide upon the proposition of yielding up their patrimony, but told them plainly, you shall not be entitled to self-government unless you give up to us all right to the land which, but for this act, would have been theirs; and this act having been shown to be utterly void upon legal and constitutional principles, the land now of right belongs to the States, together with all other rights of sovereignty of which they have been thus unconstitutionally deprived.

Sir, however important may be the question of pecuniary interest involved in the measure under discussion, it sinks into insignificance when compared with the political principle involved. The great political question involved is this: can the United States, by mere legislation; by treaty, or by any form of contract with the States, acquire rights of sovereignty or property not granted to the former by the Constitution, but expressly reserved to the latter? If such power does exist in this Government, liberty and free Government cannot be preserved by a written Constitution. All the checks and balances necessary for the preservation of these vital principles were believed to have been carefully and skilfully interwoven into the very texture of this system of Government. State rights and State sovereignty, it was thought, were protected beyond doubt or controversy by the 10th article of the amendments to the Constitution. But this, and all the other guards in the Constitution, may be abandoned, if the principles contended for by the opponents of this measure, shall prevail, and be practised upon. The principle contended for by them, is, that the United States can contract with a State of this Union for a portion of its sovereignty; for such was the contract with Georgia, and such the contracts with the new States, if contracts at all. If a contract of this character is valid for a portion of the sovereignty of a State, it would be equally valid for the whole. Do the friends of State sovereignty perceive that by supporting this doctrine they are sustaining a principle which may overturn State sovereignty, by the mere operation of money appropriated for the purchase of all the disputed rights between this and the State Governments? If the interest which the United States have, or suppose they have, in these lands, has such an influence in the determination of this question, what may we not apprehend from the influence of interest or money upon other questions? Sustaining this principle of compacts establishes a precedent for bartering in sovereignty between the United States and the States: and it establishes a still more dangerous precedent. It is this: that the ownership of land by the United States, within a State, gives them the right to dispose of it as they please by the legislation of Congress. Having the possession of the immense revenues derivable from commerce, the United States may purchase land in any of the States of the Union, from the fee simple owners; and when they have obtained it, may grant it in fee simple, fee conditional, or fee tail, or they may lease it out, and improve it in any way they may think proper. They may make roads and canals over it, build houses or manufactories; in short, they may do every thing that the lord paramount may do with his own domain.

Graduation of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Sir, this is not an idle speculation; this principle was distinctly recognized a few days since by the Senate, and a part, at least, of its ground occupied. A bill passed the Senate authorizing the President of the United States to lease out certain lots of land lying in the State of Illinois, for a term of years, and authorizing the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an agent or steward to superintend these leasehold estates of the United States and to collect the rents. Is this not establishing the principle that the United States, owning the soil within one of the States of the Union, may establish the relation of landlord and tenant between the United States and the citizens of that State? Is it not establishing the principle that the United States may improve or dispose of her lands as she pleases? Is it not establishing the principle that officers, for the superintendence of such affairs, may be appointed by the United States? And what more is necessary to establish the whole of the doctrine?

Sir, suppose a majority of Congress have in view some favorite project of internal improvement within the State of Virginia, for instance, to which Virginia opposes her State sovereignty, may not Congress pass a law appropriating money and authorizing the purchase of the land from the fee simple owners, for the track of a canal or a road, and thereby confer upon Congress the right of legislating over it? And what, then, becomes of the State sovereignty of Virginia?

Or suppose the United States choose to make a contract directly with any of the States for any or all of their sovereignty, as she did with Georgia for a portion of hers, would not such compacts become as sacred as these are? The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BAIRD] in his speech upon this subject, dwelt much upon the sacredness and inviolability of these compacts. The power has been denied to Congress, by other gentlemen, to pass any law contrary to them. What more reverence and respect could be manifested for the Constitution, or what more obligatory force would that instrument have upon the legislation of Congress? By these compacts the new States are reduced to a state of vassalage; they have become the mere feudatories of the United States; may not the old States be reduced to the same condition by the same means? These compacts operate here as constitutional law; may not other compacts operate in the same way? If they may, then the constitutional law may be changed by compacts. Is the Senate prepared to sacrifice the Constitution for money? Shall we establish principles and precedents which may lead to the destruction of the only free Government in the world, that the Treasury may be a little richer? If all these lands were given up to the States, they would not be lost to the United States. Whatever adds to the wealth or prosperity of the States increases the wealth and prosperity of the United States. Sir, which is most important to the people, these lands or the Constitution, money or liberty? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BAIRD] stated that this question of sovereignty of the new States was one of no importance in the consideration of this measure. I have no doubt he thinks so; but, in my opinion, a more important question than the one really involved could not engage the attention of Congress, however little interest it may excite on the present occasion.

Inquiry, however, has been awakened on this subject, and it will go on whatever may be the fate of the measure under discussion; and the doctrines here advanced will, I trust, gain strength as the inquiry progresses, not in the new States only, but every where that the subject is investigated by the friends of the Constitution, of State sovereignty, and of civil liberty.

Sir, it has been said that these lands ought to belong to the old States, because they all contributed in conquering them from Great Britain, or contributed otherwise to their acquisition; that the acquisition of the Crown lands was one of the inducements to the Revolution; that they have been pledged for the payment of the public debt; and, therefore, the United States cannot, in justice to themselves and good faith to their creditors, relinquish them to the new States. It has been shown that the successful issue of the Revolution did not confer upon the United States, as a Government, the Crown lands in the respective States, but that the States in which they lay, in virtue of their sovereignty, succeeded to all the previous rights of the Crown. Such has been the opinions of the old Congress, of the Congress under the present Constitution, and of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Crown lands had, it is true, some influence in producing the Revolution, if we are to credit the Declaration of Independence; but it was an influence wholly adverse to the arguments urged against this measure. The complaint in the Declaration of Independence against the King, on this subject, is in these words: "He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the laws for the naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage emigration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands."

Sir, the opponents of this bill are welcome to the full benefits of these complaints against the King of Great Britain, and their just application to the existing state of things here. These very complaints may now be justly urged by the new States against the United States. Is there not, now, an attempt making to discourage or prevent emigration to the new States, by refusing to pass laws for that purpose? And, if not, by raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands, the same effect is intended to be produced, by refusing to reduce the price to their real value. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report on the state of the finances, at the present session of Congress, has entered into a learned and labored argument to show that the price of the public lands ought not to be reduced, because it would give too much encouragement to emigration from the old to the new States, and thereby prevent the great manufacturers from obtaining the labor of the poor class of society at a cheap rate.—[See the Report, pp. 24-5-6.] He admits that the population may be more rapidly increased by encouragement to emigration and agricultural pursuits; and he might have admitted, also, that the sum of human happiness, and the preservation of republican principles and our free institutions, would be better and more certainly promoted by the same means. But the amount of his argument is, that it is better to increase capital in the hands of manufacturers, by compelling the poor to labor for them, than to permit the poor to become landholders at a cheap rate, and pursue agriculture; although population would be thereby increased, and the true principles of Government be best preserved.

Sir, is not this a direct attempt on the part of the President of the United States, through his Secretary, to prevent emigration to the new States? Is it not the direct opposition of the Executive department of the Government against the passage of this bill? It has been before the Senate for several preceding sessions: if it passes, its effect will be to encourage the emigration of the poor class of society to the new States, where they may become landholders at a cheap rate, and rear their families in freedom and independence. The policy of the President and Secretary is, to deprive the poor of these great benefits; to force them into the service of the wealthy manufacturer; to prevent, as far as possible, the population of the new States, and diminish their political importance in the scale of the Union. Have not the new States good cause to make the same complaint, on the subject of the public lands, against the United States, that the colonies did against the King of Great Britain? But, sir, this attempt to arrest emigration to the West is vain and useless; the tide of emigration will roll on, in despite of legislation here, or opinions expressed elsewhere. So long as men are free, they will pursue their interest and happiness according to the dictates of their own judgments. So long as the lands are poor and unproductive, and agricultural products at their present depressed prices on this side of the Alleghany, the poor will—nay, they must—seek, on the other, richer and more fertile land, even if they are destined to be tenants there. It is better to be a tenant on rich land than a landlord on poor: it is better to be a free man in the West than a slave to a manufacturer in the East.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTON] says the effect of the graduating principle of the bill will produce a rapid depreciation in the price of the public land, and a monopoly in the hands of speculators. The proposition in the bill is to fix the price of the land according to its quality. Is there any thing in this proposition dangerous to the interests of the United States, or unjustly favorable to the purchaser? There are millions of acres of land that have been offered for sale at public auction, and would not sell at the minimum price, that have remained unsold, some for more than twenty years, although it has been subject to entry, by any one choosing to apply for it, at two dollars an acre, until 1821, and since that time at one dollar and twenty-five cents. Is not this sufficient to prove that such land is not worth a dollar and a quarter an acre? If it is not worth a dollar and a quarter, is it wrong, is it doing injustice, to sell it for less? If land that has been in the market for twenty years, had been sold at first at sixty-two and a half cents an acre, it would have produced twenty-five per cent. more to the Treasury than it would now if sold at a dollar and a quarter. Calculating the simple interest on the amount at six per cent. it doubles itself every sixteen years. Gentlemen say that these lands are pledged for the payment of the public debt. The debt is more than doubled by the interest, since a great deal of this land has been in the market, and it will be doubled again before it will sell for a dollar and a quarter an acre. Is this a judicious system of finance and economy? Is this the way to pay the public debt? I cannot perceive how selling land for its value will produce a rapid depreciation in its price. But if this effect could be produced by the passage of the bill, it seems to me impossible that the lands could be the subject of profitable speculation. Suppose individuals were to purchase up large quantities of these lands in the expectation of making a profit upon them. If similar lands continued to depreciate in the hands of the Government, would not those in the hands of the speculator depreciate in the same ratio? The longer the speculator held the land, the greater must be his loss, if the Government lands continue to decline under this system. Therefore, there can be no possible danger to the interests of the United States in that quarter.

Sir, the friends of the present land system are the last that ought to say any thing about speculation. Who is the great land speculator in this country? The United States is the greatest that ever was in this or any other country. She obtained from Virginia all her waste and unappropriated lands northwest of the Ohio river, under a solemn pledge to sell them for the common benefit of all the States, and apply the proceeds to the discharge of their war debts. This was expected to be done speedily, and sovereign, free, and independent States erected over the territory ceded, as soon as there should be sufficient population. All these pledges have been disregarded; the public debt has not been discharged by this fund; the States created there have been deprived of their sovereignty; and now the lands are to be held up for high prices, to the great detriment of these new States. These lands have already produced to the Treasury upwards of twenty-two millions of dollars, and very large bodies of them remain unsold. In violation of the Constitution, the United States purchased from Georgia all the country now forming the States of Mississippi and Alabama, which had previously been the subject of the most fraudulent system of legislative speculation. They paid nothing for it, but promised payment to Georgia out of the proceeds of the sales; compromised with the Yazoo company of speculators, promising payment in the same way. They issued stock to the amount of six millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, called Mississippi stock, delivered it in payment, and made this stock receivable in payment for the lands when sold; thus creating an immense artificial fund, not based upon the specie capital of the country, for the purpose of ensuring high prices for the lands, and enriching the Treasury at the expense of the citizens. The result was as might have been expected. This Mississippi stock was thrown into the market, and at the sales of these lands was worth just as much as the hard dollars of the planters. The lands sold for unheard of prices; the citizens were many of them ruined by their purchases; their money redeemed this stock, and the United States pocketed a clear profit of upwards of eight millions of dollars by the sale of much less than half the lands, without the advance of a dollar of the purchase money. And not content with wholesale and retail speculation, they laid out towns where nature never designed towns should be, puffed them by their agents, and actually descended to peddling in the lots.

And now we are told that it is dangerous and immoral to encourage a system of speculation among our citizens. Sir, while the Government gives such examples of successful speculation to its citizens, they will not believe that it is demoralizing to speculate in land, and they will follow this illustrious example. If this system of land jobbing and speculation is pernicious to society, let the Government abandon it, and set an example of moderation, of justice, and fair dealing, by restoring to the new States their violated sovereignty. The territorial Governments, within which the Constitution authorizes the legislative action of Congress, afford an ample field for the operation of the land system, without extending it to the States. And there this graduating plan will be found highly beneficial. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTON] read, in his place, this morning, a statement showing the beneficial effects of a system like this in the State of Tennessee. There it produced large sums of money to the Treasury, and no speculation among the citizens. None of the evils so much deprecated by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BARTON] resulted from the operation of this system in Tennessee. We may, therefore, fairly conclude they will not happen to the United States, if we adopt the same system. Another proposition contained in this bill will effect partially what the amendment proposes. After this system of graduating the prices shall have exhausted itself, by disposing of all land worth twenty-five cents and upwards per acre, the residue is to be subject to donations for one year to actual settlers, and whatever may be left after this operation is to be ceded in full property to the States. Should the amendment be rejected, the operation of the bill would, within some reasonable time, give to the States complete jurisdiction over the lands within their limits. Admitting, for sake of the argument, that the United States have a right to hold these States as vassals and feudatories, would it be good policy, would it be generous, would it be consistent with our scheme of Government to do it? You deprive them of many of the essential attributes of sovereignty, control the internal police and economy of a Government called free and independent. They are deprived of the right of regulating the settlement and improvement of the country, in that mode which might be best calculated to promote their happiness and prosperity. They are deprived of the revenue derivable from the soil, the most certain and available source of revenue in any country. They are subject to the operation of the laws of the United States upon subjects purely municipal, which do not operate in the old States, and which they have a right to pass for themselves, or not, according to their sovereign will and pleasure. A majority of Congress represent the old States, and are, of course, wholly irresponsible to the citizens of the new, for any laws they may choose to pass on these subjects. They are ignorant of the peculiar wants and wishes of the people they are legislating for; and when those who represent those people bring their petitions and wants before Congress, their statements and representations of the actual condition of things, are often, to their great mortification, received here "with grains of allowance." The President of the United States has the discretionary power of bringing as much or as little of the public land into market, annually, as he chooses. In the exercise of this power, he may give a preference to the settlement and population of one State over another; or he may restrain the settlements entirely, for the purpose of carrying into effect the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not mention these as complaints against the Executive, but against the operation of such principles, because the same result might take place by the exercise of the same power by a majority of Congress, and the people interested be equally without remedy.

Sir, the Legislature of the State I have the honor, in part, to represent, taking into consideration these grievances, addressed to the present Congress a respectful memorial, proposing to purchase all the lands within her limits, that she might thereby acquire full sovereignty within her jurisdiction. This memorial I had the honor of presenting to the Senate, and upon which a committee was raised. A majority of that committee decided against selling the lands to Alabama, preferring the present so much eulogized system. If the United States refuse to give or sell to us what we believe we are constitutionally entitled to, we certainly have good cause of complaint, and will continue to complain until we obtain our rights.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill was then laid on the table, with the understanding that it should be taken up to-morrow.

THURSDAY, MARCH 27, 1828.

THE LATE GENERAL BROWN.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, widow of the late Gen. Brown, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON observed, that, having ascertained, shortly after the death of Gen. Brown, that he had left his family in a most distressed situation, dependant entirely upon connexions who were illy able to support them, he had introduced, upon motion of leave, the bill which was then before the Senate. I did it, Mr. President, (said Mr. H.) under the conviction that it neither comported with the honor or the interest of the nation, to suffer the family of a man to whom it was so greatly indebted for its military renown, to retire from the seat of Government, at the moment, too, when the Legislature were in session, without the means of a decent support. I hold in my hand, sir, a statement, drawn up by the administrator of the deceased General, containing a particular account of the situation of his affairs. It is at the service of any Senator who may wish to peruse it. Without entering into particulars, I think it necessary to state, generally, that, at the close of the late war, Gen. Brown was possessed of very considerable landed estates in the Western part of the State of New York, but that he was considerably indebted in part for the purchase of these lands. He believed that, but for the cruel disease under which he so long lingered, he would have been enabled to extricate himself from his debts, and preserve a competent provision for his family. This opinion is corroborated by that of others who were well acquainted with General Brown's circumstances. Having little hope of being restored to such a state of health as would permit him to devote a portion of his time to his private affairs, Gen. Brown gave up his real estate, to be disposed of for the benefit of his creditors. A part of it still remains in that situation, but entirely insufficient to pay the debts for which it is bound. Another part, including the farm upon which he formerly resided, has been sold, and the latter purchased by his son-in-law, who is still indebted for a large portion of the purchase money. Besides his own debts, General Brown was bound as security for a considerable debt of a brother. The larger portion of this has been discharged by him, but a balance of some thousand dollars is still unpaid. I now offer to the Senate, [said Mr. H.] and request the Secretary to read, two letters from the Physicians who attended General Brown, in his illness, to show the nature of his disease, and the cause to which it is to be attributed. [The letters here read were from Doctor Lovell, Surgeon General of the Army, and Dr. Henderson, of this city. They both concur in the opinion, that the disease, of which the General died, was produced by the sudden suspension of another, contracted in the army.] In addition to this testimony, [said Mr. H.] I am authorized, by a gentleman of the greatest respectability, now in this city, [Governor Cass,] to say, that, in the year 1815, General Brown informed him that he derived the disease under which he was then laboring, from the wounds he received in the battle of Niagara.

It will be seen, sir [said Mr. H.] that the Surgeon General asserts, that, if General Brown had lived, and retired from the Army, he would have given him a certificate for a full pension, under the existing laws of the country. There is, however, no law now in existence, under the provisions of which, his family could obtain relief; but, I rely with confidence, that it will not be withheld, as the principle upon which it can be supported, strictly accords with those upon which the Government have heretofore acted. I can say with truth, Mr. President, [said Mr. H.] that I would be one of the last men who would introduce into this country that system of sinecures and pensions which has produced so much misery in another quarter of the globe, and which, more, perhaps, than any other cause, obliges, in the language of our great countryman, Mr. Jefferson, "The European laborer to go supperless to bed, and moistens his bread with the sweat of his brow." There is, however, no danger of this as long as our free institutions remain: as long as the other branch of the Legislature consists of the real Representatives of the People, and this the Representatives of the State authorities, themselves fairly and freely chosen by their fellow-citizens. Public opinion will always interpose an effectual check to exorbitant expenditures of the common treasure, or to any which is not strictly compatible with the genius of Republican Government. Our pension laws exhibit nothing which is at variance with these principles; nothing which a free country should blush to own. They contain moderate appropriations, as a requital for distinguished services and sufferings in the cause of liberty and the people.

As yet, sir, public opinion is far in advance of the Legislature, upon subjects of this kind. As far as my observation has extended, no appropriation of money, for any object, is viewed with such decided approbation, by the American People, as those of the character contemplated by the present bill. Where was any measure hailed with more joy and satisfaction throughout the whole Union, than that which provided for the ease and comfort of the indigent soldiers of the Revolution? I had the honor, about the same period, to introduce into the other branch of the Legislature, of which I was then a member, a bill to extend the pensions granted to the widows and orphans of those who fell in the late war, to an additional period of five years, and I can say, with truth, that no act of my political life ever received more decided approbation from my constituents.

The grounds, [said Mr. H.] upon which I support the bill now under consideration, are those of moral obligation and correct policy. I am persuaded, Mr. President, that there is not a Senator within this Hall, who, placed in the same situation with regard to other individuals as this Government stands in relation to the family of Gen. Brown, that would not acknowledge that he was bound, by a sense of duty, to provide for them a decent and comfortable support. An old and faithful servant, whose best days have been spent in your service : who has received, on his own manly bosom, the missiles aimed at your life ; and, in your absence, protected your property from being plundered and your family from dishonor, dies of a disease incident to his employment. Is there a person within the reach of my voice who would abandon the family of one by whom he had been thus faithfully served, to the cold charities of the world, if he possessed the means of relieving them? No : I am persuaded there is none. But I may be told, that it is the money of the People which we are now called upon to disburse, and that it was placed under our control for no such purpose ; that we should be generous with our own, but not with the funds of our constituents. But, Sir, if I am correct in supposing that there is a moral obligation, upon the part of the nation, to make this appropriation, who but ourselves can discharge it? We are the Representatives of the People, and possessed of the sole authority to perform their obligations. I will not believe that it will be asserted, that the principles which should govern honorable men do not apply to a nation ; that a crime, which would attach infamy upon an individual, would be considered as no crime at all, when perpetrated by the Government of a People, who, individually, profess to be honorable and virtuous. But, it is asserted that we have been furnished with written instructions, by our constituents, which do not authorize us to appropriate their money in the manner proposed. I will endeavor to shew, Sir, [said Mr. H.] that there is no constitutional impediment to our making the proposed grant ; but, even if the question is doubtful, (which I most positively deny) there is one mode of settling it to which I always delight to refer, and which, under any circumstances, would put an end to my doubts. Apply, Sir, to the plain, honest, unsophisticated opinions of the American People. Follow the family of General Brown to their home—no, Sir, they have no home—not a spot of earth upon the globe which they can call their own. Follow them to the place of retirement provided by a friend, and, as you march along, inquire of every farmer or mechanic you may meet, whether the proposed appropriation shall be made, or not ; and if ninety-nine out of an hundred should not tell you to make it, then I will acknowledge that I am ignorant of the character of the American People.

But, let us, Sir, take a glance at the Constitution, and see what power it has given us to act in this matter. By that instrument, Congress is authorized "to raise and support armies, and make rules for their government." Under this authority, we have raised and supported armies, and have established severe rules for their government. For what purpose, but by rigid discipline, to make them efficient? And is the power given to produce this efficiency by punishment, by torture, and by death ; and that which is more effectual, and which operates upon the mind of the soldier, which elevates, and ennobles his character, withheld? If this is so, what ignorance of the character of our race does it manifest upon the part of those who framed our Constitution. The effect of rewards in producing heroic achievements is so well understood, even in governments founded upon principles opposite to ours, that they have been denominated "the cheap defence of nations." But, Sir, this principle is not new to us. We have always acted upon it. Our statute books are full of laws of that character. Nor are they confined to rewards bestowed upon the individual who has served. His widowed wife and orphan children have received the public bounty, and, I presume, not solely with a view to pay a debt of gratitude, but to stimulate others to the performance of heroic deeds. And I most sincerely pity the man who does not believe that it is the most effectual means that have ever been used for that purpose. I have, Mr. President, [said Mr. H.] high authority for this assertion. It is in the example set us by a country, which, of all others, more nearly resembled our own in the principles of its Government. I allude, Sir, to the Republic of Athens. If we inquire into the cause of the wonderful power possessed by this little State, whose territory is scarcely discernible by the naked eye upon an ordinary map of the world—if we ask by what magic such wonders were accomplished upon the fields of Marathon and Plataea, and we refer to her own citizens for an explanation, the wisest and best amongst them would point to an institution of a character similar to that of the bill before you. They will inform you that the glory of Athens, as immortal as the rock of her Acropolis, was founded upon that institution which claimed the sons of those who had fallen in battle as the adopted children of their country.

[Mr. H. here read, from the history of Thucydides, the concluding part of the speech of Pericles at the funeral of those Athenians who fell in the first campaign of the Peloponnesian war, in which he says, speaking of the law which adopted and educated, as the children of the State, the sons of those who had fallen in battle, "for, wherever the greatest rewards are proposed for virtue, there the best of patriots are ever to be found."] ]

But, Sir, [said Mr. H.] I have a better authority even than Pericles. Aristides, the just and virtuous Aristides, the able General, accomplished statesman, and economical superintendent of the finances—he has pronounced that the law of Solon, which enjoined it upon the State to educate and support the children of those who had died for their country, was, from the effects which it had produced, the pride and boast of Athens. "She alone of all the nations had the sagacity to adopt, and the firmness to adhere to an institution which had rendered her armies invincible." [Mr. H. here read a passage, from Stanley's life of Solon, of a speech of Aristides, preserved by the ancient historian Laertes, to confirm his statement, and thus concluded.] Let us Mr. President, [said Mr. H.] at however humble distance, follow the example set us by this far-famed Republic. Contribute something from the public Treasury to educate the children of the gallant General whom we have lost. Your money will not be thrown away. In your future wars it will produce to you a rich return. Other Browns will arise ; like him will conquer ; and, like him, if necessary, die for their country.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that he was fully aware of the delicacy of the case and the danger there was in opposing it. He was willing to do justice to Mrs. Brown, but he thought, to pass this bill, would be to commence a pension system, to which the gentleman from Ohio had said he was unfriendly. How many wounded soldiers were there under Gen. Brown, for whom no provision had been made? This was, he conceived, but a beginning, and he was averse to going into any pension system whatever. If a sum of money were necessary for the relief of this lady, he had rather that it should be paid by the members of Congress themselves : and, although not very able, he would contribute his proportion. This, would be his own charity; but he did not think he was authorized to take the money out of the public Treasury, and tax the very men, and their children, who had contracted the same disease in the same service. He knew it was not popular to oppose a grant for a female; but he could not, consistently with his own feelings, vote for such a measure.

Mr. NOBLE said, that he objected to the bill. When he was in the western country, he heard the epithet Military Chieftain at every corner. When I hear, said Mr. N., the philanthropy and benevolence of the country called into question, where shall I shelter myself from the imputation of illiberality? Or when a military chieftain is in the case, shall every man put his hand on his mouth and go home, allowing the military fever which now rages to consume every thing? Are we in such a case to be treated with facts from the history of Athens? Why, I will ask, what became of Athens? It became a tyranny; and so will this Government turn out, when once the Constitution shall have been scorched, as it will be, if this military plan is pursued. General Brown's success did not form a debt. If that was all, the yeomanry of the country had equal claims. Their widows, when deprived of their husbands, felt as much as the wives of officers. He objected to making distinctions. All ought to be treated alike. When people talked of economy, they ought to begin to practice it here; and not go home and talk about it. He was willing to go heart in hand to put people, when they were disabled in the service, on the pension list, but he could not agree to a measure so partial as this bill proposed.

Messrs. CHANDLER and BRANCH having made some inquiries as to the pay of General Brown,

Mr. HARRISON said, that the whole of his pay and allowances amounted to 6,700 dollars. He would state that he had it within his own knowledge, that all this sum, with the exception of sufficient for the subsistence of his family, had been applied to the payment of his debts.

The amendment offered by Mr. HARRISON was then agreed to.

The question then being on engrossing the bill for a third reading,

Mr. BERRIEN said, he was called upon to record his vote on this question, and desired to state, very briefly, the reasons which would influence it. Whatever may be the result of this discussion, [said Mr. B.] all will agree, that it becomes us to conduct it in a spirit of moderate respect for the sufferings of the afflicted lady, who is the object of the benevolent provisions of this bill. The sorrows of widowhood and of orphanage are sacred. I am persuaded there is no one among those to whom I address myself, especially that there is no one who has permitted himself, for a moment, to consider the really destitute condition of the family of General Brown, whose feelings would not prompt him to alleviate their sufferings. The refusal of any member of this House to give his assent to this bill, will arise, I am sure, from no indisposition to relieve them, but from a distrust of the power to do so, or from a belief of the inexpediency of establishing the principle which it proclaims. It becomes us, then, to examine, as calmly as we may, both the claim which is made upon us, and our own power to afford the relief which is solicited.

A gallant and gifted soldier, who often perilled life in our defence, and wasted health in the exposure incident to protracted warfare, has been recently summoned from among us, leaving his family in a state of utter and hopeless destitution. To the desolation of the heart, which belongs to widowhood and to orphanage, are too surely superadded, in their case, the horrors of instant poverty—the abrupt transition from comfort to want—it may be, the exchange of the greetings of respectful gratulation for the chilling condolence of the world's cold charity—its protective kindness—its supercilious sympathy. The impulse which prompts to the relief of such sorrows, is innate, instant, irrepressible. We cannot be insensible to it, even in the cold exercise of legislative power. It is nature's own dictate and it will be obeyed, unless controlled by the imperious obligations of conflicting duty. Do these obligations exist here? Must the warm, but often erring suggestions of the heart, be restrained and silenced by the calmer, colder, but more enlightened dictates of the understanding and the judgment? I am ready to yield—it may be a reluctant, but certainly an unqualified obedience to the latter—and yet I will confess it—it is due to truth to say so—that I would not surrender, without a struggle, the conviction which I feel, that the vote I am disposed to give, although it may spring from the impulses of feeling, is, nevertheless, consecrated by judgment.

Sir, I had, with this distinguished soldier, no intimacy of acquaintance, and of him no particular knowledge beyond that which is common to those with whom I am associated. The story of his life was, indeed, familiar to me, for it illumines the page of our national history; and the glory which he had carved out for himself, with his own good sword, has now become the common property of his countrymen. But there is little need, on this occasion, to invoke the feelings which belong to the intimacy of friendship; on the contrary, I would deal with this matter as coldly as gentlemen please—as a question of power, of justice, of policy.

The moment is not propitious, sir, at least, so far as I am concerned, to the discussion of a question of mere power—I do not propose it—but I would not shrink from it. I can yield to no one, in the sincerity of my disposition, to confine myself within the limits of our Federal charter; to preserve inviolable, and untouched, the rights which are beyond its pale. But, if there be a power, which, more emphatically than any other, is given to the General Government, it is the power to provide for the national defence, in the hour of danger. It is given generally, and in detail—fully—freely—absolutely.

If the provisions of this bill be dictated by an enlightened policy, and consistent with a sound discretion, in the exercise of this power, the question of our authority to do what is proposed, is at an end. The position cannot be maintained, that the Department of the Government, which is invested with the war-making power, is limited, in the remuneration of military service, to the simple fulfilment of its contract with the soldier. All Governments, in all times, have, from necessity, exceeded this limit. This Government has repeatedly exceeded it. It habitually acts upon a principle, which transcends it. What is the principle of your pension law? Your contract with these soldiers, you say, has been performed. On a recent occasion, you have solemnly decided that it has been fulfilled to the letter. Whence then do you derive your power to make them objects of your bounty? That bounty is extended to the wounded; to the relatives of those who have fallen in battle; of those, also, who have died, in consequence of wounds received, or casualties encountered in your service. What is the pervading principle of these acts? What the motive to their enactment? What but to cherish that military ardor, which leads to deeds of chivalry, in the hour of coming danger—to nerve the arm of the soldier when he strikes for his country? Look to the case of Penelope Denny, sent to us, two years since, from the other House, and passed without a dissentient voice in this. You gave to the mother of a gunner, who had died in your defence, a pension for five years. You have provided, by law, for the widows and children of those who die by accidents or casualties, (I use the words of the law) occurring in your service. Gen. Brown was as emphatically sacrificed in that service, as if he had fallen in either of those glorious conflicts which gave lustre to his name.

SENATE.]

The late General Brown.

The war of 1812 found him in the very vigor and spring time of life, rich in all sources of virtuous enjoyment. When danger came, he left them to meet it. His whole soul was in that conflict. He came out of it with a brilliant reputation, indeed, but with a constitution worn out and exhausted by the rigor of the service, and by the wounds which he had received in your defence. He has lingered, for a few years, under the pressure of the disease—which was then incurred—and has finally sunk under it, at an age, when, but for that disease, thus contracted, he might reasonably have calculated on prolonged life—and while he was yet young enough to have provided for those who were entitled to his protection. To him personally, you have been just. Do not be unmindful of those, the remembrance of whose destitute condition gave the keenest anguish to his expiring hours. He had commenced a new year of service, and is, therefore, entitled to something at your hands. Enter not into strict judgment with the soldier's widow, in settling its amount. Do not let the ledger of your Treasury record the exact moment of a hero's departing breath.

You are asked to allow to his widow, the compensation of the current year. The principle, I understand, is habitually applied to the quarter, in various departments of the Government. To you, it is a pittance—to her comfort, it is all important; and you, yourselves, in the moral value of the principle, which, by its allowance, you will proclaim to the future defenders of the country, will find an ample reward.

Mr. MACON made some remarks, the commencement of which the Reporter could not hear. He said the pension law ought to be applied equally to all—to rich and poor. At present, there was a system of favoritism, not unlike to that of Great Britain, which was constantly referred to. Every season, some new cases were added to it. He knew that the feelings were always easily excited in favor of the defenders of our country; and he wished that provision might be made for them all, so as to give them enough to eat and drink, and what was decent to wear. This he thought the right system to equalize the operation of the pension law; and he must, therefore, vote against this bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, had been desirous of giving a silent vote upon this subject. If it had been a pension that was asked, he should have objected, for the same reason given by the gentleman from North Carolina. The shape of the bill had been altered since it was first introduced, and, as it was not now proposed to give to the widow of Gen. Brown a pension, and would, therefore, establish no bad precedent, he was entirely favorable to the bill. There were a variety of cases in which similar donations to this had been made to the survivors of public servants. Gen. Mercer died without property, and the old Congress, although they were much afraid of a system of pensions, passed an act, authorizing his son to be educated at the public expense. He believed there was no original obligation to give to the widows of those killed in the army any relief. But it had been considered wise and expedient to do so. The gentleman from Kentucky had several years since introduced and carried through a bill to give, to the widows of all those who died of wounds received in the service, a remuneration. Mr. S. said he believed the People had always been gratified at the passage of that bill. There was a particular case, to which he might refer—that of the family of Commodore Perry, who had rendered great service, and for whose family a provision was made. This in stance had its peculiar circumstances, and could not, he thought, extend the practice in an injurious manner—and, as to precedents, we have enough of them. He thought it incumbent on the bachelors of the Senate to support this bill. They could not resist the appeal made by the widow and children of a distinguished man, with scarce the means of transporting them to their friends at a distance. He could not resist the claim.

Mr. CHANDLER asked the gentleman from Maryland, who was in favor of this grant in favor of the widow of General Brown, whether the Government was not equally bound to every officer and every soldier who served under him? And, if this was the case, were they not commencing a system which will go to a far greater extent than they could well calculate?

Mr. HARRISON moved an amendment, in the form of a preamble, in substance that, "Whereas the late Maj. General Brown died in consequence of indisposition contracted in the service of the United States, therefore, be it enacted," &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky. objected to the preamble; but was in favor of the bill. It was not the practice of Congress to state in a bill the reason for its passage. He spoke at large of the share which females take in all the anxieties, cares, and perils, of their husbands, and sustained the principle that no greater incentive to a performance of his duty, could be offered to a brave man, than the knowledge that, in case of his death, his family would become the objects of the care of Government.

Mr. HARRISON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BERRIEN offered another, of a similar nature, to come in after the words Major General Brown, as follows: Whose death is supposed to have been caused by a disease contracted while in the service of the United States, on the Niagara Frontier. He hoped the gentleman from Kentucky would not object to this, as it did not assume the fact that the death of General Brown was so caused. He offered the amendment because there might be gentlemen who would vote for the bill, and yet were desirous of limiting similar grants to cases of death, in consequence of diseases contracted in the service.

Mr. COBB said, that he objected in a particular manner to the amendment, because its object seemed to be to create a precedent, on which future applications were to be made. It would, therefore, establish a principle to which he was hostile. Now, sir, said Mr. C. if gentlemen have made up their minds to give to Mrs. Brown 5,500 dollars, let them do so. I shall willingly be taken to task for not going with them. He could not bring his mind to accede to the bill, and this amendment made it still more objectionable.

Mr. NOBLE made a few additional remarks, most of which were inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. BERRIEN withdrew his amendment.

The question was then taken on engrossing the bill; and the yeas and nays having been ordered on motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Berrien, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hayne, Johnston, of Kentucky, Johnson, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, McLane, Marks, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Thomas, Willey, Woodbury.—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, King, Macon, Noble, Parris, Tazewell, Tyler, White, Williams.—16.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to take up the bill for the relief of certain survivors of the Revolution; which being agreed to, Mr. W. moved to amend the bill by adding two sections, to make provision for an annuity equivalent to half pay for life.

Graduation of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Mr. W. made some statements as to the effect of the amendments, and, on his motion, they were ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed and made the order of the day for Monday.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to graduate the prices of public lands was taken up, the amendment offered by Mr. HENDRICKS still pending. The yeas and nays were ordered on that question, on motion of Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, spoke, at considerable length, in favor of the amendment.

Mr. BENTON briefly replied to some of the arguments of Mr. JOHNSTON.

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, observed that it had been his intention to attempt an answer to most of the arguments urged a few days since, by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS] in favor of his amendment to the bill for graduating the price of public lands, but in consequence of present indisposition, should confine himself to one or two points.

The original bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BERRON] proposes to graduate the price of public lands, so that after the 4th of July next, they may be sold for one dollar per acre; in one year thereafter, at seventy-five cents per acre; in one year thereafter, at fifty cents per acre; and one year thereafter, at twenty-five cents per acre; and, that the land which shall remain unsold for one year after having been offered at twenty-five cents per acre, shall be ceded to the States in which such lands may lie.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] proposes by his amendment to cede at once these lands to the States.

Of the two plans, I certainly prefer the latter, inasmuch as we should effect by it immediately and without further expense to the United States, what would be as fully effected by the slow process of graduating and offering for sale these lands for four or five years at a very great expense to the United States, and without the least benefit to the new States. On the contrary it will retard the sale of lands in those States, inasmuch as no man will give a dollar per acre for land in 1830, which in '31 he can have for three-fourths of that price, or fifty cents for land in '32, which the next year he can have for twenty-five cents per acre; in fact, none of the lands would be sold, if this bill should pass, till they can be had for twenty-five cents per acre. At which price they would not be worth holding by the United States. I am, therefore, said Mr. D., of opinion that we had better cede the lands at once to the States, agreeably to the amendment, than adopt the system of graduating the prices of land agreeably to the bill. But as we are not reduced to the alternative of either accepting the bill or the amendment, I am against both.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] grounds the claim of the new States to all the lands within their boundaries, upon the generality of the expression in the laws admitting them into the Union, that they are admitted upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever. He asserts that "the equality, sovereignty, and independence of the new States, require that these States should have the free and full control of the public lands within their boundaries," that "the idea of State sovereignty, equality, and independence, included her right to her public domain." "That in seventeen States, the soil belonged to the States themselves." That without these lands the new States "are little else than vassals and tributaries to the power of this Union;" that their condition "is one of abject and humiliating dependence, inconsistent with their rights of sovereignty and equality."

VOL. IV—34

By the ordinance of Congress of the year 1780, States to be formed of ceded territory were to be admitted as members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States. By the ordinance of 1784, they were to be admitted by their delegates in Congress, on an equal footing with the original States. By the ordinance of 1787, they are to be admitted on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever. In all these ordinances the right of the United States to the soil in the new States is expressly recognized, and it is expressly provided that these States shall not interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by Congress.

The different terms mentioned in these ordinances were precisely what was expressed in the first, that the new States, when admitted, should have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States. Vermont was admitted in the year 1791, as a new and entire member of the United States. Kentucky was admitted in 1792, as a new and entire member of the United States. Tennessee was admitted in 1796, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever. The States since admitted, have been admitted on the same terms; although the terms of admission are different, it will not be pretended that there is the slightest difference in effect, or that Tennessee and the States since admitted, have any rights, privileges, or advantages, not granted to Ohio and Kentucky. The expression that the new States are to be admitted on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, does not imply that they are to be equal with the original States; that they are to be equally old, rich, or extensive. They are to be equal to the old States, as the old States are equal to one another, as Delaware is equal to Virginia, or New Jersey to New York. They are to be admitted upon equal footing; that is, an equal basis with the old States—and what is that basis? It is, as expressed in the ordinance of the year 1780, the possession of the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States. But the gentleman contends that States without the right of soil, as asked for by the amendment to the bill, are deprived of the first attribute of sovereignty; that seventeen of the States, that is, the thirteen old States and four of the new, possesses this right. How far is the gentleman warranted by facts?

The Legislature of Pennsylvania, in the year 1779, passed an act vesting in that State the right of the Penn family to the lands within their boundaries, for which they allowed that family one hundred and thirty thousand pounds sterling—which was paid to them, and the transfer was considered a purchase. Before that time the State held no lands, except by purchase or grant from the proprietaries, and yet Pennsylvania was not more sovereign or independent after, than she was before that purchase.

Massachusetts held lands to a great extent in the State of New York, yet New York considered herself an independent and sovereign State.

Massachusetts now owns a considerable portion of the soil of the State of Maine, yet Maine considers herself as sovereign and independent as Massachusetts. Is Congress to purchase up the Massachusetts title to lands in Maine, as we purchased up the Indian title to the lands in the Western States, and cede the same to Maine, that she may be on an equal footing in all respects whatever with the original States?

How far the other Atlantic States are owners of the soil within their boundaries, I am not informed, except as to New Jersey, which never owned an acre of her soil except by purchase.

The population of this State during the Revolutionary war was rated at one-twentieth of the whole; her contribution to the expense of carrying on that war was more than a twentieth part, for she was found to be a creditor State, while the debtor States have not yet paid up the balance against them. No State, according to her means, contributed more to the successful prosecution of the war, nor suffered more by the ravages of the enemy. The State at the close of the war was poor and exhausted; and has been obliged from that time to the present moment to resort to a land tax for the support of her Government. Of the immense amount of vacant or Crown lands gained by the Revolutionary war, New Jersey gained nothing, except an interest in the lands ceded by certain States, as property common to all the States—but even this, if the present bill pass, will be taken from her.

The whole soil of New Jersey belonged to proprietors, who were purchasers of the immediate grantees of the Duke of York. Many of these proprietors, ever since the Revolutionary war, continued to reside in England; as the Penn family, the Earl of Perth, General Reid, and others, owning nearly an eighth part of all the unlocated lands in East Jersey, nearly four hundred thousand acres of which, in that part of the State, have been sold since the war of the Revolution. About twenty years ago, the proprietors in England sold out to citizens of the United States, chiefly of New York. Large tracts of unlocated lands are still left in the State, which, when purchased, must be paid for, in part, to people residing out of the State, who contribute in no way to the benefit of the State: for their lands have never been taxed, nor has any attempt ever been made to tax them.

New Jersey has never applied to have the proprietary right to her soil extinguished. New Jersey has never considered herself as a vassal, or as tributary to the proprietors, or to the power of this Union. She has never considered her condition as one of abject and humiliating dependence, inconsistent with her rights of sovereignty and equality. On the contrary, she has considered herself as sovereign, free, and independent, as any State in the Union, in all respects whatever.

Yet how much better would it have been for New Jersey that her soil had belonged to the United States. In that case she would have been a part owner with her sister States. She would probably, as in some of the new States, have had a thirty-sixth part of her land for the purposes of education; five per cent. on the sales of her land for roads; two thousand five hundred acres for a seat of Government; and twenty-three thousand acres for a seminary of learning.

While the gentleman from Indiana is endeavoring to make the new States equal to the old States in all respects whatever, I should be glad if he would endeavor to make New Jersey equal to the new States in all respects whatever. If we are bound, from principles of justice, to cede these lands to the new States, we are equally bound to refund the moneys received on the sales of land in these States. To Ohio we ought to pay about sixteen millions of dollars, to other States smaller sums.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSON] is mistaken, if he calculates, as he seems to do, that a reduction in the price of public lands will lead to any considerable sales of the poor land of his State: while there are many millions of acres of fertile lands to which this reduction of price will extend, the poor lands will not be purchased. If the price were reduced to twenty-five cents per acre, the poor man could buy a quarter section, worth but a quarter of a dollar per acre, for forty dollars; but if he could precisely as well purchase for his forty dollars a quarter section of good land worth two hundred dollars, or one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre, he would certainly prefer the latter, and the poor land would remain, as it now does, unsold, for want of buyers.

If we are not bound to cede these lands to the new States, as property which has been unjustly detained from them, is there any other consideration that should urge us to the measure? None, while the new States are vastly more prosperous than the old States are, or ever were. By a statistical statement I have lately seen, I find that Ohio has added more than a sixth part to her population in four years—that is, about seventeen per cent. in that time; and that Alabama has nearly doubled her population in seven years. The history of mankind furnishes no parallel with this. Although the other new States have not been equally prosperous, yet their population has increased beyond any thing known in the old States, and by draining those States of their population as well as their wealth.

FRIDAY, MARCH 28, 1828.

KENYON COLLEGE.

The bill granting a township of land for the benefit of Kenyon College, in the State of Ohio, having been taken up, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the bill, by providing for a similar grant for the benefit of Waterville and Bowdoin Colleges, in the State of Maine.

Mr. KANE said that the bill under consideration had been reported upon the petition of the Trustees of Kenyon College, accompanied by a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, unanimously adopted by that body, enforcing the application. As strong [said Mr. K.] as was the claim of the petitioners, thus respectfully recommended to a favorable hearing, there were other inducements to be found, in the circumstances of the origin of this institution, and of its progress to its present interesting attitude, which had operated more powerfully upon his mind. A few years ago, a reverend gentleman, now in this city, in his travels, which had been extensive, through the Western country, discovering that the means for education were not commensurate with the wants of the rapidly increasing population of that great region of country, conceived the design of establishing a seminary of learning, in some convenient position, upon a plan as extensively useful, as the cheapness of the means of subsistence could possibly admit of. It was hardly necessary for him to remind the Senate, that, in no country could the substantial of life be more cheaply obtained than in the State of Ohio. He believed it practicable, and experience had shewn his belief to have been well founded, to reduce the expenses of an education at a regular College within the competency of the great body of the farmers of the country, and of men in ordinary circumstances, of other pursuits in life, to educate their progeny. With views thus benevolent, this pious and learned man [Bishop Chase] proceeded to Europe, and obtained from well-disposed and wealthy individuals there, thirty thousand dollars, to be applied to this object. From his own countrymen, he had obtained an additional sum of twenty-five thousand dollars. With such part of those funds as was not, by the donors, designated for particular professorships, a large tract of land had been purchased, in a central and healthy position in Ohio, and the title thereto had been vested in a corporation, which had perpetual succession. Buildings had been erected to a limited extent. Larger and more commodious edifices had been partly built, and must await the further aid of individuals, or of the Government, for their completion.

Mr. K. said, he held in his hands a statement, subject to the inspection of any Senator, shewing a faithful and economical disbursement of the funds received. In this situation, the worthy gentleman he had named applied to the Legislature of Ohio for assistance. It was well known that that State was engaged in a great and expensive work, in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Ohio River with the Northern Lakes, which required all the disposable funds, and that she was not the owner of a foot of land to give away. That Legislature had done all that was in their power to do, in earnestly recommending the cause of this infant seminary to the favorable attention of Congress. The question then was, should this appeal be made in vain? Congress had made similar grants, to several institutions, for the instruction of the deaf and dumb; and the constitutional power of the Government over such subjects, need not be discussed. But, said Mr. K., if this question of power be involved, it will not be difficult to place the subject in a point of view, which not only shows the right, but which makes it the duty of the Government to make the grant. The right to "dispose of" the public lands, for the common benefit, embraces the power of devising the means of making such disposition available, and of making the purchase of lands more desirable. What stronger inducement could be held out to persons desirous to emigrate and purchase lands, than a knowledge of the fact, that the means of education were amply provided for in the country containing the lands? An individual had, by unwaried exertions, collected, in a foreign country, and in the Eastern States, a large sum of money, and had expended it in permanent and useful improvements, in a State wherein the Federal Government was by far the largest proprietor of the soil. He had thus contributed materially to the value of the national interests in that State. He had, and was continuing to do much to make Ohio a desirable State to move to and reside in; because he was largely contributing to the conveniences of education. Would any Senator present, owning as much vacant land, in any country, as the Government held in Ohio, hesitate to contribute a just proportion towards the expenses of so desirable a purpose? Nay, sir, would he not cheerfully enter into a contract, beforehand, with any person who would engage to do as much to improve his property, as Bishop Chase had done to render desirable the public lands in Ohio, to grant him a township of the land? Mr. K. said, he had heard some apprehensions suggested on account of a supposed connexion between this institution and a particular religion; no such fears ought to be indulged in. It was true that the present head of this institution was an Episcopalian Bishop. The Corporation was not limited to the instruction of youths in any particular religious creeds, and was no further Episcopalian than would be the Government or Constitution of this country, should, at any time, the President of the United States happen to belong to that denomination of Christians. The whole Western country was greatly interested in the successful issue of this application. The new States had not the means of endowing colleges, and would not have, until much of the public domain should become the property of individuals, and thereby become subject to taxation. The grants heretofore made by Congress for the purpose, could not be made available, to a sufficient extent, for many years to come. The United States were the landlords of the soil; and he insisted that the high obligations of a Government, thus situated, could not be discharged, but by liberal and efficient grants for purposes of education.

Mr. RUGGLES said, as he had presented the petition upon which this bill was reported, it would, perhaps, be expected of him, that he should say something in explanation of its object. The President and Trustees of Kenyon College, have, by their memorial, respectfully asked of Congress to grant them a township of land, to aid their efforts in rearing and building up a seminary of learning, which has been commenced under the most favorable auspices, and is now in a state of great forwardness. The funds which have been already acquired for this object, have been raised by the President alone, [Bishop Chase] who has spared no pains, and omitted no exertions, within his power, to carry into effect this design. His great devotion to the success of this institution, for several years past, has led him to make great sacrifices of property, comfort, and happiness, to attain his object. He has succeeded beyond the most sanguine anticipations of his friends, and even beyond his own most ardent expectations. The donations already made, in Europe and in this country, amount to fifty-five thousand dollars, all of which are to be exclusively applied to the support of this institution. He now asks Congress to grant one township of the wild and unappropriated lands within the State of Ohio, to further assist him in the prosecution of this praiseworthy and patriotic undertaking. Mr. R. said, he hoped the application would not be made in vain—he sincerely believed, that, when the Senate took into consideration the great and unparalleled exertion of this distinguished individual, in the cause of humanity, of morals, and of learning, they would not withhold the small assistance asked for.

Mr. R. said, the college, for which this donation was asked, is situated in the county of Knox, within a few miles of the centre of the State. A tract of eight thousand acres of land, very rich and fertile, has been purchased by a portion of the funds acquired, and on this tract the buildings of the college have been commenced. Its central position will furnish equal facilities to the inhabitants of every part of the State. This college has been incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Ohio, and the usual privileges have been conferred upon it. From the rapid progress already made in the buildings, its entire completion will be effected in a very short period of time.

Mr. R. remarked, that he could not but advocate the present bill with great earnestness, not only from his own conviction of its importance and necessity, but from other and higher considerations, which he considered imperative upon him. So deep an interest did the Legislature of Ohio feel in the success of this institution, that, at its present session, resolutions were passed by that body, with great unanimity, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives, in Congress, to use their best endeavors to procure the passage of a law granting a township of land for this purpose. Under the influence of these instructions, and supported by the just weight and character of so respectable a body of men as composed that Legislature, he could not but expect success in the present application. Why has the Legislature instructed their Senators and Representatives upon this subject? Why has it not granted the necessary aid itself? The reason is a plain and obvious one. Ohio is not the owner of any public land. She has not an acre to give. The Congress of the United States possess, and have power to dispose of, all the public lands within the limits of the State. This application is then made to Congress, as the great landholder there, to contribute a portion of its funds for the purposes of education; to unite with those who have made donations to this object, for the benefit of the present generation, and for posterity.

There is always an interest created in the public mind to know something of those who devote their lives, and their best days, for the benefit of others, for the service of mankind. Mr. R. said he would make a plain statement to the Senate, of the great and extraordinary exertions of this distinguished individual, to build up this College, and, when it is considered that he has done so much, it cannot be thought inexpedient for Congress to do something. The president of this institution is at present the Bishop of Ohio. He was, formerly, an Episcopal Clergyman, settled as a preacher in the city of Hartford, Connecticut, by one of the most respectable and wealthy congregations in that portion of the Union. Had he been satisfied with a competent support through life, and desirous of living at ease, in pleasant and accomplished society, he would have remained with his congregation. But his mind was of a higher order; he was desirous of becoming more extensively useful to his fellow citizens, and of enlarging the sphere of his benevolent exertions. In obedience to these high and honorable feelings, he determined upon emigrating to the Western country. He left his situation with great regret, and similar feelings were manifested by all his friends and acquaintances at their separation. It is about ten years since he established himself in Ohio. His professional duties required him, for several successive years, to travel into every part of the State, and, almost, to every county within the limits of the State. Here he collected the dispersed and scattered members of his society, and organized them into churches. It was a work of great labor, and required his constant and unremitting exertions. While thus engaged, he became extensively acquainted with the citizens of Ohio, and of the situation and condition of the rising generation. He saw, with deep regret, the great deficiency that existed in the means of education; and having connected his destinies with the People of the West, he resolved to exert all his energies to collect funds and establish a college for the purpose of instructing the youth of the country. It was a task of no ordinary character; it required perseverance and firmness of purpose, which but few possess. He commenced the work, and has triumphed.

In the prosecution of his object, the President of this institution, a few years since, visited England, for the purpose of soliciting contributions to enable him to build his college. He had been there but a short time before a great interest was excited in his favor, and many of the most distinguished personages of that country contributed largely. Lord Kenyon, whose name the college bears, took an active and decided part, and a similar feeling and sentiment were created in others. From those generous benefactors of learning and science he received thirty thousand dollars in money, books, and other articles necessary for such an establishment. These funds, so generously contributed beyond the Atlantic, laid the foundation of this institution. Nor have our own citizens in the United States, been less mindful of the great interests of education. More than twenty-five thousand dollars have been subscribed by the People of this country. The generous and the patriotic have every where lent their aid, and upwards of fifty-five thousand dollars have already been realized. This money has been applied to the purchase of land, to the erection of the necessary buildings, and placed in productive funds for the support of Professorships. One other fact ought to be mentioned. While the gentleman to whom reference has so often been had, was in England, many persons were desirous of making him some presents—of conferring upon him some distinct favors—all of which he declined receiving, lest an imputation might rest upon him that his object in visiting that country was for his own private benefit, and not that of the institution. He requested that all those presents, intended for himself, might be given to the cause in which he was engaged—they reluctantly yielded to his request, and gave them the direction he required.

One great and prominent object of the President of this institution, has been to reduce the expenses of education, and bring it within the reach of all classes of society, to the most humble as well as the most wealthy. It must be admitted, that some of the best talents of the country are to be found in the lowly cottages of the poor. Every effort, therefore, to furnish facilities to this class of our population to obtain an education, is of essential importance to the community. The whole expenses of one year's board, tuition, and washing, do not exceed sixty dollars. This is no visionary calculation. Three years' experience has demonstrated the truth of this fact. Numerous applications for the admission of students, from different States in the Union, have been rejected, for the want of accommodations. When this college shall have been completed on the present plan, it will be sufficiently large for the reception of five or six hundred students.

Mr. R. said he thought it was his duty to give this brief history of the commencement and progress of this institution, that the Senate might distinctly understand its claims, and the grounds upon which the appropriation was asked. The zeal and perseverance with which this work has been prosecuted, is highly creditable to its founder and patron. The judicious application of the funds already acquired, will furnish sufficient evidence to the Senate, that any grant they may be disposed to make will be faithfully and honestly devoted to the cause of literature and science. On this point, Mr. R. said, he believed no doubt was entertained by the Senate—none had been expressed. In making these remarks, and advocating the present appropriation for Kenyon College, it is not intended to undervalue other colleges, which have been established in Ohio. They are highly respectable seminaries, and have been conducted in such manner as to reflect the highest credit upon their officers, and upon the State. But yet there is room for others, and an honorable competition among them will produce the most salutary effects upon the community, increase the means of education, and enlarge the sphere of science. With this view of the subject, Mr. R. said, he would leave the question with the Senate, under a firm conviction that they will be disposed to pass this bill.

Mr. BRANCH opposed the bill, on the ground, as he was understood, that it was a sectional institution.

Mr. PARRIS made a few remarks in support of the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON said, that the bill was, in his opinion, founded upon important principles. The great landlords of the country were bound to do something for the benefit of those who had settled their domain; and he was surprised at the objection offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BRANCH.] He had said, that large grants of land had already been made for the purposes of education in the Western States. But this was not the case. It was true, that it was part of the contract upon which the new States were admitted into the Union, that a township of land should be given for every million of acres. This was the foundation of two colleges now established in Ohio. This land was not given, as is supposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, but resulted from a bargain made with individuals, and greatly contributed to the settlement of the public lands. The State of Ohio now comes forward, and asks Congress for that which any other State, under like circumstances, might be expected to ask for, and which, it is but reasonable to hope, will be granted. The principle has been well established. Even the Crown of England, before the Revolution, made grants of land for similar purposes. The State of Virginia did the same by Kentucky, then a dependency of that State; and Massachusetts, while Maine appertained to her, gave a quantity of land for the establishment of Colleges. When the lands were granted for schools in Ohio, there was not a single white inhabitant in that State. Congress gave this small portion of their possessions for the purpose of accelerating the sale of the public lands; and the plan had great effect. It was a bargain in which the Government were great gainers; for it was a strong inducement to settlers to take up new land, when they were secure in a provision for the education of their children. It was now asked, to give a small portion of land to establish firmly a respectable seminary in that State, and he hoped the request would not be denied. In reply to the remark of the gentleman from North Carolina, as to the cheapness of education in Ohio, he would remark, that it was cheap in the lower part of the State, but not uniformly so, from the want of facilities. He would say but one word as to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine. He was never disposed to reject a proposition, without a full investigation of its merits. And, when the gentleman from Maine should bring forward a proposition for a similar donation to that State, he would promise to give it a dispassionate examination, whatever might be his vote upon it? or, when a similar proposition came from any other State, he would give it the same attention. The application, in this instance, was not from an individual, but from the Legislature of the State of Ohio, which he thought gave it a claim to much additional weight. The State of Maine was differently situated. She had already received donations of large quantities of land, for the purposes of education. Their colleges and schools were organized and flourishing; and he thought, therefore, that a proposition for a donation of land to that State ought not to be brought in to interfere with the passage of the present bill, which was based on other circumstances and considerations.

Mr. CHANDLER observed, that the gentleman from Ohio laid considerable stress on the fact, that certain wild lands had been granted to the State of Maine, for the benefit of schools. And how did she obtain them? She fought for them—and more, she fought for, and assisted to conquer, the same lands of which the gentleman from Ohio speaks. And when the lands are to be given away, the lands which constituted a fund for the general benefit—was it to be considered so very extraordinary, for the State of Maine to ask for a share in the donation? He certainly did not perceive that it was unreasonable to make the motion which he had presented.

Mr. KANE said, that the bill was extremely embarrassed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, and more especially coming from a Senator from the State. When the other States surrendered their wild lands to the General Government, Massachusetts retained hers, and when the State of Maine was admitted into the Union, Massachusetts divided the wild lands with her. So that this proposition shews that, not content with her share of Massachusetts' lands, she now asks for a share of the lands formerly owned by Virginia. The demand, he thought, an unfair and unjust one; and he hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. PARRIS said, that, in reply to the suggestions of the gentleman from North Carolina, he would state, that both the Colleges in Maine, to which a grant is proposed by the amendment, are chartered institutions? each being under the control of a Board of Trustees, perpetual in its duration, in which are vested all the lands, and other property, belonging, or in any way appertaining, thereto. They are not incorporated as sectarian institutions, no particular religious creed being required, by charter or by law, as a necessary qualification for their Presidents, Professors, or other officers. Gentlemen of different religious sentiments constitute their Boards of Trustees, and students of every religious denomination are indiscriminately admitted. A donation, therefore, granted under such circumstances, would not enure for the benefit of any particular individual or religious sect, or even exclusively for the State, but for all who may hereafter have occasion to resort thither for the benefit of instruction. The intimation of the Senator from Ohio, that the amendment has been offered for the purpose of embarrassing the progress of the bill, is most assuredly erroneous. The Senate could find another, and undoubtedly a sufficient reason for the proposition to amend. The public lands have become a fund, upon which all who are seeking for grants, either for charitable, benevolent, or local purposes, seem anxious to draw. Applications for these lands, for such objects, have been increasing from year to year, until now the proposition to relinquish the whole, for the benefit of the States in which they are situated, has been distinctly submitted, and elaborately advocated. It should be recollected, that the public lands are the common property of the nation, purchased by the joint funds, or conquered by the joint efforts, of all who composed the Confederacy at the time of their acquisition. It is not wonderful, then, that Members from other States, which have derived no special benefit from these lands; for whose Institutions or improvements not an acre has ever been applied, should ask for some small, inconsiderable grants, for similar purposes, within their own States. This consideration, Mr. P. believed, had influenced his colleague to propose the amendment, and it was with no small degree of surprise, that he perceived the opposition to that amendment arose, principally, from the friends of the bill. Gentlemen have compared the claims of Ohio with those of Maine; and, because, on the division of Massachusetts, her public lands were equally assigned to the two portions originally constituting that State, have drawn conclusions unfavorable to the proposed amendment. What bearing that argument can have upon the question, is not easily perceived. The public lands of Massachusetts were the common property of her whole population. A portion of that population is formed into a separate community, and, being legally and equitably entitled thereto, receive a proportion of the public funds, equal to its proportion of population. This new community has also a common interest with all the other States, in the public property of the Union. And can this interest be in any degree affected by the arrangements with Massachusetts? Most certainly not. As well might it be urged that no part of the public revenue should be expended in Maine, or munitions of war be deposited therein for her defence, because a portion of the personal property, including ordnance and military stores, which she had heretofore owned in common with another State, has been assigned to her in severalty.

If the Senator from Ohio had turned his attention to another view of this case—if he had taken into consideration other facts, which seem to have a bearing upon the question, he might well have come to a different conclusion. It ought not to be forgotten, especially in discussing this amendment, that one thirty-sixth part of all the public lands in the State of Ohio have already been granted for the use of schools therein, in addition to what has been given, from time to time, for the endowment of Colleges and Academies. And what has Maine ever had from the public lands or the public Treasury, for literary purposes? Not a dollar. While large grants have been made for various purposes to other States—for opening roads, constructing canals, educating the deaf and dumb, and other objects—the moment any effort is made to let in a State, which has shared nothing from this fund, what are we told, and that, too, by those who have been large participants, and are still soliciting more? Stand aside, your claims are still to be deferred, as of inferior merit. It is urged, as an argument in favor of this grant, that its effect will be to reduce the expense of education in the West, and that the benefit will accrue to those of that region who cannot now avail themselves of the advantages of a public education, for want of the necessary means. The same reason applies, with equal force, in favor of the proposed amendment, and another institution in Maine founded more particularly for the instruction of those designed for mechanical and agricultural employments, might, with great propriety, have been included. It is no less important in the East, than in the West, that the expense of education should be reduced; and if in the latter, in consequence of a milder climate or more productive soil, the expense of subsistence is less, it certainly takes nothing from the force of the argument in favor of the former.

Much consequence is attached to this application, because it is recommended by the State Legislature; and from the circumstance that no similar application has been made from other States, the erroneous inference is drawn, that other Colleges do not need assistance. Such is far from being the fact. One of the institutions named in the amendment, and that the most flourishing and best endowed in the State, has been struggling, in vain, for years, to raise funds sufficient even for the erection of a chapel. In the other, additional Professorships are highly necessary. Both would have long since offered their petitions, supported by unquestionable proof of necessity, if they had been informed that grants were to be made for such purposes.

It is, indeed, an easy mode of satisfying an applicant, for a State Legislature, when indisposed or unable to yield the assistance prayed for, to endorse an application to Congress, and thereby secure to it extraordinary consideration. But let it be generally understood that the influence of such application is to be irresistible, and where is the State that will not immediately apply? The two other Colleges in Ohio will at once ask for grants, under the same imposing influence, and so will every College in the country.

These observations, Mr. P. said, had been drawn from him with reluctance. But, considering the quarter from which the opposition to his colleague's amendment arose, he should have thought himself inexcessably negligent of his duty, were he to have remained silent. He was not opposed to the application for Kenyon College. He held in high estimation the learned and worthy individual, by whose laudable exertions that institution had been founded. No man stood higher for purity of character, or philanthropic efforts. But the path which the worthy Bishop has trodden, was long since explored by one of the literary patriarchs of New England. The exertions, and, it may be truly added, the sufferings, of the founder of Dartmouth College, in New Hampshire, in promoting the establishment of that ancient institution, have never been surpassed. The founder of Kenyon College, the Wheelock of the West, has but followed in his steps. There are no circumstances operating in favor of a grant to the College in Ohio, that may not be urged, with equal force, in favor of Dartmouth College, and many other similar institutions in the Union.

The proposition of the Legislature of Maryland, to set apart a portion of the public lands for the purposes of education in all the States, Mr. P. had always thought correct. It had received the sanction of the Legislature of the State to which he belonged, and, he hoped, would eventually be successful. But, what say the Senators from Ohio? Substantially this: Encumber not the bill with any proposition for a like grant to Maine. Talk not of a general distribution now. Pass this bill, and, upon the question of a general distribution, "although we will not promise to carry a single vote in its favor from the new States, we will give it our dispassionate consideration." Would not that "dispassionate consideration" be quite as likely to lead to equitable results, if the bill for the relief of Kenyon College should be merged in the general proposition?

Mr. FOOT said, he did not rise for the purpose of entering into the discussion of this subject; but merely for the purpose of either correcting the statement of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. HARRISON] in relation to donations of land, made, as he says, by "the Crown, to every Literary institution established in the Colonies," or, to enquire of the Senator where the State of Connecticut can find the lands given by the Crown to Yale College? Sir, if the Senator can inform us where these lands can be found, he will confer on that institution and on the State, a very great favor. Sir, Yale College has attained an eminence which has never been attained by any institution in this, or perhaps in any other country, with funds so limited as are the funds of this College. But, sir, it cannot be necessary for me to eulogize this institution. She has, at this moment, too many sons within these walls, to make any eulogy from me either necessary or proper.

Mr. HARRISON made a few remarks, in which he alluded to the Colleges in Virginia; but the reporter could not distinctly hear them, on account of the noise in the gallery.

Mr. TYLER would not have risen, but for the reference made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HARRISON] to William and Mary College, and the distinction attempted to be drawn in favor of Kenyon College, to the prejudice of similar institutions in Virginia. Extensive grants, it was true, had been made to William and Mary, by the King of England, yet it rested also on the basis of private donations. But William and Mary was not the only literary institution in that State, which was indebted to private donations. The College of Hampden Sidney, which had been for many years highly prosperous, had been reared entirely from the subscriptions of individuals, never having received, as he believed, one dollar from the exchequer of the State. The same remark was equally true in regard to Washington College; and, as to the University of Virginia, although it had received considerable endowments at the hands of the Legislature, yet it also had received important aid from the contributions of individuals. If the right existed to make grants of the nature contemplated by the bill, he could not admit that any distinction existed, either in principle or policy, between the case of Kenyon College and those which he had named. If any one State in the Union had stronger claims than any other on the public lands, surely it would not be denied that Virginia was that State. She had surrendered an extensive empire, out of which had been carved important States. Those States might be justly considered to be her daughters, for whose benefit she had surrendered her lands— whilst she had placed herself somewhat in the situation of King Lear. But he did not ask an appropriation of a portion of the public lands to the Colleges of Virginia. He did not believe that Congress had any right to make such appropriation, either to them or to any other literary institution. On the contrary, he protested against the passage of the bill under consideration, because he believed there was a total absence of such power in Congress.

It might be considered that the proposition before the Senate was of little consequence. He did not think so. Immensely important consequences often flowed from apparently trifling causes. The proposition made by Mr. Madison, when he was a member of Congress, to cause a survey to be made of a post road from Maine to Georgia; a proposition which, at the time, scarcely attracted the attention of the public, had been made the basis of the system of roads and canals. All the advocates of that system planted themselves upon that precedent, with an air of triumph. The sympathies of Congress had been appealed to on behalf of the deaf and dumb, and hand had been given. That was already quoted as a precedent justifying the passage of this bill. He thought that, if the present bill passed, the Government might fairly be considered as having acted upon a new doctrine pregnant with consequences the most fatal in their character to the sovereignty of the States. If Congress had the right to endow a college, it had an equal right to establish primary schools of instruction; and a system reared upon this principle would address itself as strongly to the interests of the States, as any other which had been acted upon. Nor were his fears upon this subject wholly imaginary. The President, in his first message, had thought proper to recommend the establishment of a National University; and, acting upon the principle in extenso, a proposition, he believed, had been made in the House of Representatives shortly thereafter, to establish primary schools throughout the Union. Were gentlemen prepared to set a precedent which would be carried to such conclusions? He wanted to know of what value the State Governments could be, if this Government took into its hands the supervision of the highways and the education of children?

Virginia made her donations of lands for objects specified in the grant; the most important of which was the extinguishment of the public debt. The lands were to be disposed of for that purpose. That compact was made anterior to the adoption of the present Constitution, and is equally obligatory with it. Congress had no more right to expunge that condition or stipulation, than to strike from the Constitution itself any one of its features. The right to give lands or to appropriate money from the Treasury, were equivalent, and he objected to both alike.

He had risen merely for the purpose of giving the explanation which he had given in relation to the literary institutions of the State from which he came, and while up, he could not avoid calling the attention of the Senate to the nature and tendency of the bill.

Mr. BENTON objected to clogging the bill with a new provision at that stage, after it had undergone all the ordinary forms, and had been discussed in Committee of the Whole, and was ripe for final decision. He objected, also, to running parallels between the claims of different States, and striking a balance which was to be liquidated by legislative acts. He conceived that every bill ought to depend upon its own merits, and not upon its associations, and that the one in question (for the benefit of the Kenyon College) ought to be left to run its course, free from the companionship of the way passengers which might attempt to join company with it. This bill was for an object, specific, notorious, and recommended by the favorable request of the Legislature of Ohio. A legislative request from a sovereign State ought, at least, to stand for something. The new States, he admitted, appeared, almost too frequently for their own dignity, at the bar of Congress, in the character of petitioners; but this case was not subject to that remark. It was an application in behalf of a literary institution, which had made its way, from small beginnings, to a point of eminent usefulness, and that chiefly by the great exertions of a single individual, the pious and learned prelate, Bishop Chase. The fact that the institution had been able to command so high a testimonial of regard from the Legislature of the State in which it was placed, would be conclusive, that it merited the friendly consideration of Congress. The amount of aid asked was not considerable, whether we regarded the ability of the donor or the meritorious nature of the donation. The United States had more land than she could sell for any terms, even the lowest. The township requested would make no diminution which could be felt or known. The benefit of it would accrue to future as well as to existing generations, to the people of any part of the Union as well as Ohio. Students may go there from any State, and receive the benefits of education on terms of unexampled moderation. If the new States, and Ohio among others, were the owners of all the vacant soil within their limits, it might be proper for them to sustain their institutions upon their own resources; but as the fact was, all the vacant soil belonging to the Federal Government, paying no taxes, bearing no share of the public burthens, there was certainly a moral obligation on this great landlord, an absentee in the worst sense of the word, to contribute to the advancement of their public object, whether for the improvement of the mind or the country, or otherwise. He knew it might be said that the United States had made an appropriation of land for schools; but he considered all such appropriations greatly overbalanced in this case, by the fifteen millions of dollars which Ohio had paid for public lands, by the taxes which she had lost, and by the increased value which the industry and capital of her citizens had cast upon the public lands. Mr. B. concluded with saying, that he need not descant upon the value of education in a free country. He would barely say, that the preservation of our republican institutions must depend as much upon the intelligence as upon the virtue of its citizens.

Mr. BRANCH said a few words, and moved to recommit the bill, with instructions.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that his object in making the motion was to bring the question before the Senate, to determine how far they would go. If his amendment were rejected, he should vote against the bill.

Mr. RUGGLES said, that Kenyon College was an incorporated institution, and this donation was for the benefit of the corporation. He went into a detail of facts, to show that it was not a sectarian institution. He believed it was common for all colleges to be more particularly under some denomination, but it did not necessarily follow that there was any thing exclusive in the establishment. He hoped the bill would be allowed to progress unincumbered. He had no objection to providing for the State of Maine; but if the motion was persisted in, the bill would be lost. As to the idea of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PARRIS] that his State had a fair title to a share of the lands of Ohio, because Maine had assisted to conquer them, he would observe that it was an erroneous conclusion, as Ohio claimed as citizens a large number of the heroes of the Revolution; and it would be recollected, that, when the bill for the relief of the Revolutionary officers was under discussion, Ohio was found to have her full share. The lands were conquered, and the independence of the country established by all the States, generally: nor could any State claim the merit of the achievements of the Revolution above another.

Mr. CHANDLER made a few remarks which were not heard.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the yeas and nays were ordered on the motion of Mr. CHANDLER.

Mr. McLANE said he rose to request the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion, as he (Mr. McL.) would propose another, which would, he thought, meet the views of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BRANCH withdrew his motion to recommit.

Mr. McLANE said that he was desirous of so modifying the bill, as to make it more comprehensive, so that, if it were proper to pass it all, it might embrace other objects than the particular institution provided for. He was unwilling that the bill should proceed in its present shape. It involved a subject of great magnitude, and proposed going further than we had ever gone before. Hitherto we had confined our donations of public lands to institutions for the education of the deaf and dumb. To be sure these were institutions of a peculiar character, as well as it regarded the mode of instruction, as the unfortunate objects of their care; and on these accounts stood in need of aid, which might not be had from individual resources. On this ground he had hitherto stood, but this bill proposed to travel beyond that, and appropriate the public lands for the founding and endowment of an ordinary college. He did not know that he should be opposed to such appropriations, if the policy could be extended to all the States, and in such a manner as to promote the objects of education in each. He was unwilling to confine the favor to a single institution, in a particular State, without a prospect of extending its advantages to others. The whole subject was one of great importance, and he thought it incumbent on us to weigh it well before we acted definitively in any particular case. He thought we could not make this grant to Ohio and refuse it to other States. The land was alike the property of the whole Union, though the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARRISON] seemed to consider it the exclusive property of the new States. It had been acquired by the common funds, and for the common benefit of the whole, and if it were now to be given for the purposes of education, there was no reason why all the parts should not share equally. He saw nothing in this particular institution which entitled it to peculiar favor; he thought, too, when this policy was adopted, that it would be proper to give to such State its proper proportion of the land, to be applied as in its own judgment might be proper to the several institutions within its limits. Mr. McL. would, therefore, move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of making donations of land to each of the States, for the support of colleges within those States.

Mr. BARTON opposed the bill. The State of Ohio, in his opinion, had no special claim to this donation; and that State had already received its full share of land for the purposes of education. He thought, if the lands were to be applied in this way, they ought to be applied equally to all the States in the Union. There were an hundred institutions in the country with equal claims upon Congress.

Mr. RUGGLES opposed the motion of Mr. McLANE. If the bill went back to the committee, it would be too late to act upon it this session. If, on the other hand, this bill were passed this year, the gentleman from Delaware might bring forward his proposition at the next session. He hoped the bill would not be carried out of the Senate by a motion to recommit. Mr. R. concluded with some remarks in answer to those of Mr. BARTON, which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. HARRISON replied to the remarks of Messrs. McLANE and PARRIS.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, the proposition to make a distribution of a portion of the public lands amongst the States, for the purposes of education, originated in Maryland, and a very able argument in support of it was put forth by the Legislature of that State, which received great consideration from Congress. He had always concurred in the view of the subject taken in that argument, and would go as far as any one to give it practical effect. He should, nevertheless, oppose the reference, with the instructions proposed, because, in the first place, he did not believe there would be time to act on the subject during the present Session, with any prospect of concluding it, and, if not finally acted upon, the experiment now suggested might prejudice, rather than advance, its ultimate success: whereas, by passing this bill in its present form, no additional difficulty was opposed to the adoption of the general system. He was much gratified to hear a favorable opinion expressed of that system by so many members, and would indulge the anticipation that it would continue to grow in favor.

There was another motive, which would, of itself, induce him to oppose the motion to recommit. The bill was introduced, in pursuance of the suggestion of one of the States, in the shape of a direct appeal to Congress in favor of this institution. The Senators from that State had expressed a decided wish to obtain a decision on this appeal, without connecting with it any other subject. They deemed this course most courteous and decorous to the State of Ohio, and he thought it but reasonable to indulge them.

While on the floor, Mr. C. said, he could not refuse himself the occasion to say a word in reply to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER.] That honorable gentleman had thought it proper to say, that he perceived in this bill the execution, in part, of the system announced in the message of the President to the Congress of 1825, and to which the honorable gentleman takes exception.

In that message, the President recommended to the attention of Congress the propriety of establishing and encouraging a National University. In doing so, the President had but adopted and repeated the declarations of anxious solicitude which had been expressed by those who had previously occupied the station he now fills, and whose earnest recommendation of the same favorite object, had not, he believed, made them the subject of the censure which is implied in the recommendation of an unconstitutional measure. This object was peculiarly and earnestly urged by General Washington, as well as by his successors.

The honorable gentleman could perceive in this bill, not only the consummation of the purpose suggested by the President's message, but another, even yet more at war with the constitutional restraints on the power of this Government, "the establishment of Primary Schools." But whence arises the apprehension that Congress is about to establish primary schools, or schools of any kind? There is not one word in this bill which connects Kenyon College with the General Government.

[The Chair here interposed, and said, it would not be in order to discuss the merits of the bill on the present motion, which was to recommit, with instructions, and the remarks of the Senator must be confined to that motion.]

Mr. C. asked, if it was not in order to discuss the merits or the effects of the measure which would be reported, if the committee should adopt the affirmative of the proposition contained in the motion submitted?

The VICE PRESIDENT said it was in order so to do.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, he should, then, contend, that the proposition submitted by the honorable gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. McLANE,] was equally exposed to the objections urged by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, against the bill in its present form.]

Mr. CHAMBERS then resumed his remarks. The only principle contained in this bill, which, by possibility, can involve a constitutional question, is, whether the Congress of the United States has power to grant the public lands? From the earliest history of the Government to the present moment—including the present Session—this right has been exercised and acquired in Grants have been made to the new States; to canal companies; to road companies; and to companies or associations for the relief of the deaf and dumb. If a grant can be made to a State, it is difficult to perceive the distinction which would prevent a grant to an incorporated company; and if to one character of corporate societies, he was at a loss to conjecture how the Constitution could be supposed to forbid a donation to another corporate society. The question was altogether one of expediency. Congress had required, from those who had asked a grant of public lands, satisfactory evidence that the object to which the grant was to be applied was meritorious in itself; that the grant was necessary to effect the object; and that the accomplishment of it was calculated to give greater value to the adjacent lands owned by the Government.

In this case, the College is designed to accomplish an object admitted, on all hands, to be desirable in the highest degree—the diffusion of useful knowledge, amongst the youth of the country, even those of contracted and limited pecuniary means, and without regard to political or religious divisions. The benefits of the institution are not to be (as it has been suggested) in any degree confined to individuals of one religious sect, nor are its operations to be made conducive to the formation of the religious creed of its pupils. It has been incorporated by the State of Ohio, and recommended, by the unanimous vote of the Legislature of that State, to our especial patronage, as the recipient of our bounty in the precise mode now proposed in the bill. The proceeds of this grant will be applied to the erection of buildings and improvements, and the accommodation of an increased population, which will necessarily lead to an enhanced value of the adjacent public lands. In what, then, does this grant differ from those heretofore made, in respect to any constitutional principle? or how does it involve any question of establishing primary schools, or any other schools? The Government is to have no interest in, or control over, the institution: its affairs are to be conducted by the trustees, who, by its charter, preside over it; they are not created by the Government, or in the smallest degree amenable to it; nor are their operations, in the slightest respect, subject to its supervision.

It was not his intention to go into the merits of the bill. That duty he cheerfully confided to those who had taken more active interest in the subject. His only design had been to show that the measure was free from the imputed charge of conflicting with the Constitution.

Mr. HAYNE said that this bill had been considered, by the Senator from Ohio, as making an appeal to the good feelings of the Senate—and another gentleman had gone so far as to say, that, to vote for it, would only be an act of proper courtesy to those at whose instance it had been introduced. Such is the guise, Mr. President, under which a measure is ushered into this House which involves one of the most important principles that could possibly be submitted to our consideration; and which, should it be sanctioned, will establish a precedent, that cannot be followed up to its legitimate consequences, without undermining the very foundations of the Federal Government. Sir, in matters of mere courtesy and good feeling, I should be disposed to go as far as any gentleman here; and towards the new States, I have never cherished any sentiments but those of kindness. But, when it is proposed to extend the jurisdiction of this Government to the subject of education, within the limits of the several States—when we are called upon to stretch the Constitution, so as to embrace that large class of subjects which appertain to the improvement of the moral and intellectual condition of the People within those States—are we to be told that the decision of a question of such immense magnitude depends entirely upon the courtesy and good feeling of this House? Gentlemen insist that we must confine our inquiries strictly to this bill, which merely proposes to grant a township of land to a College in Ohio. But why do so, sir? Is it because gentlemen are unwilling to have exposed to open view the magnitude of the question involved in it? Is it because they apprehend that the grant of a single township to Ohio will be considered a small matter, while a similar provision for every State in the Union would excite the vigilance, and alarm the fears, of those who look with distrust on all extensions of the powers of the Federal Government, and especially over subjects which peculiarly belong to the individual States? But, sir, can any gentleman wink so hard as not to see that this bill does, in truth, involve the question, whether the Federal Government shall take the subject of education into its own hands, and appropriate the national funds to that object? I put it to the candor of the Senators of Ohio to say, if this bill should pass, will they—can they—refuse a similar grant to Missouri or Kentucky, or to any of the new States? And when education shall be amply provided for, by grants of the public property in all of the new States, will they refuse similar grants to “the good Old Thirteen?” Can they refuse it to Virginia, who generously and magnanimously surrendered, without price, the very domain out of which this grant is to be made, and who surrendered it, too, on the express condition that it should be applied to the equal benefit of all the States? Grant it to Virginia, and surely it cannot be denied to any other State in the Union. Will either of the Senators from Ohio now rise in his place and tell us, that he will vote against any such proposition? I know they will not. Such a declaration would be the death-warrant of this bill. Then, Mr. President, I am justified in assuming, (what is in truth beyond a question,) that the passage of this bill must, of necessity, eventually lead to the grant of at least 25,000 acres of the public lands to every State in the Union, for the purposes of education. The question is therefore now fairly brought up, whether it is constitutional and expedient for the Government of the United States to take this subject under their care. I am in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. M'LANE], to re-commit the bill, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of making a similar grant to every State in the Union, because it looks the subject fairly in the face, and presents the true question, which we are now called upon to decide; and because, if we are to make a grant to any one State, I am clearly in favor of making similar grants to all.

But, sir, I have no hesitation, whatever, in entering, at this stage of the business, my protest against the extension of the jurisdiction, and the appropriation of the funds of the Federal Government, to purposes of education within the several States. I know that all measures for the promotion of benevolent objects find an advocate in the bosoms of most men, and that the idea that the national funds should be appropriated to the improvement of the condition of the People, (whether by cutting roads and canals, enlarging the boundaries of science, or cultivating the minds and morals of the community,) is one very apt to be cherished by all those benevolent persons, who, when a good end is to be accomplished, never trouble themselves with an examination into the evils which may grow out of the measures adopted for its accomplishment. To such men, the bare suggestion that the Constitution opposes a bar to the prosecution of any just or benevolent scheme, is regarded as a profanation of the sacred character of that instrument. But, sir, we, who, though charged with the duty “of seeing that the Republic sustains no detriment,” find ourselves restrained within the limits of a strictly delegated authority; who perceive, and feel, and are compelled to acknowledge, that the liberties of this country can only be preserved by a strict adherence to the Constitution; we, who know that, to extend the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over matters clearly reserved to the States, will finally overthrow this beautiful fabric of Government, which now stands the admiration of the world; we, sir, in the exercise of our high and sacred trust, cannot be influenced by any considerations but the preservation of the liberties entrusted to our care. It is our duty, sir, to exert a vigilant control over every department of this Government, and to resist every temptation to overleap the bounds of our authority. Sir, I am not more firmly convinced of the unparalleled excellence of our institutions, than that they must be of short duration, if this Government shall long continue to exercise jurisdiction over matters which belong to the States. By the very form and structure of our Government, the jurisdiction over all matters of a domestic or local nature is reserved exclusively to the States. To the Federal Government belong those powers which concern the foreign relations of the country—such as the question of peace and war, our commercial relations, and others of a similar character. While this great division is strictly adhered to, and good faith is observed on both sides, harmony will exist—but, when the Federal Government shall undertake, with its patronage, its influence, and its revenue, to invade the States—to interfere with, to regulate, and to control, their domestic concerns—then will begin that mighty struggle, the issue of which will decide whether this shall become a great consolidated Government, (with all power centered here,) or continue a Confederacy of free and independent States. It will be a struggle between liberty and despotism: for, surely, no man can be so infatuated as not to perceive that the destruction of the sovereignty of the States must inevitably lead to despotism here. But, sir, it is not my purpose to enter into the discussion of the constitutional questions involved in this bill. My purpose is merely to rouse the attention of the Senate to the importance of this question—to put them on their guard against suffering what I must consider as an alarming extension of the powers of the Federal Government, to creep into our legislation, in the humble and imposing garb of a charitable donation to a literary institution. Sir, this Government has already gone too far in assuming jurisdiction over subjects which either do not belong to them at all, or which they could only exercise under limitations which have been wholly disregarded. Let us look for a moment at the powers which Congress have already assumed, as well as the extent of that which we are now called upon to exert. The Federal Government has taken under its charge the whole subject of Internal Improvements within the several States, without restriction or limitation. We are now surveying the country, from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, nay, beyond the Mississippi, to the very frontiers of Mexico, with a view to the establishment of a magnificent system of Internal Improvement. We have already appropriated millions of dollars, and millions of acres of land, to these objects, and have already actually surveyed the routes of roads and canals, which it would take the whole revenue of the country, for twenty years, to construct, and yet the surveys are not completed. Roads and canals for military and commercial purposes, and for the transportation of the mail, have been laid out in every direction. But these, we are told, are all national. Sir, I should really be glad to know what gentlemen mean by a national road or canal. If those only are national, in which every State has an interest, then, certainly, very few of that description have yet been surveyed; and if all are national in which any portion of the people have any interest, then all are of this character. In the latitude assumed on this subject, it is certain that the power of the Federal Government is limited only by its will, and may be exerted to the extent of the whole resources of the country; and it will, I fear, be found, in its exercise, to be a power not to unite, but “to divide the States, by roads and canals.” Having assumed to yourselves unlimited jurisdiction over internal improvements, your next step was to take under your care the subject of charities. Townships of land have been granted to Kentucky, Connecticut, and other States, for the benefit of the deaf and dumb. This has been done, because these unhappy persons were unfortunate. But are not lunatics equally unfortunate? Is there a form of human misery better calculated to excite all the sympathies of our nature, than a family of helpless children, left in a state of orphanage, without the means of support? Are the aged and the sick, and the destitute of every class and condition, to be excluded from your bounty, if misfortune alone is to be the ground of your interference? Sir, it is clear that, on the same principle on which you have undertaken to provide, out of the national funds, for the deaf and dumb, you may take all the charities of the country into your own hands, and build up a system of national poor laws as oppressive as that of Great Britain. But now we are called upon to take another most important step. We are to make a grant to private persons, to enable them to establish a college. It is not a grant to the State of Ohio, but to a corporation, consisting only of a few private individuals. A great deal has been said of the benevolent character and distinguished talents of the right reverend gentleman who is at the head of Kenyon College; and the excellence of the system adopted at that institution has been highly eulogized. Sir, I accede to all that has been said on these points. But, if you make a grant to one college in Ohio, will you not be called upon, and can you refuse, to make it to others? And when you have passed through all the respectable colleges in the United States, must you not take up the common schools, and provide also for them? In short, at what point are you to stop? It is to my mind perfectly clear, that, if you pass this bill, you may, on the same principle, be called upon to provide for all the literary and scientific institutions in the Union. Sir, if the subject-matter is fairly within your jurisdiction, it will be better to adopt a grand system, at once, for the advancement of education in every State of the Union. My objection rests on the ground of your having, under the Constitution, nothing at all to do with the subject.

The gentleman from Ohio has alluded to a circumstance connected with the Kenyon College, which, to my apprehension, seems very much to strengthen the objections to this bill. He tells us that large contributions have been raised in England, among the members of the Church to which the venerable Bishop at the head of this institution belongs, and that we ought not to suffer such generous contributions to fail for want of our co-operation. Sir, in this circumstance I find conclusive evidence of the fact, that this is to be a sectarian college. I do not mean to use that word in an offensive sense; I mean merely that the institution is to be under the peculiar care of professors of particular religious principles. The gentleman from Ohio may be right, when he says that sectarian colleges always succeed best. My objection is against any connexion being established between the United States and such institutions. The Federal Government is prohibited, by the Constitution, from any interference in religious concerns. It is our true policy, and a fundamental principle of our Government, to permit no connexion between Church and State. Sir, if you establish an Episcopal College out of the national funds, can you refuse to do as much for the Presbyterians, the Baptists, the Methodists, or Catholics? It appears to me we will be under peculiar obligations to make a similar appropriation for the Catholics in Ohio, unless you mean to take part against the members of that Church; for it was but the other day I read an extract from an English paper, giving, as a reason why members of the established Church in Great Britain should advance funds in aid of Kenyon College, “in the new Diocese of Ohio,” that the Pope contributed funds for the advancement of Popery there. Sir, the Congress of the United States should have nothing to do with matters of this sort. If we are to go on in the course we have pursued for some time past, I know not what subject of legislation will be practically reserved to the States. If to all the subjects for the action of the Federal Government, fairly deducible from the Constitution, you are to add the superintendence and control over internal improvements, charities, education, and religion; and if, after having exhausted those, you are to set about “the organization of the whole labor and capital of the country,” (as recommended by one of the high officers of the Government,) what, I again ask, emphatically, will be left to the States? Without going at large into the subject, at this time, I must be permitted to express my firm and settled conviction, that the liberties of this People depend on the preservation of the sovereignty and independence of the States. This is our only safeguard, and the only bond of our Union. But the gentleman on the other side insists that this is not a grant of the national funds, but only of the public lands, to an object to which they are properly applicable, and to which the 16th section, in every township, has already been actually applied. I answer that these lands are the property of the United States, and it is not easy to conceive that we have a right to apply our real estate to objects to which we could not lawfully appropriate money. These lands are the common property of the whole nation, and no more applicable to schools in Ohio, than to schools in the other States; and, in relation to the 16th section reserved in each township for schools, we were told, the other day, by the gentleman from Alabama, and no doubt correctly, that these were substantially sold by the United States, for the purpose of being applied by the inhabitants of each township to the establishment of common schools. The township being laid out with the reservation of the 16th section, to be vested in the inhabitants, for schools, it might well be considered that they became the purchasers of the same for these purposes. In conclusion, Mr. President, I would say that we must not be led away, in this case, by the small amount or peculiar nature of the grant we are called upon to make, to forget the principles involved in this question. This is precisely the form in which abuses creep into the State. They usually come in a shape so small and unobtrusive, so imposing, so interesting, that it is difficult to resist them; once introduced, they soon grow to a giant's stature.

With these views, he was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Delaware. But he wished that the committee should be instructed to inquire into the constitutionality, as well as the expediency, of granting lands in this manner. If the committee and the Senate should decide that it was both constitutional and expedient to make these donations, then they would pass the bill. He therefore moved that the motion be amended, by the insertion of the words "constitutionality" before "expediency."

Mr. McLANE observed, that he supposed that the inquiry desired by the gentleman from South Carolina was included in his first motion. If a measure was not constitutional, it could not be expedient. He was willing to accept the modification of his motion, not considering that, in doing so, he adopted any opinion which had been expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BARTON made a few remarks.

Mr. HAYNE observed, that, under the impression that an inquiry into the expediency of the measure would cover, also, its constitutionality, he would withdraw his motion for amendment.

Mr. KNIGHT suggested that the motion ought to be amended so as to include schools as well as colleges. In some States there were schools, but no colleges.

Mr. McLANE then modified his motion, so as to embrace colleges, or public institutions for education.

The question on recommitting being then put, it was decided in the negative, on a division, 18 to 21.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CHANDLER, which was rejected.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill was further amended, by restricting the location of the lands to the State of Ohio.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; when

Mr. COBB renewed the motion to recommit, with instructions, and moved that the question be taken by yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. RUGGLES briefly opposed the motion for recommitment.

Mr. MACON said, that it was of little consequence whether the bill passed with or without the amendment. Either way, it would demonstrate that, whenever a door was once opened, they never shut it. It began with the deaf and dumb, and it is going on, so that, before long, it will embrace every thing. I don't like to hear members talk about the Constitution, said Mr. M. It is useless. I have taken my leave of it some years ago. This donation is for a college established by a meritorious individual. But, if we look to the merits of individuals, where shall we stop? Is this the only establishment in the United States which merits assistance? Yale College has always been highly spoken of, and that has as good a claim as this. I do not know whether this is a State institution, or whether the States manage these establishments in the North and West—but, in the South, the State puts them up and supplies the funds. If you begin with this institution, where will you end? Do you not believe that it will open a door for the entrance, with a petition, of every State in the Union? It will bring the States to Congress, where they never ought to come. These things appear small in the beginning, but they grow in consequence as they go on. As to the desire for education, it is universal; there is not a man in the United States who has as much knowledge as he covets. The argument that education is a blessing, has never been denied. But was it to be managed by Congress? As they went on to increase the powers of the National Legislature, they made it more unwieldy, and increased the friction of the machinery. All the States would ask for assistance, if it was given to one. There was formerly a college in Maryland, and it was burnt down, and all the property was destroyed, but the land; and they had never been able to put it up again; but it remains as it was. Whether this was to be a sectarian college or not, he did not know; but he was against the donation, on all considerations, as setting a bad example.

The question being then taken on the motion to recommit, it was decided in the negative.

The question on engrossing then occurred, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, on motion of Mr. TYLER, it was decided affirmatively.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, on the 31st of March, it was read a third time, PASSED, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, it was ordered that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to Monday next.

MONDAY, MARCH 31, 1828.

VACCINATION.

On motion of Mr. BATEMAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill "to encourage vaccination."

Mr. BATEMAN remarked, that it was probably within the recollection of every member of the Senate, that a law, similar to the bill under consideration, was formerly passed by Congress. It was enacted in 1813, and the country enjoyed the benefit of it until 1822, when it was abruptly repealed, in a moment of excitement, produced by an unfortunate occurrence in North Carolina. It is now proposed to re-enact that law, with two modifications, the most important of which is a provision for two agents instead of one. The question presented by the bill, said Mr. B. is simple, and needs not many words in explanation. It requires the agents to furnish, to any citizen of the United States, whenever it may be applied for, through the medium of the Post Office, the genuine vaccine matter, and it confers the franking privilege on letters or packages to or from the agents, containing vaccine matter, or in any way relating to the subject of vaccination, to the extent of one ounce in weight. The privilege is thus specially restrained, and has all the guards usually employed to prevent an abuse of it. The importance of vaccination as a preventive of the small pox will be generally, if not universally, conceded; and the great benefits which have been derived, and would again result from such an agency, are the designation of persons from whom, in case of emergency, the infection may be obtained, and the security that it will be genuine. When the small pox prevails in any of the large cities, cases of it frequently happen in the country, where the best security against its contagious influence is an immediate resort to vaccination, which, when speedily employed on those in the neighborhood liable to the small pox, never fails at once to stop the progress of that formidable disease. It is in cases of this sort, and very many such have been witnessed, that the advantage of such an agency as is contemplated by this bill, is most conspicuous, by affording a facility for the application of the only appropriate remedy. I have understood, and believe, that the former agent never failed to furnish the genuine matter when applied to for it, one instance only excepted; and that the invariable effect was speedy extirpation of the original disease, unless where it became epidemic in the large cities, in which cases a systematic concert of operation becomes necessary. It is true that the variolous or small pox matter was sent into North Carolina, instead of the vaccine, which had been applied for. A degree of mystery still hangs over that transaction. It is known that the agent, Dr. Smith, was extremely cautious in the administration of his office, and the result of an investigation by a committee of the House of Representatives, during the last Congress, renders it almost certain, highly probable at least, that some mischievous and wicked person had access to the letter in which the vaccine matter had been put up, and substituted therefor a variolous scab. Of the very numerous supplies of the matter, this is the only instance of any mistake, and distressing indeed as it was, ought not to weigh down the many great benefits conferred by the law, which was probably the means of saving many lives. The only favor now asked of Congress in return for so much promised good, is the release of postage on the correspondence growing out of the agency—a dispensation which is granted to seven or eight thousand Deputy Postmasters, and which cannot affect the revenues of the Post Office Department, to any extent worthy of being named. Mr. B. observed, that, if any objections were urged to the bill, he would endeavor to obviate them.

Mr. HARRISON said we had been alarmed here for several days with the appearance of the varioloid. The disorder was much milder than the small pox. The medical societies in Europe had ascertained that, out of some hundreds not vaccinated, eighty-five died of the small pox. Congress, with a view to promote vaccination, gave to Doctor Smith the facilities of communication, by mail, which are now proposed by this bill. It might be asked, why was it necessary to resort to the mail? The answer was, that it afforded the most direct, safe, and speedy means of obtaining the vaccine matter. Were the small pox prevalent here, and were the City 300 miles distant from any place where the vaccine matter could be procured, how many persons might die before the means of security could be obtained, without the use of the mail? The unfortunate mistake which occurred in North Carolina, was, Mr. H. believed, the result of the malice of some individual whose object was to destroy Doctor Smith's reputation. It was impossible to believe that Doctor Smith would have taken the varioloid matter from the arm of a person, to be disseminated. He could have no motive for so demoniacal a deed. It would have been destructive of the whole object for which he had so many years been toiling. But, granting, what seems impossible, that Dr. Smith did mistake the varioloid for the vaccine matter, does it do away the efficacy of genuine matter, and the necessity of disseminating it? There was a prospect that the bill would effect much good. It could, at any rate, be productive of no injury. The expense would be trifling to the United States. Mr. H. had no doubt, if the Senators present were convinced that a single life in the year could be saved by the assistance required, they would most willingly vote in favor of the measure.

Mr. CHANDLER opposed the bill.

Mr. BRANCH made a few remarks.

Mr. DICKERSON did not believe the gentleman alluded to was at all in fault. The suspicion was well founded that the act complained of was done by some person with a design to injure that gentleman. But he was free to say, that, in his opinion, more mischief had resulted from that affair, than could be counterbalanced by any good which had come from making post free the letters relating to vaccination, or containing vaccine matter. If persons were entitled to receive, post free, such letters, why not letters free respecting other diseases? His colleague's object was not only to save expense in the transportation of the matter, but to enable the People to know where they could find the matter. Was not sufficient notoriety to be obtained in the ordinary way? Besides, it seemed that those cities where the matter was most easily to be had, suffered most from the small pox. His colleague had stated that 720 persons had perished in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore; showing that vaccination was most neglected where it was most attainable. He should oppose the extension of the right of franking for the purposes contemplated in the bill.

Mr. BATEMAN replied by stating, that, if this application emanated from, or had any special connexion with any vaccine society, he was unaware of it. Such an institution may exist in Maryland; but if so, its operations were probably chiefly confined to that State. He went for the whole of the United States, to every corner of which, however remote or sequestered, he wished to extend the facilities which the bill provided. It was indeed the country, and those portions of it most remote from the large cities, to which it would be most useful. In the country, the matter could not well be preserved through the Summer; and it was of the utmost importance to practitioners, remote from the cities, to know where, and of whom, they could at all times obtain matter on which they might safely depend. Mr. B. thought the benefits, which resulted from the former law, had been undervalued, by those who opposed the bill. It was a fact, believed to be well established, that the assiduity of the Agent, favored by the co-operation of the Faculty, at one time, extirpated the small pox from the United States, so that, for several months preceding the Fall of 1821, not a case of it was known to exist within our limits. In the Fall of 1821, it was unhappily imported into Baltimore from Liverpool; from the seeds of which it continued to spread wider and wider, for several years, so that, in the year 1824, no less than 720 individuals died of the disease in the three cities, of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and it still prevails in the country. It must be recollected that the Agency law was repealed early in the year 1822. Mr. B. said, that it appeared to him that his colleague [Mr. D.] had not observed his usual caution when he ventured an opinion that the distress produced by the North Carolina catastrophe, would outweigh a large share of the benefit which had been produced by the law. It was difficult, he knew, to estimate rightly the value of preventive remedies. In this case the prevention of the distress resulting from disease and death in the most appalling form, he did not doubt had been very great. As to the charge of postage, which the gentleman from Maine seemed to imagine it was one of the purposes of the physicians to avoid, it was of too little consequence to enter into the account. The great object to be effected was, a sure source from which to obtain supplies of the virus in time of need, and not the avoidance of a trifling charge for postage.

Mr. DICKERSON considered the Society entitled to credit for what public good they had done, but thought the Senate should extend the privilege of franking with great jealousy, even to its officers. The Bible, and other Societies, consider themselves equally entitled to the privilege of free communication. Privileges of this kind should not be partially granted. Why not extend this privilege to other diseases, or why confine it to vaccine inoculation? Mr. D. thought the dissemination of vaccine inoculation sufficiently extensive, throughout the States, without any farther interference of Congress.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the negative. So the bill was rejected.

MARCH 31, 1828.]

French Colonial Trade.

[SENATE.]

FRENCH COLONIAL TRADE.

The bill to regulate intercourse with the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe, was read a second time.

Mr. WOODBURY rose, and said it was unnecessary for him, at this time, to offer any thing beyond a brief explanation of the origin and operation of this bill. It will be recollected, said he, that, in 1825, the British Government, by an Order in Council, opened many of the ports in their West India colonies to all the world, on certain specified terms. Those terms it is not important to enumerate, except that the measure was required to be met by other nations, within a particular time, by commercial regulations of a liberal and reciprocal character. The history of the attempt by this Senate to reciprocate the measure, is fresh in the remembrance of all, and the consequences as well as the causes of the failure of that attempt need not now be repeated. But the French Government early seized upon the opportunity offered by the British order, to extend the commerce of her dependencies, and met it by the French ordinance of February, 1826. That ordinance has recently been placed on the tables of all the members of this House; and its provisions, equalizing the duties on tonnage to vessels of all nations that enter Guadeloupe and Martinique, and imposing a very low tariff on many important articles of export from this country to those islands, are now familiar to all.

The present bill is intended to reciprocate, in a friendly spirit, the provisions of the ordinance. Mr. W. said he could conceive of no objection to its passage, unless gentlemen should apprehend that some important cause, during the last two years, has prevented any steps being taken to meet the ordinance, which ought still to prevent any; or that the bill goes further in its indulgences than the ordinance.

As to the first supposed objection, Mr. W. remarked that he held in his hand a communication from the Department of State, in answer to inquiries by the Committee, and which would be read, if any member desired it, assigning certain reasons for the delay. It appeared by this communication that the ordinance was presented to this Government, by the resident French Minister, as early as June, 1826. It is stated that no special demand was then made, as to what should be done in relation to it; that the President doubted his power to meet it by proclamation under our statute of January, 1824, concerning the removal of discriminating duties; that its publication was noticed in some American newspaper, by the State Department, soon after it was received, though, Mr. W. said, it had not been his fortune to see it republished in any of the Northern commercial papers, or in those printed at the Seat of Government; and that nothing since had been done, or had publicly transpired, concerning the ordinance, till, on a resolution of the vigilant Senator from Maryland, it was communicated to this body. All know, that, after having been thus communicated, it had been referred to the Committee on Commerce, and they seeing no reason why the ordinance should not be promptly met, by a grant of similar privileges to the commerce of those islands, had reported the present bill.

The committee deemed it necessary to act speedily, as the long delay to reciprocate the measure had given rise to a report which, he trusted, would not be verified, that the privileges, so far as regards American vessels, had been, or were about to be, withdrawn. They deemed the trade also of sufficient importance to this country to require early and sedulous attention from the constituted authorities, in its preservation and improvement.

The exports to those islands, with some to Cayenne, on the continent, for two other small West India Islands, belonging to France, which were little more than naked rocks, amounted to almost a million of dollars worth annually. They consisted of our domestic products entirely, except forty or fifty thousand dollars of teas and pepper; and among those domestic products were included many staple articles, such as rice, tobacco, and Indian corn. Nearly one-fourth of the whole exports was lumber; almost one-fifth fish; and the amount of the others, including the articles first named, perhaps it was not necessary to detail.

The returns for these cargoes were likewise of an important character. More than two-thirds of the whole value consisted of molasses, and was in quantity equal to one-sixteenth of the whole importation of the article into the United States. Almost $200,000 was specie and bullion, and the residue sugar, cocoa, coffee, and other smaller articles of little amount.

The manner in which the liberality of the ordinance of February, 1826, has been, or may now be met, may affect the whole of this trade; because, like the trade of the British West Indies, it may, by inattention and delay on our part, become prohibited, or subjected to discriminating duties of the most burthensome character.

The present bill proposes to make an ample and just return for the privileges that ordinance confers; to throw open all our ports to French vessels from the islands of Guadeloupe and Martinique, bringing cargoes, the growth or produce of those islands, on payment of the same duties as American vessels with like cargoes. The bill is thus more extensive in its terms than the ordinance, as it is not confined to vessels owned only in those islands, nor to French vessels sailing from particular ports in those islands—nor is it limited to particular articles of importation, excluding, virtually, like the ordinance, other articles not enumerated; because the ports there opened are probably all where custom-houses are established; because few vessels are owned in those islands which could enter into this trade; and because, save pork and flour, perhaps no articles of importance are wholly excluded from admission. In legislation of this kind, bottomed on free and friendly principles, it is better to exceed than fall short of other nations in the exercise of a catholic spirit. In a Government like ours, which boasts of its liberality and justice, the utmost vigilance should be employed to practice all we profess. The principle of the bill is to us all-essential. Nobody will dread any injurious operation of it to our real interest as well as character, when they advert to the fact, that all the importations here, from those islands, except about $25,000 worth, and all the exports, but about $72,000 worth, are transported in our own vessels. Hence, the privileges granted by the bill will extend only to the small portion of the trade carried on in French vessels. In respect to that portion, we may well be liberal, not only on account of its smallness, but because, though some of our articles are excluded, the duties on those admitted are much less than the duties imposed by us on the articles from Guadeloupe and Martinique. Gentlemen, on turning to the ordinance, will see that lumber pays only 4 per cent., tobacco but 7 per cent., live stock 10 per cent., Indian corn 2 francs the hectolitre, and on rice and salt fish 7 per cent. As the kilogramme is something over two pounds avoirdupois, the duty on rice is probably less than 20 per cent.; while on our part, the importations, such as molasses, sugar, and coffee, pay at least from fifty to seventy-five per cent., and thus leave the whole terms of exchange by no means disadvantageous to this country. The proviso enables the President at any time to withhold the privileges of this act, if those of the ordinance appear to have been revoked. Such, in brief, is the origin, and such will be the operation of the present bill, and, without further explanation, it is hoped that the Senate will, with cheerfulness and unanimity, agree to its passage.

Mr. BRANCH said, the facts disclosed by the Chairman of the Committee on Commerce were certainly of an extraordinary character. It appears that the President of the United States has been in possession of information deeply affecting our commercial relations with the French

West India Islands, as early as the month of June, 1826, which information has been withheld from Congress, for the reasons set forth in Mr. Clay's letter to the honorable chairman. One of which reasons is, that the French ordinance of February, 1826, although officially communicated to the State Department in the month of June of the same year, was published in some one or two newspapers in this country. It, however, does not appear that the ordinance was known to those most deeply interested in the trade; all now admit the value of the information, and the indispensable necessity of immediate legislation on our part.

The chairman had not informed the Senate whether the reasons assigned were satisfactory to the committee. This, however, was unnecessary; for it is but too apparent that no satisfactory reason has been offered, or probably could be. Be it as it may, the subject is one of deep interest to the people of this country, and particularly to a portion of those he represented.

It was clearly our duty to have met the views of France promptly, and placed the trade of the two countries on terms of perfect equality. This Congress would have been as ready to have done at the last session as at this, had they known what the President then knew, or what they now know.

Mr. B. said that he would, for the moment, repress the feelings which such conduct, on the part of our rulers, was calculated to excite, under the hope that some person might be found able to give a more satisfactory reason in extenuation of the policy pursued by our Government.

Mr. SILSHEE said, that the bill under consideration received his approbation in committee, and would receive the support of his vote in the Senate. He considered the ordinance of France as a measure adopted by that Government with a view to its own interest, and without reference to the accommodation of other Powers. The decree itself shews this, by the omission in it of such provisions as are found in the acts of our own, and every other Government, which are contemplated to be met by, or to depend on, the acts of another party. It is a temporary act, said Mr. S., revokable at the pleasure of the French Government, and must have been so considered by this Government, to whom it was not then even suggested that a corresponding act on our part was required or expected. The supposition that a knowledge of the existence of this decree had been kept a secret in the Department of State, Mr. S. said, was erroneous. Although he had not heard of this decree himself, until since the commencement of the present session of Congress, and, under an apprehension that its existence might not be generally known, he had forwarded several copies of it to commercial sections of the country, yet he did not do this with any expectation of giving information to those who are usually engaged in trade to those islands, as he could not believe them to have been so long ignorant of it; for these voyages are made every few months, and, if the rates of duties, or privileges of trade, were essentially altered by this decree, no master or owner of a vessel, which had been at those islands since it took effect, could be so regardless of their interest as not to have a full knowledge of it. Mr. S. said that, very soon after hearing of this decree, he found that it had been published in several newspapers; one of which publications he had seen in a Baltimore paper (he believed it was the Commercial and Daily Advertiser) of the 26th of June, 1826, extracted from the Norfolk Beacon of the 24th June, which publication was made over the name of the French Consul, and gave all the particulars of the decree. The date of this publication, Mr. S. believed, was the very day on which it was received by our Government; so that they could have given no more publicity to it than they must have seen had been already done by an officer of the French Government.

Mr. S. said he knew it was the practice of the Government to publish our own laws, or those of a leading character; but he did not know whether it was, or was not, their practice to publish those of foreign Governments; he had, however, understood that such was not their practice; at any rate, it could not have been necessary in this case, seeing that it had already been done by an officer of the Government from which the act had emanated. Mr. S. said the Senator from New Hampshire had misapprehended the amount of duty on rice, in stating it to be 7 per cent. He would find it to be 7 francs per 100 kilogrammes, which is equal to 65½ cents per hundred weight, or about 20 to 25 per cent. on its prime cost; but, whatever may be the rates of duties, they are to be the same on importations in our vessels, as in those of France, which should satisfy us on this point. [Mr. S. here enumerated the kind and amount of the several articles exported to these colonies the last year, giving an aggregate amount of 900,000 dollars.] Mr. S. suggested to the Senate (without offering any amendment) that the proviso of the bill did not authorize the President to annul it, while any one of the privileges granted by the decree existed, or while any one of the articles enumerated in it, were admitted into the French islands.

Mr. WOODBURY remarked that he had inadvertently stated the duty on rice at 7 per cent. At 7 francs the hundred kilogrammes, it would amount to from 18 to 20 per cent.

Mr. BRANCH rejoined, that, with the highest respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SIMMONS] he very much questioned whether the Senator himself was satisfied with the reasons assigned for the suppression of this truly important information. For he now considers it to be our duty to pass the bill on your table, and thus place the trade of the two countries on the basis of equality. Had the gentleman been in possession of this information at the last session, would he not have considered it to have been his duty to have advocated the passage of a similar law then? Most assuredly he would; for all must admit that, if it is right and necessary to legislate now, it was equally so then. Why, then, has this ordinance, this new tariff of duties on the trade with Guadeloupe and Martinique, been withheld from the American Congress? Mr. President, the cause is but too apparent. Believe me, sir, the People of this country are too intelligent to be blinded in this way; a short retrospect will enable them to understand the policy and views of those at the head of our Government, and properly to appreciate their motives. The disclosure was calculated to reflect on themselves, and to throw their own conduct into discredit. Mr. Clay says that the French ordinance was published in some one or two of the newspapers of this country in 1826, which, however, no person that we know of, or the committee, could find, ever saw, or can now find. Admit it, however, to be true, is it a sufficient reason why the President of the United States should not have officially communicated the intelligence to both Houses of Congress? Is this the proper course for the Chief Magistrate to pursue? For an officer, whose constitutional and sworn duty it is to give all proper information, from time to time, to the Congress of the United States? No, sir, this cannot have been the true reason for withholding the facts from Congress. It is a mere subterfuge, disreputable to the American character. They have, by their own showing, said Mr. B., acted in a manner which merits the severe reprobation of the People of this country.

Mr. TAZEVELL would suggest to the Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. WOODBURY] who introduced the bill, of which he entirely approved, whether there was not some hazard that this bill, in its present shape, would repeal the construction which the Executive had given to the law regulating the commercial intercourse between this country and France herself. The Senate had seen, from a communication made by the Secretary of State, that, in the exercise of the discretion vested in the Treasury Department, on the arrival of some French vessels from France, via Martinique, doubts arose whether they were to be regarded as coming from France or from Martinique. There was a wide difference as to the duties to be paid in either case; but the proper officer of the customs had been directed to consider them as coming from France; thus placing them in the most favorable situation. Suppose, said Mr. T., a vessel bound from France to Martinique, with a cargo of claret, sells, on her arrival there, a part of her cargo, and with the balance arrives in the United States, will she, if this bill passes, be regarded any longer as a vessel from France or from Martinique? Might not the passage of this bill be regarded as confirming the Executive construction, and so subject such vessels to greater duties than are now imposed on our own vessels under similar circumstances, and thus subject our navigation to greater losses than any benefits to be derived from the bill would produce? Mr. T. thought the bill had better be so amended as to guard against such a possible result.

Mr. WOODBURY said that if the Senate saw fit to modify the bill so as to embrace the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, there could be no objection to it; although the operation of the terms of the convention between this country and France, which struck off one-fourth of the discriminating duty each year, rendered it a matter of no great importance.

Mr. HAYNE said, he rose merely to put a question to the chairman of the committee; he wished to know whether the French ordinance had not been repealed or modified? He would be glad to know if the committee had investigated the subject, and whether they were in possession of such information as would enable the chairman to state what was the fact in this respect. It was to him a matter of much regret, that a bill of this nature had not been passed a year ago, though he well knew that Congress had no information of the subject which would have enabled them to act. His constituents, he knew, had no such information. It was unfortunate that the Executive had not communicated the French ordinance to Congress. It would have been highly interesting to the people of the South, as the trade in rice alone would have been extremely valuable to them. It had been stated that, in consequence of the delay on the part of the American Government, in reciprocating the French ordinance, it had actually been repealed. Mr. H. wanted information on this subject.

Mr. WOODBURY, in answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, would give all the information in his power. He had a letter, as before observed, from the Secretary of State, which he would ask of the Secretary to read, by which it appeared that no information of any change in the French ordinance had reached the Department of State; and that application had been made to the French Chargé on that subject, who also had received no information of that kind.

[The Secretary here read the letter from the Secretary of State.]

Mr. W. would also remark that the second letter from the Secretary relates to a decision of our Government, as to French vessels touching at Guadeloupe and Martinique, on their voyage to this country; treating them as if coming directly from France; and that information had been received from Mr. Brown, our Minister in France, that the French Government has adopted the same construction as to the circuitous voyage of our vessels that we have concerning theirs.

Mr. TAZEVELL had no doubt of the correctness of the construction given to the convention with France by our Government, but, he said, if the passage of this bill will put French vessels coming from Martinique and Guadeloupe on a different footing than they were before, what would be the effect upon vessels coming to this country from either of those colonies, which vessels were originally from France, and had on board a cargo, or part of it, taken in in France? He might be wrong, but he merely threw out these suggestions, that gentlemen might avoid repealing, unintentionally, the construction given by the Executive to the law giving effect to the convention with France.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill, by inserting, in the fifth line, after the word "Islands," the words "or of France." The object of this amendment, Mr. S. said was apparent. He had understood that French vessels coming from France, via Martinique and Guadeloupe, have been admitted into our ports on the terms of the convention; and this being the case, why, said he, leave the matter to construction? Why not word your law so that it may be expressed? If the bill passes, and goes out to the world in its present shape, it will be considered that vessels coming here from the French colonies, originally from France, will be subject to alien duties; and France will then have cause to complain. Why not, said Mr. S., make the matter so plain as to be understood by every body? France, said he, employs very few colonial vessels: her colonial trade is principally carried on by vessels coming from old France, and touching at their colonies for cargoes, which they bring to our Southern ports. The French trade is very important to us; it had quadrupled itself since the convention was entered into. That convention, said Mr. S., was very odious to the French merchants, particularly to those of Bordeaux; for he believed himself warranted in asserting that, since our vessels had been admitted into the ports of France, on the same tonnage duties as French vessels, nine-tenths of the trade was in our hands. Sir, said Mr. S., a new administration has come into power in France: we do not know what their views are; but we do know that the views of Villele were of the most liberal kind. He was going on gradually to place the trade of the whole world on terms of the most fair and perfect reciprocity. He did not know, as he had just observed, what might be the policy of the new French Ministry but the merchants of Bordeaux were using every exertion to abrogate the convention. They say, that, since it was entered into, the Americans monopolize the whole trade.

Of all countries, said Mr. S., I wish to conciliate France. She is important to us in a political point of view—important to us in a commercial point of view. Our exchanges with her are highly advantageous, as she takes from us our cotton, tobacco, rice, and other staples, and, in return, we get from her many articles much cheaper than we can get them from England. From the view he had taken of the subject, he could not but hope that his amendment might prevail.

Why, said he, leave that to construction, which we can make express? Why not make our law such, that France may be perfectly satisfied?

Mr. McLANE said, that he was not very decided in his objections to the amendment, but he considered it not altogether consistent with the bill, and rather a departure from practice; and on those grounds he should be gratified if the mover would withdraw it. The bill was not framed with a view to the direct trade; and no provision that they could insert would affect the convention between this country and France. This bill is solely applied to the regulation of the colonial trade. The arrangement which was to be made by this amendment in relation to the direct trade, was, he considered, settled by treaty. Whether vessels coming from France, and touching at the colonies, should be admitted here, was not the question under discussion. The Government has already decided that their construction of the convention is favorable to their admission. On that subject, therefore, nothing could be done, and nothing was needed. It was already settled by treaty. If the French have this right, Congress could not prevent it. If they have not, it ought not to be given to them, and Congress ought not to interfere. Suppose that France were to put a different construction on the convention to-morrow, by which this privilege, granted to them by our Government, should be denied to us in return? We should then be bound by our law. We could not then control any unexpected act of the French Government, because we should have tied up the hands of our Executive by this bill. At present, the construction of the convention by our Government, was, that, if a vessel leaves part of her cargo at the islands, she may come here with the remainder, and her voyage is not considered as broken. But, if she takes in a new cargo, her voyage is broken, and she is not allowed to come here under the terms of the convention. If, however, the amendment were to be adopted, she may do so. Hence, the provisions of this bill, so amended, would interfere with the terms on which the direct trade has been settled between the two countries. He, Mr. McL., thought it would be unwise to do this. We were proceeding gradually in the adjustment of our trade with France, with whom we now have a fair understanding. He thought, therefore, that nothing ought to be done which would confuse or interfere with that perfect arrangement of the intercourse on fair and reciprocal principles. These were briefly the views which induced him to wish that the amendment might not be adopted.

Mr. WOODBURY had no objection to introduce into the bill the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, if it could be believed necessary. It would not, in all probability, apply to half a dozen cases a year; and, moreover, he thought that the convention would now be sufficient, under the construction given to it, to provide for such part of the cargo of French vessels as may come from France, and the bill to such part as may come from the colonies. While, if the amendment was in fact adopted, it would extend the operation of the bill from the colonies to France proper, and lessen the present duties on both tonnage and cargoes coming from the mother country.

Mr. SILSBEE said, that the bill, as reported by the Committee not only fully reciprocated all that was granted by the French decree, but went even a little further. That decree did not permit the importation into Martinique and Guadaloupe, of all our products, but an enumerated list of them, from which flour and some other articles were excluded; whereas the bill now under consideration permits the importation into this country, from those Colonies, of any and all their produce which may be permitted to be brought here from thence, in their vessels. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland will authorize the importation from thence, of any of the produce and manufactures of France which may have been previously deposited there, which will be giving to these Colonies, and without equivalent, greater privileges than are enjoyed either by France or England, under the existing treaties with them. The produce of these French Colonies cannot be imported into this country from France, yet, if this amendment prevails, the produce and manufactures of France may be imported from these Colonies; this was, Mr. S. believed, what never had been done by this Government, except under treaty stipulation and for a fair equivalent. Mr. S. said, that he had understood that our trade with France was probably now the subject of negotiation between the two Governments; and, said Mr. S. would it be wise or sound policy to interpose a measure like this, and thereby derange the progress of negotiations? It has just been said that a leading object with France, in her trade with this country, is to get her produce and manufactures into this country on favorable terms: if this be the case, the proposed amendment would give to the French Government a great advantage in negotiations which may now be pending. It might give to France all that she wanted. And it was certainly bad policy, when we were endeavouring to make an advantageous arrangement, to make such an offer in advance, without knowing whether any equivalent would be received for it. France may say, we have already a right of introducing our produce and manufactures into the United States, through the Colonies, and therefore do not wish to negotiate on that subject. The possibility of interrupting an arrangement which could be made so much more satisfactorily by treaty than by legislation, ought to be avoided.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. said, that the argument of the gentleman from Delaware had considerable weight. The gentleman from Massachusetts says, that, if we adopt this amendment, we shall give up something which might otherwise obtain an equivalent. There seems to be a conflict of opinion between the two gentlemen, in this respect.

Mr. SILSBEE said, there was no conflict of opinion. We allow French vessels the carrying trade, circuitously. They have it by treaty. And, if we give it them, by this bill, they will have it in a two-fold manner. It had been construed by our Government that the Convention allowed French vessels to come here, from France, by way of the Colonies, and bring such parts of their original cargoes from France as had not been landed in the Colonies. This amendment went so much farther, as to allow them to bring from the Colonies such of the productions and manufactures of France as had been landed in the Colonies, which Mr. S. trusted would not be sanctioned by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is unnecessary, and is confounding two things, which are entirely distinct in their nature. The bill was carefully prepared by the Committee, with a perfect knowledge of the whole subject, and it embraces every thing proper to meet the terms of the French Ordinance.

The direct trade between this country and France is regulated by a Convention, and it has been settled that the vessels of either may touch at any colonial or foreign port for information, without a deviation from the direct voyage. But, if a French vessel touches at the colonies, and breaks bulk, it is a deviation, because the French Colonies are excluded from the operation of the Convention; but this trade will fall within the operation of this bill. It is, therefore, unnecessary to connect what properly belongs to the construction of the Convention, with the regulations of the Colonial Trade.

This ordinance is temporary in its character—it is revocable at the will of the sovereign; and we have had no evidence that it was intended to be permanent. There can be no indisposition in this Government to reciprocate the terms of it. But the gentleman from Maryland is entirely mistaken in his views of France, in passing this regulation. Navigation is not the object of France. She knows that she cannot contend with us. It is trade—the exchange of productions, to which she looks. The gentleman says we have nine-tenths of the carrying trade since the operation of the convention; and then says, France had the interest of her navigation in view, in passing the ordinance, which is to equalize the duties. It is true, as the gentleman says—the trade has vastly increased; and it is this increasing trade—not navigation—that induced her to promulgate this ordinance. France, feeling that we have some advantages in navigation, requires of us other commercial advantages, as an equivalent; and now the gentleman urges the passage of this bill, as an object of great importance, to conciliate the shipping interest of France. Sir, France wants our markets. Her object is, to get from us what she wants, in exchange for what she can give us. She knows, that the moment the duties are equalized, our national advantages will give us the carrying. She finds her advantage and her equivalent in the valuable and increasing trade. The shipping interest will not be conciliated by this bill. What can they anticipate from the operation of a principle which the gentleman says they are dissatisfied with, and which, he adds, gives us nine-tenths of the carrying trade?

[SENATE.]

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, if the gentleman would desist, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON said, that the amendment was of little consequence. He had risen to reply to the gentleman who had preceded him.

The CHAIR said the amendment was under consideration, and the gentleman would confine himself to it.

Mr. JOHNSTON said, he was aware that the amendment was under discussion—but it was impossible to speak to the amendment, or to reply to the gentleman from Maryland, without taking the bill into consideration.

The CHAIR again remarked, that the amendment was before the Senate, and said that, if the gentleman from Louisiana would give way, the mover would withdraw it.

Mr. JOHNSTON said, he was not sensible of being out of order. He had risen chiefly to reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, who had been indulged in very free remarks upon the conduct of the Administration. Mr. JOHNSTON then gave way, and took his seat.

The CHAIR said, the order of debate had been rigidly adhered to, until the gentleman from Louisiana rose. He hoped the Senate would sustain him in keeping order.

The amendment was then withdrawn, and the question on ordering to be engrossed, being stated by the chair,

Mr. JOHNSTON again took the floor, and said, I presume the bill is now open for discussion. There is no difference of opinion with regard to the bill; but the occasion has been seized on to assail the conduct of a co-ordinate branch of the Government. It is easy to make general charges of gross negligence, and to employ rude and offensive language, without knowing what has been done by the President, what are the existing relations of the two countries, or waiting for any explanation. He is charged with neglect, gross neglect, of the public interest, and even his motives are impugned, in not submitting this subject to Congress, although the regulation of the whole commerce and navigation of the two countries is now under advisement, with a view to a definitive treaty. I am not at liberty to expose here, even for his defence, the state of our relations. I may say that some time before the equalization of duties took effect, a correspondence was opened on the part of France, to discuss the terms, and adjust the principles of a permanent arrangement, embracing all the interests of both. The events which have occurred in France, the change of Ministry, and some differences of opinion, and remaining prejudices, have unexpectedly delayed the completion of the object so much desired by all parties; but the delay has occurred on their part, not on ours. She has not complained of neglect or inattention. She is not dissatisfied. She knows our terms and our principles; it requires only her concurrence; but she is not yet ready to enter into the definitive treaty; and several minor points, though of great importance, must be settled at the same time. It may appear, hereafter, that the President, instead of charges of gross neglect, has deserved the thanks of the country.

He is charged with our foreign relations, and I have no doubt is as anxious and as honest in the pursuit of the public interest as we are. He has every motive to conduct our affairs with the greatest care and ability, and to bring them to a speedy and successful issue. We cannot see the difficulties which the negotiation presents, or the causes which embarrass or suspend it. We must repose confidence where the Constitution has reposed power. If this subject has not been submitted to Congress, it is because it was thought that the whole question of our relations would, before this time, have been adjusted by treaty, and because this particular subject has not given rise to the least difficulty, and did not require a separate arrangement.

I will endeavor to place this subject fairly before the Senate, and to reply to the objections and charges which have been made.

A treaty was made with France, in June, 1822, to go into operation the 1st of October, of that year, to regulate the commerce of the two countries. It is said in the preamble, to be "a temporary Convention," "leading to a more permanent and comprehensive arrangement." A discrimination is made between the vessels of the two countries. The articles of the United States, carried in American vessels, were to pay an additional duty, not exceeding twenty francs per ton of merchandise, over and above the duties paid on like articles of the United States imported in French vessels; and articles of France, imported into the United States in French vessels, were to pay not exceeding three dollars and seventy-five cents per ton of merchandise, over and above what was paid by American vessels. This temporary Convention was to be in force for two years, and after that time, until the conclusion of a definitive treaty, or until one of the parties had declared its intention (for six months) to renounce it. It was moreover stipulated, that, if the treaty was continued after the two years, these additional discriminating duties should be diminished one fourth every year, until they were equalized. This Convention was made temporary, in order to enable France to try the experiment of the equalization of duties upon her commerce and navigation; so that, when the effect was seen, she might make a permanent arrangement. This Convention did not include the French Colonies.

This ordinance of the King of France, for the regulation of the Colonies, is a general law, not made with particular reference to us, but passed about eight months after the British act of Parliament, and no doubt in consequence of their opening their Colonial ports—either with a view to meet the terms of the British act, or to place themselves upon an equality. These British and French Colonies are in direct competition with each other; they produce the same articles, seek the same markets, and require the same supplies. If Great Britain, therefore, had placed herself in a better situation, by the removal of duties, it seemed to follow, as a necessary consequence, that France must do the same. This ordinance was intended to place her colonies upon that equality. It was not communicated to our Minister in Paris; it was not made the ground of any application when presented here. It was handed to us in June, 1826, as something which might be acceptable. This ordinance is in its nature temporary, liable to be changed at any time, and there has been no pledge to us that it is permanent. But, if it was their intention to regulate, upon equal and fixed principles, the Colonial trade, they knew that our Minister was at all times authorized to make a Convention, either temporary or definitive, embracing either the whole trade or the Colonial trade. They knew that the Secretary of State was at all times ready to extend the terms of the temporary convention with France to the Colonies—but they are not yet prepared to make any permanent arrangement on the subject. In the mean time, France has been investigating the effect and operation of the reciprocity established by the convention; she has not yet proposed to treat definitively, perhaps in consequence of the changes that have taken place there; and when she does, the whole subject will be regulated by treaty. As she has permitted this ordinance to stand for some time, and has declared no intention to change it, and as she appears willing, for the present, to acquiesce in the terms of the convention, and is not ready to treat permanently on the Colonial trade, it appears very proper to meet the terms of the ordinance, by an act of Congress, giving the power to the President to revoke the act when they revoke the ordinance.

On the 27th March, 1827, after the adjournment of Congress, the French Minister, in discussing another subject, referred to this Ordinance as an evidence of the liberal spirit of his Government; and although he did not demand of us any act in relation to the Colonies, yet the President would have acted in conformity with our general principles, if he had had the power; but the act of 1824 did not confer that power. Immediately after, to wit, in May last, a correspondence was opened with regard to the Convention, in which the views of the French Government are disclosed, and in which we express a willingness to receive and discuss, in a friendly spirit, any overture she may choose to make. The equalization of duties under the Convention took place in October last. We stand ready to renew the Convention, and to extend its terms to the Colonies. Expecting something to be done definitive with regard to the regulation of our commerce, the President, having full power to arrange the whole subject by treaty, has not recommended it to Congress. Both parties have it now in their power to put an end to the Convention in six months, and this ordinance may be revoked at any time. Is it not better that such great interests, involving a trade of ten millions a year, should be permanently fixed by a definitive Convention, than left in this unsettled state? But, as France is not yet prepared, it may be well to pass this law, although the gentlemen are entirely mistaken with regard to the effect of it upon French navigation, as well as the interest they suppose the French Government take in it.

The gentleman from Maryland misconceives the views and interests of France. He supposes her object to be the removal of the discriminating duties, to obtain a fair portion of the carrying trade; while we all know that she has reluctantly consented to the graduated reduction and final abolition of the duties, as an experiment, in order to prepare for a permanent arrangement. She feels her inability to compete with us in navigation. She declares that her inequality is such, that it operates as a virtual surrender of the carrying trade to us. She founds upon this fact, a claim which she has long urged, for other equivalents favoring her commerce. France, as well as England) wants our markets—they are highly important, if not indispensable to them. They have both consented to a free trade, upon terms of reciprocity; that is, an equalization of duties upon the vessels and cargoes of both countries. We do four-fifths of this carrying trade. It is a question with both, how far they can give up the interests of navigation to their other great interests. France, in passing this ordinance, was not moved by the advantages of her navigation. We have paid heretofore the discriminating duty in the colonies, and yet, under that disadvantage, we had four-fifths of the carrying trade. Does the gentleman suppose, that, now it is removed, we shall have any less, or that French vessels will have more? Or does he imagine that this ordinance originated in any views to her navigation? France saw that she required a million of dollars a year for the necessary supplies of her colonies, which she could obtain no where else so cheap. She saw, that, under the discrimination, we carried those supplies to her, and that the only operation of it was to increase so much the price of provisions and lumber to the colonists. It did not affect us. Her object is to sell, in the United States, the productions of her colonies; and it is trade (the exchange of productions) which she desires by the ordinance—not the navigation. If navigation had been her object, she would at once have asked for the removal of our duties. The gentleman says, that, since the equalization of duties under the convention, the trade has greatly increased.

That is true; and it is because it does increase her trade, (which is the great object of rivalry with commercial nations,) that she consents to adopt a policy which she feels injurious to another great interest. It is her equivalent. It is a question between her great interests, all of which she is anxious to protect and foster. Her agriculture and manufactures are both interested in the trade with this country. We take her wines and silks; we have discriminated in favor of the latter article. We have a valuable and increasing trade in her productions—and if we do obtain a larger share of the navigation, from particular causes, she obtains a fair equivalent. The whole navigation employed with Gaudaloupe and Martinique does not exceed 75,000 tons. This bill will not produce any sensible effect upon the French navigation. It has not excited the least solicitude; and if the gentlemen had not, in their own peculiar language, dragged this ordinance to light, we should never have heard of it from them. The whole subject would have been embraced by the definitive arrangement, and our commerce placed upon fixed principles.

The gentlemen have seized upon this occasion to charge upon the Administration gross neglect of the public interest, and from which, they tell us, will result the entire loss of the trade. It is said, the ordinance was not printed, and has not been met, and that it is revoked, &c. &c. I have explained what I understand to be the motives of the French Government in passing the ordinance, and the views and intentions of our Government. The Constitution has vested the President with the power of all diplomatic intercourse, and he is the official organ of the Government in all negotiations, and is responsible for the performance of his duties. Our affairs with France, so far as regards commerce, are on the most amicable footing—both are desirous of establishing their relations upon equal and just principles; and, while they are discussing the terms of a permanent and definitive arrangement of the whole subject, we interfere in a separate branch of the discussion, without knowing the claims of France upon us, or the terms or equivalents which she demands, and arm her with additional motives and arguments to adhere to her pretensions. She will not fail to see, and to avail herself of, any benefit she may derive from the feeling she may see displayed here.

The ordinance was published by order of the French Consul, both in Norfolk and Baltimore, and was it necessary for the Government to order its republication? The subject would have been brought before Congress at the last session, but that France evidenced a disposition to discuss it, preparatory to a final arrangement, which it was not doubted would result in a definitive and permanent adjustment of all the points depending between the two countries, in a form more acceptable to France.

Mr. HARRISON said, that, as there appeared to be some difference in opinion between commercial gentlemen, as to the operation of the amendment, it would be better to lay the bill on the table, in order that they might have a right reflection before the matter was finally acted on.

Mr. HAYNE had but one or two remarks to make. He should suppose that the very fact of our being about to pass this law now, furnished a sufficient reason why we should have passed it a year ago, if we had then possessed the information we have now. The gentleman from Louisiana says, that the French Government, in issuing this ordinance, had acted with regard, only, to its own interests; but, said Mr. H. can there be a doubt that the duties on American produce, carried into the French islands in American vessels, have been reduced in a manner highly favorable to us? Can it be doubted, that such reduction of duties on American tonnage was calculated to benefit the American farmer and ship-owner? And, farther, can there be a doubt, if we do not reciprocate, that we will be holding out an inducement to the French Government to rescind the ordinance? He must say, that it was unfortunate—he would use no harsher term, in this debate, than unfortunate—that this matter had not been laid before Congress by the Executive, and that a bill, meeting the liberal views of the French Government, had not been passed a year ago. He took it to be the true, he might say, the settled policy of this country, to reciprocate every act of foreign Governments, which had a tendency to put our commercial intercourse on a more liberal footing. This we had done, in some instances, by treaties, and in others by legislation. He took it for granted, that the French Government, in issuing this ordinance, had been influenced by a due regard to their own interests, but it by no means followed that they would adhere to the policy of imposing low duties on our produce, if we persevered in imposing high duties upon theirs. There was no fact in this case to shew (as the gentleman from Louisiana had contended) that the French ordinance was merely temporary, or that it was not expected of us to reciprocate it. If it has continued unrepealed to this day, notwithstanding our omission to take the smallest notice of it, we might well regard it as a permanent regulation; but if it had been temporary, the reason would only be strengthened, why we should have reciprocated it without delay.

Mr. H. said, he had no doubt, that, under this ordinance, a valuable and increasing trade would have been carried on to the French Islands, if its existence had been known to the People at large. The specific duties upon Rice would not, according to his calculation, have amounted to more than from 15 to 25 per cent. ad valorem—a duty much lower than was paid elsewhere, on that article. He still hoped, if the French Government continued to leave this trade open, that the Rice Planter would be benefited by it. And, (if it was not already too late,) he had no doubt that the passage of this bill would have a decided influence in producing this happy result.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, the gentleman had not done justice to his argument. I said the ordinance was revokable at pleasure, but if the French Government wished to make it permanent, we were at all times ready to fix the Colonial trade on the same terms as the Convention. The expectation that a definitive treaty would have been signed before this time, the negotiation of which had been opened by the French Minister, which would have embraced the regulation of the whole subject, had prevented the reference of this particular point to Congress. But as some delay has occurred, and as France acquiesces, in the mean time, in the Convention, and continues the ordinance, I think we had better meet the terms of it, more especially as the subject is now before us. But it will not have the slightest effect upon French navigation, or increase the extent of our trade with the Colonies. They require about a million a year in provisions and lumber. The trade is limited to a supply of the articles which we are permitted to carry for their yearly consumption. The removal of the discriminating duty will not increase their wants, nor affect the amount of the trade, nor enhance the price of the articles.

Mr. WOODBURY hoped that the question would be taken to-night; no diversity of opinion prevailed, he believed, as to the merits of the bill; and to preserve the present privileges of the ordinance, it might be essential to meet them the present session. As to the nature of the ordinance itself, if he thought, with the gentleman from Louisiana, that it was of so changeable and transient a character, he surely would be unwilling to pass the bill at all. But, so far from this, that gentleman, if he examined and reflected a moment longer, would see that the ordinance was not a temporary one by the Governor of the French Islands, but made by the King of France, who, as regards the Colonies, can regulate their commerce as perfectly as the whole Government at home can the Government of France proper. An ordinance like this, by him, has the same force and permanency as an act of Congress has here.

Beside the structure of the Government indicating this, the ordinance itself, in the preamble, declares that it is made "to extend and facilitate their commercial regulations in every thing that is not contrary to the interests of the mother country," and thus manifesting, beyond doubt, that its provisions were meant to be durable. In the 14th article, it virtually inhibits all those temporary ordinances by the Colonial Governors, except as to flour alone; and as to that, allows them only "when-ever imperious and extraordinary circumstances" shall require more relaxation. Mr. W. said he did not choose, on this occasion, to enter into any political controversy, as to the course which had been pursued by the Cabinet in relation to this ordinance; but it was his duty to give the Senate all the facts within his knowledge. So far, then, from the impression of the member from Louisiana being correct, that nothing had ever been expected by the French Government, or its representative here, in return or in consequence of this ordinance—he would ask the indulgence of the Senate, to read a single sentence from a letter of the French Minister to the Secretary of State, dated in March, 1827. After referring to this ordinance, and the liberal temper shown by it, on the part of France, he observes, "I must find, in this disposition, a motive on which to ground my claim to a reciprocity in favor of French vessels coming from the colonies."

Mr. TAZEVELL said he should not vote for this bill, but for the proviso which it contained. This would enable the Executive to meet the contingency of the French Government repealing its ordinance. He had information, upon which he entirely relied, that, at this very moment such a contingency had probably occurred. Should this prove to be the case, it was necessary that our regulations should conform to those established by France in reference to this subject; and the power to produce such a conformity on our part, was given to the Executive by this proviso.

The event, which the intelligence he had referred to, rendered so probable, (a change of the policy of France since the promulgation of this ordinance,) had occasioned him to reflect upon the causes which might have contributed to its production; and amongst these causes he could see none so probable, as the inattention of the United States during so long a period, to meet the overtures made to us by France in this ordinance. The history of the transaction, as he understood it, was this:

In the Summer of 1823, Great Britain, not having concluded any satisfactory arrangement with the United States, in relation to her colonial trade, passed a law, whereby the ports of her colonies were closed, after a certain day, to any nation who did not reciprocate with her the provisions of that law, and opening them to any nation who should do so. The Executive of the United States, although in possession of this act of Parliament, failed to submit it to Congress, as he ought to have done. In consequence of this, the time limited by the act expired without any reciprocal aid being passed by us. Great Britain then finding herself in a different situation from that which she had before occupied in relation to the United States, gave effect to her own statute, and her West Indian ports were so closed to the vessels of the United States.

French Colonial Trade.

France acted with more discretion; and, in February, 1826, adopted this ordinance, by which the British act of Parliament is reciprocated by her. The effect of this ordinance, however, is, to open the ports therein mentioned to the vessels of any nation. The United States, therefore, might have entitled themselves to its benefits as well as any other Power. To enable, as well as to induce them to do so, in June, 1826, the Baron de Mareuil, the French Minister at Washington, communicated this ordinance to our Government. This Minister, afterwards, expressed to our Secretary of State a wish, which the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce has read from the despatch containing it, that the liberal provisions of this ordinance should be reciprocated by us.

But the President of the United States, although warned of the consequences of improper delay, in the memorable example to which reference has been made, omitted to communicate this ordinance to Congress, either at the session which commenced in 1826, or at the present session—nor was the important intelligence which this ordinance contains ever communicated to the People of the United States, until the document itself was dragged from the port folio of the Secretary of State, by the resolutions offered by the Senator from Maryland, demanding information in relation to this subject.

Such is the history of this transaction. From this, it will appear, that, if France, after the official communications she has made, and after waiting for nearly two years for an act of reciprocity on our part, has already regarded, or shall hereafter consider, the silence of this Government as evidence of an indisposition to reciprocate her policy, and shall therefore change that policy as to the United States, we must ascribe any injury that may result to us from such a change, to the gross neglect of our own Executive. He might be considered, perhaps, as using strong language, but he thought the evidence before the Senate abundantly justified what he had said, that nothing but the most inexcusable negligence could have produced the state of things which he believed now existed.

It had been said, by way of apology for the delay of the Executive, in not communicating this act of the French Government, that it was but a mere Royal Ordinance, revocable at the will of the sovereign who uttered it, and therefore but of temporary duration. That it was not the annunciation of any principle of permanent policy on the part of France, but a mere experiment, instituted by her for her own benefit exclusively, without regard to that of the United States. Different nations, said Mr. T., regulate their commerce by different means. Here we do so by statutes enacted by Congress. In England they do so partly by acts of Parliament, and partly by orders in Council. And in France, formerly they did so only by Royal orders, which we term ordinances. In either case, however, the regulation is effected by the proper authority, and in the customary mode. It is true, a change has lately taken place in the Government of France, by which the relations of the sovereign to his subjects are varied somewhat: but this change, so far as his ancient power to regulate commerce is involved, does not extend to the colonies of France. The present King has precisely the same control over the commerce of his colonies, that was exercised by any of his predecessors; and he regulates that commerce now in the same mode in which it was regulated by Louis XVI. that is, by Royal ordinances, such as that now before the Senate. These ordinances, it is true, are revocable at the pleasure of him by whom they are ordained; and so are our statutes, and the acts of the British Parliament. But, when any of these do not define the time during which they are to remain in force, the mere fact that they may be abrogated by the power which created them, does not justify us in considering them as temporary regulations. Whatever may be the principles they announced, these must be regarded as permanent principles. Like most other acts of municipal power, they are doubtless intended only for the benefit of the People upon whom they are to act. The interest of France and the United States, may, however, chance to coincide in some particulars, as in this case; and when they do so, it is but a poor apology the Executive offers to the People of the United States, when he says, that France, by her ordinance, intended to promote her own interest, and not ours, and therefore he did not communicate such an act to Congress.

It has been said, again, that this ordinance was not promulgated by the Executive, because its substance had been published by the French Consul in one of our newspapers, (the Norfolk Beacon) from whence it had been copied into some other Gazette, printed in Baltimore; and therefore, the Executive had a right to suppose that the fact of the existence, and contents of this ordinance were generally known. Mr. T. said, he could not deny the fact of such a publication being made in the Norfolk Beacon, because, although a resident of the town, where this little paper was published, he very seldom saw it; and it was among the last sources to which he should think of applying for information for important events like this. Without meaning to contradict those, however, who asserted that such a publication had been there made, he would observe, that all those in Norfolk who were most interested in this trade, were as ignorant of the fact as he was himself. That the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] had stated, that the merchants of Baltimore, as well as himself, were uninformed of such a publication, although it is stated to have been transferred from the Norfolk paper to some other in Baltimore. That the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce [Mr. WOODBURY] had informed the Senate, that, after diligent inquiry, made both in Philadelphia and New York, no intelligence of such a publication having been made, in either of those great cities, have been obtained; and that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SILSBEE] who had informed the Senate of the existence of such a publication, and who was himself a merchant of high standing, and extensive information, had also stated, that even he had never heard of such a publication, or of the facts which it is said to announce, until he came here during the present session. Grant, then, this fact of publication as it is stated—can any one believe, that the publication of the substance of an important foreign ordinance, made by some subordinate foreign agent, in a little provincial newspaper, published in a corner of the United States, and of very limited circulation, even in the place where it is published, which publication has not been afterwards generally diffused through the best part of our commercial world, can constitute any excuse for the Executive, in not communicating to Congress an authentic copy of an important foreign ordinance, which he had received directly from the Minister of the nation that had adopted it, with a request that its provisions should be reciprocated by our own legislative enactments?

It has been said, that the subject was not of sufficient importance to require such a communication to be made. The annual amount of the trade upon which this ordinance may act, which is not less than a million of dollars, and is increasing; in the speed in which the Senate began to act upon the subject, so soon as they had extracted the requisite information from the bureau of State, and the unanimity with which this bill will pass into a law; all combine to prove, that the subject is one of high importance; and should the benefits which are expected to result from this measure be lost, by the culpable neglect of the Executive, in not sooner giving us this information, the importance of the subject will then, perhaps, be seen in its true light. How we lost the trade with the British West India Colonies we all know. This loss rendered that with the French Islands of much more importance than it was before. And should we now be deprived of this, too, by the same means, those who are interested in the trade (and all are so interested) will not, and ought not, to be satisfied with the authors of such mischiefs.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, the gentleman from Virginia labors under an error with regard to the revocation of the French ordinance. The gentleman says, he received a letter from a respectable mercantile house in Norfolk, which informed him that this ordinance had been revoked, and adds, (I presume an inference of his own mind) "in consequence of our Government not having met the terms of this ordinance." The gentleman has done me the favor to shew me the letter; it stated that they had heard that the ordinance was revoked, but it did not state, in consequence of not having been reciprocated by our Government. I immediately applied to the French Minister; he said he had no such information; that none such had been received by the Consul; and that the report was without foundation. I applied to the Department of State; I was informed that no such information had been received from our Minister in Paris, or the Consuls in the Islands. The information is, no doubt, erroneous. If it was true, will the gentleman urge that as a reason for the passage of a bill to meet the terms of an ordinance after it is revoked? Suppose it was revoked, we should only pay the duty as before, which, at most, is only a tax on those who consume the articles.

Now, with regard to the printing of this ordinance, one gentleman says, he cannot learn that it has been printed; another holds it up, and says, it was printed in a small paper at Norfolk; and the gentleman who lives in that city, says he never heard of it. The gentleman from Maryland declares that he never saw it, and that a respectable merchant of Baltimore informs him that he never heard of it. Now it happens that this ordinance was published in both of those cities; and would the gentlemen have been more likely to have seen this ordinance if it had been published there by order of the Government? The truth is, it was not considered of sufficient importance to be extensively republished; it did not attract attention, or even excite conversation. But, could any merchant engaged in that trade be ignorant of the fact, that there were no discriminating duties?

One word more of explanation with regard to the printing. The Secretary of State had ordered a translation of the ordinance; the clerk brought him a translation, already published in the newspapers, by order of the French Consul. He, therefore, considered it unnecessary to order its publication.

I regret that the zeal of gentlemen has dragged this subject before the Senate. Whatever they may think, the sentiments uttered here will have an effect upon the negotiation. The interference was unnecessary and uncalled for. The bill ought now to pass, but I regret the discussion. The remarks of the gentleman from Maryland may be true, but I think it injudicious to express them here; they will make an impression elsewhere, and strengthen the pretensions of France.

It is undoubtedly true, as the gentleman says, the shipping interest in France was opposed, from their early prejudices, to the removal of the discriminating duties under the Convention, and they may resist, but without effect, the renewal of the treaty. But this bill will not satisfy them. It is a question between her great interests. She wants the trade—the market of this country, and our raw materials; and it is a question of the shipping interest against all the other interests: and, besides, the system of discrimination will not give the carrying trade to her ships. She loses nothing by the abolition of duties, and gains immensely in her commerce.

The gentleman says the trade has greatly increased. That is true; and France knows and feels that it is the value of this increasing trade, that constitutes the real motive for the Convention; and it is her equivalent for any advantage we may have in the navigation. We have a trade of ten millions, which both parties are desirous to extend—we have discriminated in favor of their silks—we may probably reduce the duties on wines; they will, perhaps do the same in favor of our cottons, and enlarge considerably the list of articles to be received from us in the Colonies—especially, pork, bacon, lard, and perhaps flour. The most amicable dispositions exist between the two countries, and every thing will be done to equalize the advantages. When the terms of a definitive treaty can be discussed, a Convention mutually beneficial, embracing the Colonies, and every great interest, will be concluded.

Sir, in passing this ordinance, France had not her navigation in view. If she had asked it, we should, at any time, have reciprocated it. But the President thought the whole points in discussion would have been, before this time, fully and finally settled.

I see no neglect in the publication—no necessity for laying the subject before Congress; which he had the power to adjust in a much better mode, and expected to have concluded in a manner more acceptable to France herself.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he should have taken the same ground as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] had he not been anticipated by him. The French law might have been published in Baltimore, though he assured the gentleman he had never heard of it. He had written to his friend, Mr. McKim, of Baltimore, as active and intelligent a merchant as could be found any where, and he was answered, that he [Mr. McKim] was equally ignorant of the existence of the French law.

Mr. MACON said, that the publication of the French ordinance at Norfolk and at Baltimore did not give it that credit to which it would have been entitled had it been published here, in papers which have extensive circulation, and which are authorized to publish the laws of the United States; especially had it been said that the information was communicated by the Department of State. It was natural to suppose that at the obscurity of the papers in which it was published, rendered the information doubtful.

[The question being then taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, it was determined in the affirmative; and the next day the bill was read the third time, passed, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.]

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1828.

WESTERN COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

The bill to authorize the collection of customs in Louisville, in Kentucky, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Cincinnati, Ohio, was read a second time, and explained by Mr. WOODBURY.

Mr. EATON moved to insert Nashville, Tennessee. Agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON moved to insert, in the place of 150 dollars, (the salary of the surveyor at each of the ports,) 300 dollars. Rejected.

The bill was then reported to the Senate.

Mr. FOOT said, this bill proposed an entirely new system. On the arrival of vessels at New Orleans, the cargoes must be discharged; and it was a question with him whether it would not lead to impositions on the customs. If it was guarded in this respect, he had no objection to the bill.

Mr. SILSBEE said, it was true, the bill proposed a new system. It was hard, however, that the merchants of the interior should be obliged to pay to agents in New Orleans a per centage on the importation of goods which they might as well import for themselves. There would be no danger that the bill would cause frauds on the revenue. The merchant was to have his bond at New Orleans, previous to the arrival of the goods. The Government would thus be secure, and the only question was, whether the sureties were good.

Mr. FOOT said it would certainly be an accommodation to the merchants of the interior. The same inconvenience was experienced by the merchants of Connecticut, who paid their bonds at New York, instead of their own ports. But he thought it the policy of the Government, that the duties should be paid where the cargoes were broken. The merchants of Connecticut would be pleased with a similar provision, but they never supposed that the Government would run the risk of encouraging smuggling by such a change. If, however, there would be no danger of such a result, he had no objection to the bill.

Mr. SILSBEE said, that all goods under this bill would be bonded in New Orleans, and the duties would be paid there.

Mr. FOOT remarked, that his only objection applied to the breaking of the cargoes at New Orleans, by which smuggling and fraud might be introduced.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, spoke at some length in support of the bill. He did not think that it would alter the revenue law in any particular.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, saw no reason to suppose that this bill would increase smuggling. The surveyors, he thought, should be men of respectability, and they could not be engaged for the salary of 150 dollars. He therefore moved that the sum of 250 dollars be substituted; which was agreed to, 18 to 12.

The bill was further briefly discussed by Messrs. WOODBURY and FOOT; when it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The unfinished business of Friday was then taken up, being the bill to graduate the prices of public lands, Mr. HENDRICKS' amendment still pending.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said that nothing but a deep conviction of the importance of the subject now before them, could justify him in occupying the time of the Senate, after the luminous remarks of the Senator who introduced the bill, [Mr. BAXTON] and others who have so ably supported it. The great object of legislation is the happiness of the People; and a measure calculated to give every man a home of his own, and without diminishing the resources of his neighbor, should find an advocate in every patriot and philanthropist. It is a measure, said Mr. J., which is calculated to strengthen the sentiment which unites the citizen to his Government and to his country. The interest which it involves is not merely local. The most needy from every State in the Union will enjoy its benefits; and my own constituents being contiguous to the States and Territories in which these lands lie, have a claim on my efforts to advocate the measure. It is not from a desire to be heard, for it is with great reluctance that I venture to tax your patience, but it is in the discharge of that claim that I presume to give my views; not in detail, but in some general remarks, which I hope may be the less tedious upon a subject so exhausted, and yet so inexhaustible.

If I mistake not, about eight States and Territories have memorialized Congress, by their Legislatures, upon the subject of this graduation in the price of the public lands; and, in addition to those, numerous petitions have been presented from the citizens of several of these States, calling for the same measure. The deep solicitude thus manifested by so respectable a portion of this confederacy, calls for a rigid investigation of the subject. The interest which this proposition has excited, is prima facie evidence of its correctness. I am aware that it has been imputed to selfishness on the part of the new States and Territories. There is scarcely a measure of the Government, however national in its character, but what is more immediately interesting to one particular section of the country than to another; and the charge of selfishness would lie with equal propriety against that section. If a harbor is fortified, or even a light-house erected, the vicinity of its location is more immediately benefitted by it, than places remote from its establishment; yet the measure is national, and no person envies the neighborhood that receives more immediate benefit, nor charges its representative with selfishness in advocating the measure. Upon the most thorough investigation which I have been able to give of this subject; in viewing its bearings upon the whole country; in regarding its intrinsic merits, and the universal diffusion of its benefits, I am compelled to pronounce it a national measure, divested of the character of selfishness.

This Government, for upwards of forty years, has been the proprietor of extensive domains; and during the same period, these domains have every year occupied much of the time of Congress. For the disposal of these lands, Congress have, at different times, adopted three different systems. The first exposed the lands to sale for one dollar per acre, payable in certificates of stock of the national debt. This system continued for about fifteen years, and was abandoned. It had been resorted to as a convenient method of sinking the national debt, but proved abortive. The next system was that of credit. The minimum price was fixed at two dollars per acre; and, on the payment of one-fourth of the purchase money, a credit was given upon the residuary of two, three, and four years, without interest, and extended to five years with interest. Under this system debts were incurred by individuals to the Government, which increased from year to year, till they amounted to the enormous sum of twenty millions of dollars. It was then perfectly obvious that the payment of this large amount within five years, was utterly impossible; and an attempt to enforce it would ruin thousands of families of the most meritorious, because the most industrious and enterprising of our citizens, and without benefitting the public. Relief was very properly provided, by permitting each one to retain what he had actually paid for, and relinquish the remainder. The defects of the system having been thus demonstrated, it was abandoned. The present system was then adopted, which reduces the minimum price of the public lands to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and requires the money to be paid in hand. The operation of this system, though more beneficial than either of the others, is still defective. It leaves many families destitute of a home, because, without land on which to raise the means, they are unable to purchase at the present rate, while so many millions of acres lie waste, inviting them to labor, and promising them an ample reward.

The bill before us proposes to graduate the price, as to reduce it after next November to one dollar per acre; after a lapse of two years from that time, to seventy-five cents; and thus continuing a reduction of twenty-five cents every two years, till it shall sink to twenty-five cents per acre; and then to give to the actual settler the privilege of purchasing a quarter section of one hundred and sixty acres for eight dollars. After this, it proposes to relinquish the remainder to the State in which it shall lie.

About 140,000,000 of acres of public lands have been surveyed and offered at public sale. About 20,000,000 of acres have been purchased, and about the same quantity has been appropriated to military bounties, benevolent institutions, and purposes of education; leaving 100,000,000 now in the market, equal to about sixty acres to every family in the United States. Some of these lands have been in the market forty years; some twenty, and all for several years. During this lapse of time, every purchaser has made his selection of the most valuable tracts; and what now remain are the cullings of the original domains, the whole of which have been offered at public sale, and from which four-tenths have been taken by choice of the purchasers. The public having thus received the advantage which the fertility of select portions of public lands could afford, and individuals able to purchase, having made their selection, the sales are become sluggish on account of the refuse being held at the same price. The proposition is now to graduate the price of the refuse lands according to their value, and the ability of the less opulent, though not less meritorious citizen, to provide for himself and family a home and a support.

We have a virtuous and industrious population among us, who are willing to cultivate these lands, if they may be permitted to call their labors their own; and if the wealth and resources of the nation in any degree consist in the improvements of the country, only speak the word, and they will raise the nation to opulence unexampled. The forest will bow to the husbandman, and your wilderness will smile like Eden. Their habits urge them to the work, and a waste domain, almost boundless, invites them to its banquet. The laboring poor, in a country like ours, constitute the strength and glory of the nation. We must accommodate our measures to the peculiar genius of our citizens, and not follow the polluted footsteps of despotic Governments. It is not with us as with them, where the poor may be reduced to a dependence upon the lord of the manor, and bow submissively to his pleasure, because he gives him leave to toil. An American may be poor, but he cannot be servile. He may be without property, but you cannot deprive him of his independence. We have too long followed bad example, in a course calculated to break his spirit, if the spirit of an American could be broken. We have seen him immured in prison for his misfortune; but the barbarous practice has only demonstrated the proposition, that an American soul is above degradation. Place him in the most abject circumstances, and he will still be your equal, and make the consciousness of it reciprocal. We have no monied aristocracy in our country; and the perpetual revolution of property, where entailments are not tolerated, is a certain pledge that we never shall. The poor of one generation are the rich of the next generation. Families wax and wane as certain as the moon. It then becomes the interest of every person to provide for the comfort of the poor. In so doing, the most opulent are providing for their own posterity; and while we retain affection for our offspring, we shall glory in the idea that poverty cannot degrade. It is a certain guarantee for their independence, under every reverse of fortune. If God, the poor man's friend, has given him a noble mind, and placed him in circumstances under which its independence cannot be broken, the same beneficent providence has provided us the means of making him happy, by the same act which will at once give strength and riches to the nation. Adopt the measure now proposed, and there is not a man in the Union so poor but that he may cultivate his own land, and plant his family upon his own domain.

The most inflexible virtue is found among the most penurious of our citizens. When luxury has enervated both the physical and moral powers of the voluptuary; when our cities become the nurseries of corruption, virtue will still find a welcome abode in the hearts of our industrious yeomanry. On them depend the integrity of our Government and the permanency of our institutions. Policy and justice unite in pleading their cause. They constitute a barrier against foreign invaders and domestic usurpers, alike formidable to both. In aristocratic Governments the nobility must be provided for; and when a commoner is ennobled, an estate is settled upon the title to support its dignity. Here, every American is a nobleman. Every man is born a peer. His nobility is more permanent than wealth. It consists of independence of mind; and, to support his dignity, is only to maintain that independence. Place within his power the means of obtaining a propriety in that land which his own honest hands will cultivate, he asks no greater wealth than what his industry will acquire. His residence will be permanently fixed. His attachment to his country will be strengthened. His temptations to vice will be fewer and weaker. He will feel it more his interest to be a patriotic citizen and a useful man. He will develop the latent resources of the country, and disclose ample stores of treasures before concealed. His family will be happy, and his children will rise to industry and virtue. If we expect to survive our liberties, we may indeed reserve our public domains for the endowment of future dukedoms; but, for myself, I make no calculation for such an event; and, except for such an event, I can scarcely conceive the object of retaining these lands. If we expect future generations to enjoy them, the present generation are willing to improve them for the future. I would now ask, can the Government make a better disposition of them? If we desire an increase of national wealth, this measure will gain it in the highest degree. If we would increase the happiness of the nation, this measure will carry felicity into the families of thousands. If we could strengthen that patriotism which Americans already feel above any other people, this measure will effect the object. While every man, under his own vine and fig tree, will enjoy the fruit of his labor, you will scarcely find a fugitive in our country. If national strength is an object, experience proves, that, where a propriety in the soil is combined with all the charms of liberty, a people will prove unconquerable.

We have now, west of the Alleghany mountains, a population of about 3,000,000 inhabitants, and their character for every excellence that can grace a free and independent people, may challenge a comparison with any equal population on the face of the whole earth. It is chiefly composed of emigrants from the old States, bringing with them all the virtues of their fathers and their brethren, and remaining uncontaminated by the effeminacy of luxury or the splendors of wealth. In the late war they proved themselves worthy of their ancestors, and of the country which they so gallantly defended; and they are this day, as I trust they will long remain, an example of the blessings of that state in which each man is the proprietor of the spot which he inhabits. Give the facilities which this measure provides, and you will perpetuate these blessings. Nor can I conceive a reason why we should refuse, unless it is that the wilderness may remain a wilderness, and its latent treasure undisclosed.

It may be objected that the measure will induce emigration from the older States. On this point I would ask the father, with his fifty acres converted into a garden for the comfortable support of a numerous family, if he would wish to confine all his children to his own little spot, by depriving them of superior advantages in another State? Would he not rather have a prospect of independence before them? The evils of emigration are ideal. Its evils have never yet appeared; nor have its ideal evils been defined. I would ask any gentleman to point them out; to put his finger on the map, and mark the place, either in the old State or in the new, which has been injured by emigration. Man is naturally inclined to cleave to the spot which gave him birth, till he can improve his condition by changing it; and, when emigration will increase his happiness, it is an advantage and not an injury. As the population of the old States multiplies, they who cannot procure a comfortable settlement at home, find it in the new. A population, which would otherwise become penurious and fugitive, are settled in the enjoyment of competency; and thus the tide of emigration becomes as beneficial to the old States as to the emigrants themselves. It also strengthens the interest which each section of the Union feels for the prosperity of the whole. It perpetuates the ties of consanguinity; a pledge of union that will remain secure, when clashing interests and discordant passions might otherwise threaten its dissolution.

In every old State there will be a kind of floating population, depressed by misfortune, without a home, and without employment. Many of these seek a subsistence in the Army or Navy, and many become vagabonds in a land of freedom and plenty. For this crying evil the measure before us provides a happy remedy. If you prefer for your posterity the life of the independent farmer to that of the fugitive and the vagabond, or to that of the private soldier or the sailor, adopt this measure, and you place the fortune of industry within his reach.

It has been objected that a reduction of the price will encourage speculation; that capitalists will monopolize immense domains, to the exclusion of the industrious poor. This objection has been so ably considered, and so conclusively answered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. KANE] that I need not dwell upon it. His arguments must, I think, have carried conviction to every dispassionate mind where doubts were before entertained. The defeat of speculators in the military bounty lands to soldiers of the late war, will admonish capitalists to beware of such speculations. Even if a wealthy speculator should venture to purchase many thousands of acres, he could not hold them up at an advanced price, because purchasers would procure what they wanted of the public, upon terms as favorable as his original purchase; and before he could turn them to any considerable account, the interest of the purchase money, and the annual taxes would double their original cost; and when no entailments exist, when no primogeniture rights are recognized by our laws, they would be so subdivided by descent among his heirs, before any considerable appreciation of their value would give him an undue ascendancy, that no possible injury could arise.

The principal objection, and I presume the only weighty objection in the minds of the gentlemen to the measure, is that of its bearing upon the finances of the country. On this point, the estimate set upon our public lands is proven, by actual demonstration, to be entirely fallacious. The statements of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BARRON] who has given such a lucid and unanswerable exposition of this subject, are calculated to remove this delusion. What, I would ask, have the sales of those lands done for our public coffers? They were set apart for the payment of the public debt, and their whole net proceeds have not paid one-tenth part of the interest of the national debt, from the commencement of their sales to the present day. The gross amount of receipts into the Treasury, for sales of public lands, within forty years, is about $5,000,000 of dollars, and the expenses of surveys, sales, and contingencies of various kinds, have exceeded 30,000,000 dollars, so that the whole net proceeds are less than five millions, not far exceeding 100,000 dollars a year. If the expenses of the two Houses of Congress should be taken into the account, for the time occupied in legislating upon these lands, the printing of documents and volumes of books upon the subject, with many incidental items, not set down to this head, it is doubtful whether they have yielded one cent of clear revenue to the Government. Where, then, can be the utility or the policy of pursuing the old systems in relation to them, when by a different policy they may be made a source of happiness to thousands, and of immense benefit to the whole nation?

A prominent feature in this bill, which ought, in my humble opinion, to recommend it to universal support, is the provision which it proposed to make in favor of the actual settler. If a person can receive land at a reduction of twenty-five cents per acre, on condition of becoming a permanent settler upon it, he will always purchase of the Government in preference to a speculator, because it will be his interest to do so. If, after all these lands have passed the order of inspection and selection, for a limited number of years, the actual settler can procure a sufficiency for a home, and a support to himself and family, at five cents an acre, as the bill proposes, the advantages will be incalculable. The country will be enriched by the industry of a class whose misfortunes will otherwise render them a burthen rather than a blessing to the country. The refuse lands, which will otherwise lie waste, only to increase the distance betwixt improvements, and so render more inconvenient all useful business, will be rendered fruitful by cultivation. The settlers will escape many temptations to vice and dissipation. They will form a bulwark of defence to the nation. Their patriotism, and the republican simplicity of their manners, will be a protection to our liberties. They and their families will be virtuous and happy. Manufacturing towns and villages will grow up spontaneously among them, equal at least to the wants of their own settlements, and requiring no other protection than what the produce of these refuse lands will be certain to afford.

Difficulties are continually presenting themselves concerning these lands. Every year much of our time is employed in legislating upon the subject. Much expense is incurred—unpleasant debate is involved, and no benefit results to the Government. We appropriate them to purposes of benevolence; to asylums for the unfortunate; to the support of schools; to the construction of roads and canals; but, in every instance, questions are involved which are calculated neither to strengthen the bond of our Union, or gratify the friendly feelings of the heart. Here we witness a clashing of local interests—there a constitutional scruple; and discussions arise which tend more to provoke the evil passions of our nature, than to foster those fraternal sentiments which it is no less our interest than our pleasure to cherish.

Our Government is composed of a confederacy of independent States, each constituting a distinct sovereignty, united by interest and affection. We are a family, consisting of twenty-four adult members, and three children, yet in their minority, with a prospect of future increase. If we view our relations upon a liberal scale, there can be no clashing of interests. The whole family is interested in the best welfare of every member; and especially the younger branches are entitled to the highest consideration of the elder. These younger sisters suffer great inconvenience from large domains of vacant lands within their borders, over which they have no control, and through which they must incur the expense of constructing roads, or suffer the want of communication betwixt different parts of their own sovereignty. They cannot tax these lands, nor avail themselves of any benefit from their existence. The payment for lands purchased have been perpetually draining from these States the little money which the industry and enterprise of their citizens have procured, and the present system is calculated to perpetuate the evil for many years to come, and to entail it upon the minor members, and upon all that are yet unborn. The imperfections of this state of things have been strongly depicted by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENRICKS] and the able picture which he has drawn is a just description of the case. Though I might doubt the expediency of going the full length which he proposes, yet his accurate investigation of the subject demonstrates the necessity of providing some relief; at least of fixing a time when the inconvenience which they suffer shall have an end; and if, for years to come, they must sow in tears, I hope we shall permit them in the end to reap in joy.

Graduation of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

We have arrived at a period, sir, when much is expected of this Government. We have made great sacrifices to protect commerce. We have done much, and are called on to do much more, for the protection of manufactures. Agriculture is the foundation of all; and for agriculture we have done nothing. The farmer furnishes the raw material for manufactures, and supplies with food the workman who manufactures it. In proportion as agriculture prospers, our manufactures may flourish; but, without a constant improvement in our agricultural pursuits, our manufactures must dwindle. It is as necessary to our independence that we supply the raw material, and that we feed the workmen from our own soil, as that we manufacture our own apparel. Let the Government, then, in the plenitude of its bounty, remember the farmer. We ask no other aid than permission for every poor industrious man to cultivate the earth, and call that spot his own, without invading his neighbor's right; and for each State, after the Government shall have derived what benefit it can from the choicest portions of its lands, to control the remainders. Do this for agriculture, and, with its natural attendants, commerce and manufactures, it will form a three-fold cord which cannot be broken.

To relieve the States interested of the evil, to effect the object so desirable, and to dispose of this subject forever, I incline to the belief that the best interest of the country would be promoted by a division of all the public lands among the citizens of the United States, by lot; a measure which had its sanction by holy writ. When God gave to his chosen people the land of Canaan, it was disposed of according to a system devised in Heaven, and revealed to them for an inviolable mandate. No minimum price was fixed; but the gift of God was bestowed without money and without price. It was divided by lot; first in general divisions among the tribes, then among the families, and then among the individuals. The same beneficent Lord has given to us, his most favored people of modern days, "a land flowing with milk and honey." Would it not be wise in us to make his ancient law our rule, and divide this goodly land by lot? We might then call it emphatically "the lot of our inheritance." The Romans followed the example of Joshua; and one of our own republican family, Georgia, has adopted the plan. This subject, I am aware, is not now before us; but I am not certain that it would be an unwise or inexpedient method of closing this concern. Before I sit down, I must not omit to pay to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. McKINLEY] the just tribute of praise for the able speech which he delivered on this subject, for which he will not fail to reap his just reward of his constituents.

The debate was continued, briefly, by Messrs. ROWAN and MACON, and at length by Mr. HENDRICKS, who withdrew his motion to amend.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 2, 1828.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill to graduate the price of the Public Lands, was taken up.

Mr. NOBLE said the bill being now before the Senate of the United States, and for their consideration, he felt it his duty to express his views of the provisions of the bill, and his opinions of its operation, should it pass. He said that he was deprived of the same latitude of argument which his colleague had taken upon his proposed amendment to the bill, inasmuch as he had withdrawn it. He supposed, however, it would be in order to read the amendment, and refer to it in the course of his remarks.

Mr. President, said Mr. N., all Governments, as I understand, are made for the protection of the People, and to secure to them their rights. In this country, their rights are guaranteed by the articles of confederation, cessions from States, ordinances for the government of of Territories, Constitution of the United States, and of the States, together with compacts and stipulations, entered into by the Congress of the United States, with the People of a State, and the People of a Territory, within the limits of the United States.

The moment an individual enters into the body politic, or into society regulated by law, he gives up a part of his natural rights, for the purpose of enjoying greater, as a member of the family, whether it relates to the General Government, State Government, county, city, or town corporate.

The moment any member of the society violates either the fundamental law, or the municipal regulations for the government of the society, or the rights of others, the law takes him into custody, and punishes him for his crime or misdemeanor.

The same mode, or parity of reason, applies to States, corporations, and to the whole Union. The Constitution of the Union, as well as individuals, for the public faith, must be duly observed, or we cannot exist as a nation, and preserve unimpaired, the inheritance which has been left us by those who have gone before us. In the two cases, one as to the individual, the law operates, and in relation to agents for corporations, the People must, at the polls, suppress the mischief and advance the remedy if the public faith be lost sight of. I may, this moment, be violating the public faith. The People will pass judgment.

Excitement gotten up, whether the motive be pure or impure, that prostrates the plighted faith of this Union, or the duties of the Congress of the United States, that moment the bone is broken, and the sinews of the Government is cut, and our country thrown into turmoil. No State or society of individuals can have confidence in the Congress, if they set at defiance the rights of others, and exercise power, not of right.

I beg leave to read my colleague's proposition, or amendment to the bill.

I know him to be sincere in his views, and the subject one that he has close at heart, and one that may agree with him in the State we represent. He proposes to strike out the fifth section, and insert:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, that the preceding sections of the act shall be, and the same are hereby, made applicable to the Territories only.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, that the public and unappropriated land within the limits of the new States shall be, and the same are hereby, ceded and relinquished in full property to the several States in which the same may lie, on condition that such States shall not, at any time hereafter, put such lands into market, at a lower minimum price than shall be established by law for the sale of the public lands in the Territories, and on condition that the Indian title to the lands within the limits of any State shall hereafter be extinguished at the expense of such State.

I think, Mr. President, the proposition of my colleague a dangerous one, and if carried into effect, would injure the new States. I shall apply, sir, my arguments and objections to the proposition, in reference to Indiana, and its effects upon that State, though the same reasons will apply in the general to all the new States.

Indiana for years past acted in the character of a State, by the action of the People of the Indiana Territory, who relieved themselves from the shackles of a territorial Government, and was admitted into this Union, in the manner pointed out by the Constitution of the United States.

To have her again fettered, by placing her in the power of twenty-three States to legislate for her, upon her interests, and within the grasp of the treaty-making power, I never can think of it, without instructions from the People of the State through their members of the legislature.

Graduation of the Public Lands.

[APRIL 2, 1838.]

Suppose, for a moment, my colleague's amendment had passed and became a law, and Congress was to pass a law, saying that the lands in their Territory shall be sold for an enormous sum, fixing the price. Will it not be perceived at once, that although the lands were to be ceded to the States, and the States tied down to the minimum price, Congress would have the States under their hammer, and prevent the emigration and settlement of the States? The latter part of my colleague's amendment is certainly objectionable—it declares that, in the cession of the lands to the States, they are to be ceded "on condition that the Indian title to lands within the limits of any State, shall hereafter be extinguished at the expense of such State." What is meant by the expense, would be difficult to decide. Sir, "expense" should be defined before the People of a State should be placed in the humiliating condition of submitting to an onerous tax, without their consent. We all know what is meant by the word expense, literally—"cost and charges." The treaty-making power may be found in the Constitution of the United States, second article and second section, in these words: "He (meaning the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." How this treaty-making power may understand the word "expense," is yet unknown. Will it be understood that the term "expense" includes costs? I will give my answer: It does include "costs" and "charges;" and the former includes price, expense, loss, and to be bought for. Should the answer, which I give be true, as to the term "expense," will it not follow that my colleague's proposition in terms, as far as I have mentioned the emphatical ones, be injurious to the new States, where the public lands are situated? The reason, in my mind, is clear, that the injury is self-evident.

His proposition first declares that the land in the new States, although to be ceded to the States, shall not be sold at a lower minimum price by the States, than the land of the United States in Territories, and the price to be fixed by Congress, before the State authorities can have one inch. If the United States refuse to pass any law in relation to their territorial lands, the settlements of the country are retarded, and the States remain worse than heretofore—even territories, as to the waste and unappropriated lands within the boundaries of the States. Secondly, his proposition is to "extinguish" the Indian "title" at the "expense" of "each State," and if the answer which I have given be true, it follows as a necessary conclusion, that "title" is claim—and to "extinguish," is to put out and destroy—and that expense includes costs, charges, price, loss, to be bought for. "Treaty" means negotiation. The subjects within the negotiation includes expense, cost, charges, title, extinguishment, and management.

If the word expense, alone, could have reference to the payment of the Commissioners, who should hold the Treaty, and all other persons employed for the object, together with the provisions to be furnished at the treaty ground, I should not be so fearful of consequences as to the second proposition of my colleague. The term expense will include blankets, clothes, scarlets, calicos, saddles, horses, and, in short, every article furnished the Indians with whom you treat.

Let me repeat, if Congress pass a law fixing the price of land in Territories, at so high a price that it cannot be bought, and the States in selling their lands are bound to conform to the law, and the States liable to the expenses of extinguishing the Indian title—in the latter case, the People of the States would be oppressed, and in the former, the settlements of the States would be defeated.

The treaty-making power is lodged where it ought to be, in the hands of the President of the United States, and in the Senate. I have found the power in the Constitution, and there let it remain, for it never can be exercised to the injury of a State.

I am in favor of ceding the lands to the new States, in which they lie, by the consent of the States, and that the legislative authority of the States shall dispose of the lands as they may think proper, and as fast as the lands sell, the States shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, from two to four cents per acre.

Sir, the only mode to ascertain the consent of the States, is for Congress to submit propositions to them, for their free acceptance or rejection, and if finally the two contracting parties agree, the agreement is to all intents and purposes a compact, and not liable to be altered by the pleasure of Congress.

The arguments used "that the rights of soil and taxation are inseparable from the sovereignty of every independent State," I beg leave to dissent from. The sovereignty of the new States exists at this day. I hold that the soil and taxation are separable from the sovereignty. The right of domain or estate may be owned by others, within the limits of a State—possessing sovereignty, where that sovereignty cannot tax the soil. In the year 1816, the People of Indiana formed for themselves a Constitution, and was in the same year admitted into this Union, according to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, as a free and independent State. The act of April, 1816, authorizing the People of the Indiana Territory, to elect members to the Convention, in it is to be found propositions submitted to the Convention for acceptance or rejection. The Convention accepted the propositions, and thus the two contracting parties agreed, that the State should not tax any tract of land sold by the United States, for five years, from and after the 1st of December, 1816, for any purpose whatever. In the same act, the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, is referred to; and it declares: "The Legislatures of those new States or Districts shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers. No tax shall be imposed on lands, the property of the United States; and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents.

Sir, again the cession act of Virginia, in the year 1783, ceding the lands to the United States, uses these words: "for the benefit of the said States, Virginia inclusive, all right, title, and claim, as well of soil as of jurisdiction, which the said Commonwealth hath to the territory or tract of country within the limits of the Virginia charter, situate, lying, and being to the northwest of the river Ohio, to and for the uses and purposes, and on the condition of the act." I ask for what purposes? The answer is given in the act of cession, "for the common benefit of the Union."

I might cease with my remarks here as to the right of soil and taxation, being inseparable, but I will not.

In the Constitution of the United States, you will find two important provisions. The first reads: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." The second reads: "All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States, under this Constitution, as under the confederation.

Sir, is it possible that the argument can be considered correct; "that the rights of soil and taxation are inseparable from the sovereignty of every independent State," unless it can be shewn from the date of the articles of confederation, that the cession act of Virginia, ordinance for the government of territories, and the Constitution of the United States, are frauds, and so were intended in their consummation to operate upon the sovereignty of new States to be admitted into this Union? To prove the argument, you must advance one step further, and prove the People of the territories to have been guilty of a fraud; because, under acts of Congress authorizing them to hold a Convention for the purpose of framing a Constitution, in the same acts, there are express prohibitions against the States taxing the soil of the United States, and the People by ordinances subjoined to their Constitutions, declare that the new States to be admitted, have no power to meddle with or tax the soil of the United States.

Graduation of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

I am aware that the Senators are tired of the subject, and will not detain them on this point longer than to say a few words. The arguments of my colleague, I insist upon it, he has abandoned. The reason I assign for my assertion is this: If his argument be correct, (and I would sooner trust him than myself,) his propositions cannot be true. The moment Indiana, or any other new State, was admitted into this Union, the State possessed sovereignty; and if by virtue of the sovereignty she had a right to tax the soil belonging to the United States, the proposition to cede the lands to the new States, upon two conditions, was entirely uncalled for. The sovereignty was complete, upon the admission of the State into this Union.

Sir, if the State of Indiana had a right to tax and claim the soil within her boundaries, belonging to the United States, why make the appeal to Congress to cede? Should it be true that the lands belong to Indiana, why call upon Congress? Why not take the power into our own hands? If the arguments be correct as presented, the new States are safe, and let them proceed without delay to send out their own surveyors, abolish the land offices of the United States, drive them out of the States, and establish their own. To settle the differences between the United States, the new States, or any one of them, the judicial power of the Federal Government, in relation to public lands, is all sufficient, and that, too, without resort to arms. The new States never will be induced nor seduced to array themselves against this Union.

If any State had attempted to seize upon the public lands, under color of authority, and the controversy submitted to the Federal Courts, the decision would have been against her, as it was in the celebrated case from Ohio, when the Legislature of that State attempted to tax and drive beyond her limits the Banks of the United States, on which occasion, a distinguished lawyer, Mr. Hammond, bore a conspicuous part. The costs accruing in the controversy between the State of Ohio and the United States, I know not the amount.

For my own part, sir, I shall never legislate without the consent of those I represent, to involve them in disputes, and the payment of taxes.

Legislation is but a compromise of opinion; and if we would not tread upon each others heels too much in projects, and all unite to adhere to engagements, contracts, cession acts, ordinances, constitutions, which have been adopted, for the benefit of the whole Union, and merely content ourselves by claiming on the part of Congress to fulfil their engagements with the new States, making the roads promised, and such other objects, for the mutual benefit of all, we should discharge our duty fully, and accomplish more for the new States, and for the interest of the Union.

The bill to graduate the price of the public lands, &c. as introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] and every portion of it, is worthy of consideration.

The first section of the bill provides for the graduation of the prices of the public lands, (heretofore offered at public sale,) commencing on the 4th of July, 1828, and ending the 4th of July, 1832, for one dollar per acre to seventy-five cents per acre and fifty cents per acre, and after the latter period, at twenty-five cents per acre.

The second section goes upon the same principle of graduation in reference to the public lands, with this difference, it is confined to the lands hereafter to be offered at public sale, and after the sale, the principle applies.

The third section refers to a written permission on behalf of an individual to be obtained from the Registers of the Land Offices and Receivers of Public Money, to settle on any half quarter section of land within their respective districts which shall remain unsold for the space of one year after having been offered at fifty cents per acre; upon condition that, if the individual shall forthwith settle thereupon, and cultivate the same for five consecutive years, and being a citizen of the United States at the end of that time, the said individual upon proof of settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, shall have a patent for the half quarter section donated. This section is for the benefit of the poor.

The fourth section merely refers to the fees of land officers.

The fifth section is all important; and that it may be fully appreciated, I use the words: "And be it further enacted, that all the land which shall remain unsold for one year after having been offered at twenty-five cents per acre, shall be, and the same hereby is, ceded in full property to the States in which the same lie."

Mr. President, in a few minutes I am done with the subject, except to vote. The five sections contained in the bill, violates no one act of the Government from the date of the articles of confederation, nor the Constitution of the United States, up to the present date. All of the provisions of the bill proceed upon the ground of expediency, and for the mutual benefit of all; and every sentence is marked with consideration and profit for the whole Union.

The fifth section is peculiarly interesting to the whole Union, though, at the first blush, might not appear so, but when examined, and its effects, it will appear. The operation is this, that when the lands cease to be of little or no value, or, in other words, the refuse lands within the limits of the new States, they cease to be a common benefit for the whole Union. Should this state of things exist, the expenses of keeping up your land offices will result in the costs to the whole Union, and overrun the profits, and therefore the lands no longer be a common benefit for all. Then will be the true time for the States to operate, and open her sales of the lands as the States may direct, without being embarrassed by Congressional acts or the force of the treaty-making power. If, however, as I before observed, the Congress of the United States will submit propositions to the new States for their full acceptance or rejection, and the States consent to take the lands at a price they may agree on, I am content.

With my voice to tax the people of the new States, by the operation of the treaty-making power, without their consent, the people of Indiana must so direct me.

Some explanatory conversation took place between Messrs. NOBLE and HARRISON.

Mr. BARTON offered a substitute for the bill, to fix the price of public land at one dollar per acre, and in cases where land should have been exposed for sale five years, to allow any individual to settle upon it; and, after having occupied it for five years, to receive a certificate from the land office.

Mr. BENTON moved that the bill lie on the table until to-morrow. Agreed to.

JUDICIAL PROCESS.

On motion of Mr. KANE, the bill to regulate judicial process in the States admitted into the Union since the year 1789, was taken up, and a substitute for the bill proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary being under consideration, a debate of great length occurred, in which Messrs. BERRIEN, ROWAN, JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, and WHITE, participated.

Mr. WHITE then moved to amend the bill by striking out the word "now" from the third section. The object of this motion was, to include the laws which might hereafter be passed by the Legislatures of the several States, in relation to final process, so that the rules relative to execution, which the States might hereafter adopt for their local courts, should be adopted in the United States' Courts.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. WEBSTER and JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, and supported by Messrs. ROWAN and WHITE. Messrs. TAZEWELL and BERRIEN also made a few remarks; when the question recurring, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, on motion of Mr. ROWAN, the motion was rejected.

Mr. BERRIEN then moved an amendment to the third section, purporting to give the power to the Judges of the Courts of the United States in the several States, to adopt any rules which may be made, from time to time, by the State Legislatures, for the regulation of the State Courts; which was discussed by Messrs. ROWAN, BERRIEN, JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, and TAZEWELL; and the question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The bill having been reported to the Senate, Mr. WHITE renewed his motion to amend, by striking out the word "now" from the fifth line of the third section, which was decided in the negative.

The amendment, as amended in the Committee of the Whole, having been agreed to, Mr. ROWAN moved to insert, in the 14th line of the first section, the words "in matters of form," so as to restrict the Judges of the United States' Courts from framing other rules in relation to mesne process, than such as related to matters of form.

This motion was briefly discussed by Messrs. BERRIEN, ROWAN, WEBSTER, and TAZEWELL, and was negatived.

The bill was, after further debate, finally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PAYMENT OF INTEREST TO STATES.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the bill making further provision for the payment of interest on moneys expended during the late war, for the public defence, by the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, was taken up.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to amend the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee, so as to make the payments heretofore made, applicable in the first case to the extinguishment of interest. He gave a history of the claims which the States had preferred, and contended that the law to which this bill is a supplement was intended to effect the same object which would be attained by adopting his amendment. The United States, by reimbursing the money, had adopted the principle that the debt was properly created, and by the act of Congress directing interest to be paid, had avowed the principle that the States ought not to sustain a loss by providing those means of defence which the safety of their lives and their property required, and which the United States ought to have furnished; but which the total want of means made it impossible for her to furnish. The only just principle which applied to the case, was to indemnify the States from loss by the operation. The erroneous construction put upon the law of Congress by the Third Auditor had defeated entirely this object. In Maryland, the amount loaned to the United States was borrowed by the State, and before the reimbursement by the United States the State had paid off that loan by a transfer of United States' six per cent. stock. In some of the other States the amount loaned to the United States had been derived from the sales of stock owned by the State, and bearing an interest. In these cases the States lost the interest to the same extent as if they had borrowed the money at the given rate of interest, and had paid that interest regularly. In Pennsylvania, the State had funds in the Treasury, and by advancing it to the United States was compelled afterwards to borrow, on interest, to raise money to supply the place of it, thus experiencing the same loss in the result. The Auditor, however, felt himself bound by the letter of the act of Congress, and had not allowed interest in any case, except where the State had paid interest on the specific fund, which furnished the means of advancing to the United States, and only so long as payments were made to discharge that interest. In the case of Maryland, for illustration, (and the principle is the same in regard to the other States,) interest ceased to be allowed to her so soon as she disposed of her United States' stock, and paid off the loan, although the very act of disposing of that stock caused to her the loss of the dividends on it, equal, and rather more than equal, to the interest she claimed. Yet, the money lost being dividends, and not interest paid out of her Treasury, the Auditor did not feel authorized to pay interest beyond that period. The amendment of the committee fully provides for this mischief, and properly enacts, that, where loans or advances have been made, interest shall be paid from the time of the advance to the time of payment.

The amendment now proposed by him was intended to meet another difficulty. Reimbursement had been made by partial payments. The whole amount, in the case of Maryland, had never been reimbursed, and one-half of it would be lost in any event. But, from time to time, partial payments were made, as the Auditor became satisfied of their propriety. Mr. C. read from a statement the sums and dates. By the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and by the decisions of the courts of Maryland, and, he understood, the laws of all the States concerned, whenever a payment is made in part discharge of a debt consisting of principal and interest, it is proper to apply so much of the sum paid as is equal to the interest accrued, to the extinguishment of the interest in the first place, and the residue to the discharge of part of the principal. The Treasurer of the Western Shore of Maryland had earnestly contended for this principle in the settlement of the interest account with the United States, and made an able argument on the subject. The Auditor, however, opposed the technical difficulty that the sums reimbursed were paid as principal, and could never thereafter be considered as interest, in whole or in part. The Treasurer, in his opinion, was clearly right, and the Auditor as clearly wrong. If, by an act of Congress, the payment of a claim bearing interest was directed, and, thereafter, partial payments should be made, there can be no doubt the final adjustment would be made in the mode claimed by Maryland. If directing interest to be paid to those States, Congress had, in effect, directed the adjustment to be made, as if the claim had originally been acknowledged with interest. The State, in its pecuniary transactions, pays according to this principle; and if, in discharging itself of the debt contracted in providing this very fund, partial payments had been made to its creditors, the same principle would have been applied. Citizens of the State were governed by the same principle, in paying or receiving their debts. Our own laws recognize the propriety of it, and common prudence and justice require that, where one part of a debt being interest, is unprofitable, and another part being principal, is productive, the creditor should first receive payment of that portion which is unproductive, if the debtor cannot satisfy both.

He presumed the committee had intended the amendment reported by them to have this effect; but, knowing the preconceived opinions of the Auditor, from an examination of the correspondence on the subject, he considered it necessary to insert language which could admit of no doubt.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. C. it was decided in the affirmative—16 to 11.

Mr. TYLER moved an amendment, that the rate of interest should be the same as that paid by the States for money raised for the benefit of the United States; which was explained by Mr. TYLER, who stated that, when Virginia was called on to raise money to carry on the war, her Treasury was empty, and she resorted to loans; at that time the funds could not be obtained lower than 7 or 8 per cent. which was paid. He could not doubt for a moment that the United States would see the justice of paying the rate of interest given by the State for this money, which was expended in no prodigal spirit, but with a patriotic desire of aiding the great cause in which the country was then engaged.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had no objection to the amendment, with a limitation, so as to confine the amount of interest, over the legal rate, to the period during which it was paid. After the exigency was over, the rate of interest would be the legal rate. He, therefore, wished the amendment might be modified, so as to fix the limitation to the time during which the extra interest was paid.

Mr. TYLER agreed to the suggestion, and modified his amendment accordingly.

Mr. CHANDLER thought there ought to be but one rate of interest in all these payments. There never was, he believed, an instance in which the United States had paid more than legal interest. The moneys paid by the States had been sometimes paid advantageously, as they had applied their depreciated Bank notes to the public service.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that legal interest was different in different States. In some it was eight, in others seven, and in others six per cent. The principle on which this bill was founded, was that, when the United States applies to the States to advance money, the expense to which those States are subjected, by complying with the requisitions of the General Government, ought to be refunded.

Mr. TYLER's motion to amend was then agreed to.

Mr. HAYNE observed that a new principle seemed about to be adopted, and he thought it ought to be applied uniformly to all the States. He should, therefore, move to insert South Carolina after Virginia, so as to extend this provision of interest to that State, as well as to others.

Mr. RUGGLES said, that, when the bill for the payment of interest to the State of South Carolina was before the Senate, he had felt it to be his duty to oppose it. The law upon this subject had been for many years settled, and that bill he considered an innovation. Money had often been loaned by the States to the General Government; but no interest had been paid upon those loans; and he considered the principle on which it was withheld to be, that it was expended in the common cause, and for the public good. The proposition now before the Senate went to establish a new mode of compensation, which went even further than the bill for the relief of South Carolina, and which he thought hostile to the principle hitherto adopted by the Government. He was opposed to this proposition; indeed, he was opposed to the whole bill, as against the course hitherto pursued by Congress, and which had been acted on for thirteen years: for a change of which he saw no good reason. He did not intend to argue that the bill proposed any thing radically wrong; but it unsettled a principle that had been long established and understood. He saw no probable end to the system which this bill would commence, as interest must be paid on all similar claims to an indefinite amount.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, had not understood the gentleman from South Carolina, on a former occasion, to have stated that the money advanced by that State was hired by the State for the public service, but that the money had been drawn from the State Bank. It was also stated, that the dividends on the remaining funds had been 12 per cent. Hence, he supposed, it was argued that the advances cost the State 12 per cent. or that that was the rate of interest. He did not see how the State could come in and claim per centage on the money, according to what the Bank might have made, upon it, had it not been drawn out of the vaults for the public service.

Mr. HAYNE considered that South Carolina was entitled to be placed on the same footing as the other States. He refrained from any remarks, at present, on the general principle, as they would be more appropriate in a more advanced stage of the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RUGGLES] had said that he could see no end to the system which this bill would have the effect to establish. I hope, said Mr. W., we shall never see an end of it, until all the claims of the States are settled, exactly as we would settle the claims of individuals. This bill provided for claims of peculiar merit. The loans of money on which interest was to be paid were of a different nature from incidental advances made on unexpected occurrences. Where some emergency calls for an advance on the part of a State, the principal alone would be refunded: but where the State was called upon by the General Government to borrow money, to be applied to the general defence, the case was materially different. Had the States offered these loans to the General Government, and sought in this manner to draw interest upon their funds, and raise those funds from their own resources, they would have no right to ask for more than legal interest. For instance, to take a case. If a State have stock which is worth 13 per cent. above par, and sees fit to make a loan of the proceeds of that stock to the Government, it has no claim beyond legal interest. But if the State is asked by the General Government to loan of other individuals the required money, and were necessitated, in doing so, to pay an exorbitant rate of interest, the Government was, he considered, bound to pay that rate as long as it was paid by the State, and afterwards, until the time of closing the account, to pay legal interest only. He hoped some principle would be settled on which those claims should be adjusted. It was an erroneous opinion, that because the States advanced their own funds, drawn from their Banks, that no claim for interest upon such loans was just. The funds of a State deposited in the vaults of a Bank were not dead. And he would ask, whether the loss of interest upon that money was not the same, whether drawn from a Bank or loaned from an individual? The only difference in the two cases would be the rate. It was true, it might be urged, that the State in such cases stood in different positions—in one it was the agent, in the other a party. But, said Mr. W., I never could understand why the States were not entitled to interest upon their loans. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RUGGLES] says that the money is expended for the common cause—the public good. Now, that is the very reason, in my mind, why they should be paid out of the common funds of the General Government. The principle was the same as in case of a loan made by an individual. It was optional with the State to loan the money or not. The Government calls upon the States for these advances. One State will loan her funds, another will not. Thus far the case is the same as though individuals had been applied to. And why is not the similarity carried through to the end? Why is not the State to be treated as an individual would be? He believed it the cheapest money of which the Government had ever availed itself. It was true there might be something in the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, that there had been instances in which the States had paid out their depreciated currency. Any incidental transaction of that nature did not affect the main question. And he wished to be informed whether there was any principle on which the Government might be exempted from the payment of interest on money borrowed by the States, at its own request. If any such principle existed, he hoped it would be stated.

Mr. COBB said that the principle on which the Government had hitherto refused to pay interest on advances of money was this: that, although a balance was due the claimant, yet the time that intervened between the existence of the debt and its being presented for payment, and on which interest would be demanded, was caused by the delay of the claimant, and not from any fault on the part of the Government. But, said Mr. C., it is well to inquire how this money was expended on which these States ask interest. Why, so it is: Virginia took the money to carry on the war. She did not borrow the money to give to the United States. But it was expended by her own officers; and, until their accounts were presented at the Department, the Government could not know what amount was due to Virginia. So it was with South Carolina. Until the State officers presented their accounts, and proved their claims, the Government could not adjust them; and, as this delay was no fault of the United States, they did not consider themselves bound to pay interest during this delay of bringing in the accounts. He believed it was the same with Maryland and the other States provided for by the bill. The United States has always been willing to pay the demands as soon as presented with sufficient vouchers. But the Senate was now about to establish a novel principle, which he warned them to avoid, as it would establish the principle of paying interest on all claims that might be presented, and which might have remained unliquidated for a series of years, which he thought was peculiarly dangerous.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, read some documents in relation to the claim of Amasa Stetson.

Mr. RUGGLES made a brief statement of the principle on which the Committee of Claims decided in this case.

Mr. CHAMBERS remarked, that, notwithstanding the rule adopted in settling the claim of Mr. Stetson, he hoped the claims of these States would be settled equitably. The principle on which he grounded his support of the bill, was, that in any transaction between an individual and the Government, the same rule ought to be observed as between two individuals. If this was a correct rule, why should it not apply also to transactions between the General Government and the States? In relation to Maryland, he remarked, that when these advances of money were made, they had no alternative but to submit to the ravages of our enemies, or proceed on their own funds. In that time of general panic, it was not to be supposed that the accounts of the moneys expended could be kept with the most satisfactory accuracy; and, when presented at the Department, they were found to lack that perfect order and mercantile regularity necessary for their acceptance. A large amount, therefore, of the claims, and interest upon them, would never be received. The investigation of the accounts at the Treasury Department was the cause of the delay mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia. Certainly it did not attach to the officers of the State. As to the objection of the gentleman from Ohio, that the rule had been adopted to pay no interest on these claims, he [Mr. C.] would refer him to the act in favor of Virginia, in which the Government pledges itself to pay the sums expended, both principal and interest. We, therefore, said Mr. C., ask Congress merely to adopt that mode of adjusting the interest of these claims which the highest judicial tribunal in this country has adopted. The principle has been settled; and the remaining question is as to the form. The gentleman from Ohio had gone over the objection which it would have been proper to urge at the time of the passage of the law agreeing to pay the interest on the advances made by the States. He hoped Congress would do to the States what they were bound to do to their own citizens.

Mr. MARKS explained, at some length, the circumstances under which the money advanced by Pennsylvania had been loaned [but which we cannot give, as our reporter was unable to hear distinctly the remarks of the gentleman.] He observed that the greater part of the sums loaned by Pennsylvania were applied to the payment of the troops kept up at Presque Isle, for the defence of the shipping which was built there. The accounts had been presented in 1818, and all paid, with the exception of 13,000 dollars. He saw no reason why interest should not be paid on this loan as well as on individual advances.

The amendment offered by Mr. HAYNE was then agreed to.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to amend the bill by inserting an additional section, providing for the payment of interest on moneys advanced by Rhode Island; on which some conversation occurred between Messrs. BARNARD, KNIGHT, COBB, and CHAMBERS.

Mr. HAYNE said, that, if this was a new principle, and was to be applied to other States, he knew no reason why it should be withheld from Rhode Island. As to the objection urged by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Cobb] that the money was disbursed by the State officers, he [Mr. H.] thought it strengthened the claim.

Mr. COBB said the gentleman misapprehended him. He had stated that the reason why interest was not formerly paid, was because the accounts were not brought in. It could not be expected that the United States would pay interest, until they knew what was the amount due to the States, and on which it was to be paid. The gentleman from Maryland said that two hundred and thirty thousand dollars of the claims of that State had been paid, on their being presented at the Department, with interest upon the amount. He says that there is one hundred and seventy thousand dollars which has not been adjusted; and it is on this latter sum that interest is now to be paid. And he would ask whether the Government was bound to pay interest on claims, of which the State of Maryland had not brought forward the evidence? He put the question to the Senate and to the gentleman himself.

Mr. KNIGHT said the case of Rhode Island was not the same as that of other States. In the accounts rendered against the Government interest was not charged. The amount would not be very large—being interest for about three years on one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. But, as the principle was applied to other States, he thought Rhode Island equally entitled to its benefit.

Mr. BARNARD rose to say one word to the gentleman from Georgia. The time, as he thought, when interest ought to commence on these loans, was when the sums were disbursed from the State Treasuries. It made no difference whether the money was disbursed by the United States' officers or the State officers, whether for the pay of the regular troops or militia, or both. If it was the duty of the General Government to provide these funds, then undoubtedly the General Government was bound to pay the sums with interest from the time they were issued from the hands of the States. The payment of the principal was a tacit acknowledgement that the claim for interest was just and valid. The gentleman from Ohio has said that it is against the principle established by the Government. But, said Mr. B., this case seems an exception. The States applied to the Department for the interest on their advances, and they were refused; but on application to Congress, it was allowed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cobb] seems to think this bill is to establish a new rule. On the contrary, said Mr. S., this rule has been observed ever since the passage of the Virginia acts. The Third Auditor had established an erroneous rule. He paid interest as long as the State paid it: but when they stopped, he stopped. Congress, however, had long acknowledged the principle; and it certainly could not be called a new one.

Mr. CHAMBERS read the act passed in favor of Virginia, and further supported the bill.

Mr. COBB would make a single remark in reply to the gentleman from Maryland, over the way. The conduct of the Government had uniformly been, when a State came forward with a claim, to pay the principal on the account being proved. This was the established course, and would be found to have been practised invariably in the early period of the Government. In the case of Rhode Island, that had been the course. The principal was paid, but no interest. It was so in the case of South Carolina, and so in the case of Virginia: the moment they brought forward proof that these sums were expended for the general defence, they were paid. And now the question is, whether the Government is bound to pay interest on claims not yet proved.

Mr. HAYNE said that the gentleman from Georgia had taken up the wrong theory; and, of course, the conclusion which he draws from his premises is erroneous. He had presumed that the Government was always ready to discharge the principal. This, however, was not to be presumed; because, if the General Government was ready to pay it, why did they call on the States to raise the money? The States were called on to put their hands into their Treasury and disburse this money, because the United States had not the funds required to carry on the war. History recorded the fact, that the Treasury was exhausted, and could not raise the funds. Mr. H. observed that he had a few days since read a letter to the Senate, of the Secretary of War to General Pinckney, in which the declaration was made, that the Treasury was exhausted; and that the General must take every means in his power to raise funds. But, supposing the accounts had all been paid at the time those of Rhode Island were adjusted, what, he would ask, would have become of the interest due from the time the advances were made? But the true reason why they were not then settled, was, that the Government was not able to meet them. They were able to pay the small sum due to Rhode Island, but not to pay off the whole mass at once. The gentleman from Georgia had said that the States had delayed to send in their accounts. This was not the reason why they were not paid immediately after the war. It was the accumulation of business on the hands of the Department, which it took years to settle. If, then, the States were delayed in the settlement by the General Government, there was no reason why interest should not be paid on their claims during that period of delay. There was one error running through the whole opposition to the bill. It was, that these sums of money were expended by the States for their own immediate defence. But it was not so: for the money advanced by South Carolina went to the North and West, and assisted to defend those frontiers. The advance was made for the benefit of the whole community; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Webster] had said, with great truth, that all sacrifices for the general good ought to be paid out of the common funds of the country. Mr. H. said he conceived the principle to be well established, that, wherever individuals or States advanced money for the use of the General Government, it was to be paid with interest from the public Treasury. It had universally been done in advances made by individuals. He admitted that it was not done where advances were made by a public officer; because it was considered that there would often be a large amount of the funds of the Government in his hands, which would balance any advances made by him. He had a few days since been induced to examine the acts as far back as the year 1770, and found that, in every instance where individuals advanced money for the use of Government, interest had been paid. He would instance one case, which was a sample of many others. It was that of Christopher Green, of Rhode Island, who, in the year '70, had advanced a sum of money for the release of certain prisoners. Immediately after the war the sum paid by him was refunded; and, in 1792, a bill to pay interest on the amount passed Congress. The justice of the principle he believed no one would doubt; and the practice had been so universal, that he thought it hardly necessary to go farther in support of the bill.

The amendment offered by Mr. KNIGHT having been modified, on motion of Mr. WOODBURY, so as to include New Hampshire, it was agreed to.

Mr. MACON said that the reason why the accounts were not settled earlier, was that the money was not paid to the officers of the United States, but to their own officers, which made it necessary to send agents to the Department to explain their vouchers. Now, because this money was expended by the State officers, a bill paying them interest must be passed; and it must be shingled up by adding all the States one by one. We are growing wiser every day. We are always going back, and finding that all that was done in former times was wrong. All former principles were erroneous. Can a Government get along in this way, continually overturning all that was done before? A decision of a case was never sufficient. Claimants came here, and got all they could; and then they came again, and got the rest. No Government could get along so. We cannot have officers enough to settle the accounts brought against us, if they must be settled over and over again. No Secretary of the Treasury can make his calculations if we go on this way; for he cannot come at any near estimate of the money that Congress will vote away, and every year unsettle what was done the year before.

The amendment, as amended, having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate. And the question being put on the amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole, Mr. CHANDLER moved to divide the question, so as to take the vote on that part embraced by the motion of Mr. TYLER, to pay to the States the same rates of interest paid by them; which was agreed to. And the yeas and nays having been ordered, on motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the question on the amendment was decided in the affirmative.

The other amendments were then agreed to; when the question being on engrossing the bill, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, on motion of Mr. COBB, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. HARRISON moved to take up the bill to reduce the duty on imported salt.

This motion was sustained by Mr. HAYNE, and opposed by Mr. VAN BUREN, who observed that the bill had better lie on the table; as, should it pass the Senate, the tariff bill in the other House would prevent its passage in that body.

Mr. FOOT said that this bill had received additional importance since the commencement of the present session, which made it more necessary to act upon it this year. He alluded to the fact, that the islands of the West Indies which produced salt, had been opened within a short time. He hoped, therefore, the objection of the gentleman from New York would not prevent the bill's being taken up. He thought, whether the House could act upon the bill or not, it was the duty of the Senate to proceed upon it.

Mr. MCKINLEY, also, expressed himself in favor of taking up the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER said that the best course on the part of the gentleman from New York, would be to allow the bill to be taken up, and then move its indefinite postponement, which would try the disposition of the Senate effectually.

The question being put, the bill was then considered, when Mr. VAN BUREN moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. COBB said that the course taken by the Senator from New York appeared to him very extraordinary. This bill was brought forward at an early period of the session, and had been repeatedly postponed on account of the very gentleman from New York. And now, at a late day, when it is brought up, that gentleman moves its indefinite postponement. It was curious that this was the only bill that proposed to repeal a tax which was paid chiefly by the people of the Southern States. He could not but express his surprise at the course taken by the gentleman, nor did he think the reason given for it at all sufficient. If this bill was to be postponed to give fair weather to the tariff bill, when that bill should come into the Senate, he thought the proposition partial and unjust.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he rose merely to say that he hoped this bill might not be discussed. He believed that every Senator had made up his mind upon the subject. If, however, those opposed to the bill saw fit to express themselves, he hoped the friends of the bill would not follow their example, as the opinions of the friends of the measure were thoroughly fixed.

Mr. HARRISON observed, that he thought it would not be denied that a tax on a necessary of life, as was that to which the bill referred, which took from the poor man as much as from the rich man; which made the same demand upon the tenant of the humble cottage as upon the possessor of the splendid chateau, was in utter hostility to the principles of our Government. Which of these principles, said Mr. H., is more sacred, which more necessary for the legislator constantly to keep in view, than that which directs that, in the assessment of the public burthens, the demand should be proportioned to the ability to pay? If this principle is not regarded; if the taxes are levied upon the person, and not upon the property of the citizen; or, which is the same thing, upon the necessities of life, of which the poor man consumes as much as the rich one, what becomes of that boasted equality which is the basis of our Government? It is in vain that you secure to your citizens their other rights, that their persons and property are inviolate, that the elective franchise is unrestricted, and the offices of Government open to all, if this principle is adopted, and acted upon to any extent. If you tax the food of the laboring man, all the liberty that will be left to him will be that of choosing his master; for, go where he may, he will still be the slave of his employer.

But, Mr. President, said Mr. H., this duty upon salt is opposed to another important principle. It is a tax, and a heavy tax, on agriculture. Upon that interest, which is more important than any other, and on which, indeed, all the others depend. Salt is largely used on every farm, but to the grazier it is essentially necessary. No one can prosecute this branch of agricultural industry, in the Western country at least, with tolerable success, unless he can procure the article at such a reasonable price as to enable him to use it freely. And the condition of his stock will always be in proportion to the quantity used. Its beneficial effects are felt in more than one way. It saves food: for, the animal which is well supplied with this article will fatten upon food of a coarser quality, and which, without it, would scarcely sustain him. It serves instead of shelter. In the cold rains of Winter, the Western grazier gives a double portion of salt to his unhoused stock, (and few are supplied with covers;) its cordial and invigorating effects upon the stomach of the animal, enabling it to resist the inclemency of the weather. It saves labor. With a good supply of salt, one or two men can keep together a herd of cattle or a flock of sheep, grazing in the wilderness, with more ease than ten can without it. So strong is the force of habit in the brute creation, as well as in their lordly master, that it will bring together the widely scattered flock and herd, precisely at the time and place where they had been accustomed to receive their ration of this necessary condiment. Let the price of this article, Mr. President, said Mr. H., be so raised as to make it difficult to be obtained by the poor, and the inhabitants of many a Western cottage will go supperless to bed. If you were to pass through that country, sir, you would see, at the hour of sunset, the little tenants of many a hut looking anxiously for the return of their solitary cow, which, having wandered far into the wilderness, would not return to supply them with their nightly wholesome beverage, but in the expectation of receiving in return, from their hands, a luxury to her as acceptable as necessary.

If I am right, then, sir, said Mr. H., in the positions I have assumed, that the duty upon salt is burdensome to the poor, oppressive on agriculture—upon what principle of our Government can it rest for support? From its mode of operation on agriculture, as well as upon individuals, it is, indeed, in principle, a Turkish tax: for it acts not upon the products of agriculture, but upon the very source of its prosperity; not upon the flocks and herds, but upon the means of multiplying them; upon the seed, rather than the harvest; the scion, rather than the tree; the very germ upon which the hopes of future fruit depend.

It may be asked, sir, how a tax of this description could ever have been laid, or submitted to, in a Government like ours? It was commenced, said Mr. H., as soon as the present Constitution went into operation, when our finances were in a most desperate condition. Being an indirect tax, the People have felt its weight without exactly understanding it. As soon, however, as the affairs of our Treasury were in such a condition as to permit it to be done, the duty was entirely removed. This happened in the year 1807. It was again imposed at the commencement of the late war, but the representatives of the agricultural interest were with great difficulty prevailed upon to adopt it, and only from the understanding that it was to be considered as a war duty, to be taken off as soon as peace was restored. A very distinguished citizen of South Carolina, [Mr. Cheves] and who was at that time a leading member of Congress, has authorized me to say that such was the fact. Under various pretences, the duty has continued until this time.

Let us now, sir, said Mr. H., examine the objections which have been made to the proposed reduction. When the subject was under discussion at the last session, two were urged. First, that the revenue would be lessened to an amount which could not be spared; and, secondly, that it would break up the manufacture of the article in the country. It is easily demonstrable, that both these propositions cannot be maintained. If one is true, the other cannot be. Upon examining the returns from the Treasury, I find that the average amount of duty derived from salt, for the eleven years, commencing with 1816, and ending with 1826, is 725,804 dollars. The duty being 20 cents per bushel, and the bill proposing to take off 10 cents in two years, it follows that, if the average importation remains as it has been, the Treasury will, after the first year, lose the half of the above sum, being 362,902 dollars; but, if the consumption remains the same, the manufactures in the country cannot be injured, as they will continue to supply the same proportion as heretofore; but if, on the contrary, the reduction of the duty should be the means of introducing the imported article in such quantities as to take the place of the manufactured salt, it follows that the manufactures must be suspended; but the Treasury will suffer no loss, the increased quantity imported making up for diminished duty. I am, however, Mr. President, said Mr. H., perfectly convinced, that the proposed reduction of the duty will not have the unfavorable effect upon the manufactures which is predicted, and that it will not reduce the price of the domestic salt a single cent. I speak of that which is made in the Western country. I have in my hand, sir, said Mr. H., a statement, made at my request, by a Western merchant, of the greatest intelligence and of the fairest character. From this paper I learn that the foreign salt brought up from New Orleans to Cincinnati, in 1825 and 1826, cost the importers 1 dollar 10 cents per bushel. He makes the cost at this time 7½ cents for 50 pounds. If the reduction of duty should take place, as proposed by the bill, and as soon as the canal at Louisville shall have been completed, he estimates that it may be brought to Cincinnati for 66.7 cents per bushel of 50 lbs. As the importations cannot be made with any certainty but in the Spring, the salt then imported must remain in the warehouses until the following Winter. The loss sustained in the weight, the storage, and the interest upon the money, will not enable the importer to sell it for less than 70 cents; which is 20 cents higher than the present price of the domestic salt, and at least 30 cents higher than it can be made and sold for at a reasonable profit. From 1821 to the Fall of 1826, the price of the country salt at Cincinnati ranged from 25 cents to 40 cents. The average may be fairly estimated at 33½. Since that time it has, in consequence of a monopoly of the principal works, risen to 50 cents. This monopoly has been effected by the purchase of some of the works, and a contract made by the same individuals with the manufacturers at others, to take all the salt made at a given price. The profit made the last year by the persons who engaged in this speculation, is said to have amounted to 25 or 30,000 dollars each. This can easily be conceived, from the price they pay, and that which they receive for each bushel of salt. At the Kenhawa works, which, I believe, is the highest, they pay 18 cents per bushel for the salt of second quality, and 23 for the best. The cost of transportation from Kenhawa to Cincinnati, is from 20 to 50 cents per barrel of six bushels. The former when the waters are high, the latter when they are low, and the navigation difficult. The price now exacted by the monopolists is 50 cents per bushel, which gives them a profit of at least 22 cents. I have already shown that, after the proposed reduction is made, and the Louisville canal completed, which will permit a continuous voyage from New Orleans to Cincinnati, that the imported salt cannot be sold for less than 70 cents. The price current of that city, of the 14th March, which I hold in my hand, states the price at that time to be from 90 cents to 1 dollar. From these facts, it is evident, sir, said Mr. H., that the proposed reduction of the duty on imported salt will not break up the Western manufactures of that article; that it will not even reduce the present exorbitant profits of monopolists; for, the imported article, at 70 cents, will never, for ordinary domestic purposes, be purchased in preference to country salt at fifty cents. What, then, it may be asked, are the benefits to be derived from the passage of this bill? It will, in the first place, prevent the monopolists from increasing, in any great degree, their present price; and, secondly, it will enable the Western people to procure the imported salt at a cheaper rate, and which is essential to the proper preparation of one of their staple commodities. The Western pork, prepared with imported salt, enters into successful competition in the Atlantic ports with that of New England. The domestic salt will not preserve it in the Southern latitudes; through which it must pass to reach a market. All that is put up with it, is subjected, at New Orleans, to the process of resalting and repacking, at an expense of 1 dollar per barrel. So notorious are these facts, that our Navy Board (as the letter of Commodore Warrington, which I have in my hand, asserts) have directed that the contractors for the supply of pork for the Navy, shall use no Western salt in putting it up. Experience having shewn, as he says, that, even when mixed in the proportion of one-third foreign and two-thirds Western salt, that the meat has been lost. The exportation of salted pork has become of immense importance to the Western people. At the season for purchasing it, large sums of money are taken to Cincinnati by dealers from the Eastern cities; the hogs purchased in the drove, and there killed and salted. But the price of the pork is always governed by the price of foreign salt; and, if the article is not to be procured, the pork will not sell at all. Such was the case in the Autumn of 1825. There was no foreign salt in the market, and the drovers were unable to sell their hogs. The present high duty upon salt is, therefore, oppressive in every way upon the farmer. It increases his expenses and lessens his products, as I have before shewn, and deprives him of a market for that which he does raise. And what are the objects to be gained for all this injury? To put a few dollars more in an overflowing Treasury, and add exorbitant profits to wealthy monopolists. Sir, said Mr. H., I have no enmity to these gentlemen; they had a right to make contracts, and employ their money as they pleased, and I must do them the justice to say, that they have acted very moderately, in fixing the price of their salt at 50 cents, when they certainly had it in their power to sell it at 62½, or even 75 cents. But it is my duty to counteract them, and counteract them I will, if it be in my power. The friends of this bill, Mr. President, said Mr. H., who are also supporters of the general protecting system, have been accused of inconsistency. But it appears to me that the charge is entirely unjust. For myself, I am a warm advocate of the tariff; but I am so only because I think it eminently beneficial to the agricultural interests. Convince me that the system, or any part of it, bears oppressively upon that interest, and I will immediately abandon it. My judgment tells me that it will be far from producing this effect. If any injury is inflicted, it will be but partial and temporary; whilst its benefits will be extensive and permanent. But the duty upon salt is an intolerable burden upon the agriculturist now, and holds out no prospect of future advantage. Sir, said Mr. H., I could with more justice accuse the tariff-men who oppose this bill with inconsistency. One of their professed objects is to protect the wool-grower. But what farmer is there who will not tell you that a tax upon salt is a tax upon our own wool; since it is well known, that, in proportion to the quantity of salt that he uses, will be the condition and produce of his flock. I repeat, sir, that this duty is not in accordance with the spirit of our Government. In those of a despotic character, it has been borne with great impatience. Under the appellation of gabelle, it is known to have had a very powerful influence in producing the Revolution in France. It is, literally, a tax on the many, for the benefit of a few. I can see no reason why it should not be reduced.

In addition to the other objections, it is, as far as regards the Atlantic States, a very unequal burden. The domestic animals near the sea coast do not require salt. As you advance into the country, where, on account of the cost of transportation, the price is advanced, it becomes more necessary; and is absolutely indispensable to those which feed upon the rich and juicy pastures of the West. If I have considered this subject, sir, said Mr. H., principally in relation to its operation upon the Western States, it does not proceed from a disregard to the interests of those on this side of the Alleghany ridge. I would, with the greatest possible pleasure, vote to reduce, or entirely remove the duty, for the interest of the latter alone, if my own constituents were not immediately interested; for I never will consent to impose a tax that will operate unequally, if it can possibly be avoided; or convert this hall into an arena for the different sections of the Union to scramble for the advantage in assessing, on the People, the sums necessary for conducting the operations of the Government.

Mr. SANFORD said that the gentleman from Georgia seemed to think that his colleague had taken a very extraordinary course, in making the motion now before the Senate. I think, said Mr. S., differently; but my colleague is capable of defending himself, and I shall not attempt to do it. I do, however, think it rather extraordinary that the gentleman from Maryland should advise that the bill should not be discussed, because its friends have made up their minds. For my own part, I am always willing to hear discussion upon any topic of equal importance with this. It would be said, perhaps, that it was unnecessary to debate the subject, because it had been fully investigated last year, when the bill passed the Senate. But it passed last year under different circumstances from the present. Last year, and the year previous, there were large amounts of surplus in the Treasury. The reverse is now the fact. The whole surplus in the Treasury is now but 1,600,000 dollars, while, formerly, a surplus of 3,000,000 had not been found too large to cover the various purposes to which the fund was applied. The President, in his message on the opening of Congress, speaking of the present state of the finances, advises that the strictest economy be practised. Hence it was necessary to confine the appropriations not mentioned in the estimates, to the narrowest possible limits. Such, then, is the state of the revenue at this time, when we are called upon to reduce the duty on imported salt. Passing from this part of the subject, he observed, that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HARRISON] declares this to be an oppressive tax upon the agriculturist. But is this so? It is not a poll tax, although it is true that it is a tax of an article necessary, for human subsistence. But every man, whether poor or rich, is equally operated upon by it. Nor was this singular in being taxed. Every article which men eat or drink is also taxed in some way. The odium that had been thrown upon this tax was a mere prejudice.

It is said, by the gentleman, that this is a war tax. Let me, said Mr. S., correct my honorable friend on this head. This duty is not a war tax. He admitted that it originated during the war, and that it was undoubtedly resorted to as one of the means for raising funds during those times of exigency. But, since that period, the duty had been levied anew, both in the tariff of 1816 and 1824. In these acts, it could only be considered as a war tax, because all taxes are laid for the purpose of paying debts contracted in the last war. If it stands on the tariff of 1824, it is clearly no war tax.

[Mr. HARRISON here rose to explain. The tax was first laid in 1812. He was perfectly aware that it had been continued in subsequent acts.]

Mr. SANFORD resumed, and went into the history of the duty and its operation; but much of this part of his remarks were inaudible to the reporter. Two-thirds of the salt consumed in the country, he remarked, was imported. The other third was manufactured here, and it appeared to him that this fact would show that the protection was a very moderate one. The gentleman from Ohio, speaking of the trade in salt in his own State, speaks of a monopoly existing in the article. This was a very offensive word—but, even supposing a monopoly to exist, the best way to prevent its effects was to create a permanent domestic supply, to compete with the foreign supply. This would ensure to the consumer a moderate price on the article. The gentleman from Ohio, said Mr. S., is not, I believe, opposed to protection altogether. He does not object to a protecting duty on wool. He is willing to adopt the system of protection on a hundred other articles, yet he excludes salt. Although he is willing to tax articles that have always been exempt from duty, he is desirous of removing a duty from this article; a duty already existing. I cannot, said Mr. S., understand those gentlemen who confine their protection to particular things. For my own part, I discard that principle. In relation to the extent of the trade, the whole number of bushels consumed in this country was 9,000,000; of which 3,500,000 bushels were manufactured in this country. There was not an article in the whole list to which the argument in favor of protection applied so strongly as to salt. As to the policy of increasing the encouragement now given to imports, whether it was expedient or not, it certainly seemed proper to retain the encouragement which already exists. It was bad policy to change the present rate of the duty, as, in all such cases, capital was sacrificed which had been invested in the manufacture. Every encouragement of any species of production led to the investment of capital, which was on a subsequent change diminished or destroyed. On these grounds, perhaps most strongly on account of the present state of the revenue, he was opposed to the bill.

Mr. ROBBINS remarked, that imported salt now paid a duty of twenty cents the bushel, reckoning 56 pounds to a bushel. This bill proposed to reduce the duty to ten cents, not immediately, but in the short period of two years. Is this, asked Mr. R., a measure expedient for the public interest? For that interest is the "touchstone" that is to decide and settle this question, and all our tariff questions. If this measure will sacrifice a particular interest of the country; if it will even hazard that sacrifice; the question comes to this—whether the common interest requires this sacrifice? It would be strange, indeed, if it was found to be a fact that the common interest of the country required the sacrifice of one of its particular interests; a fact so strange as to be altogether incredible: for the common interest, though not identical with any one interest, is identical with them all; as it is made up of them all. It would, indeed, be an anomaly in political economy, if any one should be of so strange a character as to be incompatible with the common interest; and so incompatible, that the common interest should require its sacrifice; and it would be still more strange, if that interest should be the manufacture of an article of prime necessity.

I will assume, then, what no one will deny, that the common interest does not require the sacrifice of the domestic manufacture of salt, nor the hazard of such a sacrifice. Now, will this measure have this effect? I premise, if this is not certain—if it is only probable—even that probability is decisive against the measure: for it is incurring a risk which is not required by the public interest, and by which even that interest may suffer, and when, at best, it is but an unnecessary experiment. But I do not consider the effect as at all doubtful. It will, undoubtedly, affect this manufacture most seriously, most injuriously. But, before I go further, and attempt to deduce and exhibit the consequences of this measure upon this interest, let us pause for a moment here, and see what this interest is, which we so heedlessly strike at, and may so injuriously affect; what it may be, if continued to be fostered by this protecting duty, under which it has sprung into existence, and by which alone it can be sustained; and whether there are not considerations connected with it, which entitle it to a regard a little more favorable than is manifested by this bill.

Five millions of capital, at least, are already invested in this manufacture: for, in the single State of Massachusetts, the sea-shore salt works have a capital invested in them, as I am credibly, and, I believe correctly, informed, of upwards of two millions, and it would now have doubled that amount, but for the doubts created here of the continuance of the present protecting duty. A large amount of capital was ready to be invested, but the investment was suspended in consequence of these doubts, and never will be invested if the present duty is discontinued. Those establishments give, at present, to the proprietors a gross annual revenue of about $200,000, profits large enough for capital to the business, but not large enough to sustain it, if these profits are reduced as this bill would reduce them. As to the interior establishments of this manufacture, in New York, in Pennsylvania, in Virginia, and in the Western States, their gross capital must, at least, be more than double that of the seaboard establishments in the single State of Massachusetts. For I find that one establishment in New York, so long ago as 1820, was giving to that State, from a moderate duty only, a nett annual revenue of upwards of $60,000. We may then safely say, that the capital put to hazard by this measure is at least five millions of dollars.

And this manufacture is but in its infancy. It has but just surmounted the first difficulties, which are always the great difficulties to be encountered in the introduction and establishment of every new manufacture; and especially in a country to which manufactures are new. While laboring with these difficulties, the business was rather a losing business to the adventurers; in many instances the loss was serious—in some it was ruinous. But those difficulties are now all happily subdued. By the improved economy in the manufacture; by those helps which every manufacture is constantly acquiring to itself, from the suggestions of its own experience, and from that of others; and especially by those lights which science, from time to time, is shedding upon all the useful arts, and thereby contributing to their perfection; the business now has become a regular and profitable business, and will go on extending itself, if its further progress is not arrested by the success of this bill: for the field for this manufacture is unlimited, to say nothing of its interior resources, on the sea board that field is unlimited. We have fifteen hundred miles of sea coast; on every part of which this manufacture may be established to advantage; and in the South to more advantage than in the North. And if this protecting duty is continued, it will be extended till it reaches that ultimate limit at which every manufacture must be bounded; the ne plus ultra of demand on one side, and the minimum price of a living profit on the other. It is a kind of manufacture which may be carried on with small capitals as well as with large, and with small to equal advantage. It is within the competence of every sea-shore farmer possessed of but a moderate capital, and such as most of them do possess or may command. It is a manufacture, which, in proportion to its capital, draws less upon the manual labor of the country than any other; for the sun is the great elaborator: one hour in twenty-four is sufficient for the manual labor of the largest establishment; and one hand can perform that labor in a moderate establishment. The sea-shore farmer, then, without any increase of his hired labor, and without any material interruption of that labor, may manage this concern.

Already the domestic manufacture has reduced the price of this article between 20 and 30 per cent. compared with what it was before the establishment of the manufacture; and if the manufacture goes on extending itself, that falling price will go on falling till it reaches the minimum price at which it can be made; which will bring the article to every consumer at least 50 per cent. cheaper than it was when importation alone was depended on; or than it can be, if importation alone is to be depended on. That this will be the result, will be seen, when we come to trace the operation of this bill upon this manufacture, and the consequences of this operation. At present I ask credit for the statement; content that it be retracted, if you please, if that result is not then evident.

Consider that this is one of the great natural resources of the country developing itself, and to be developed; opening a wide and profitable field to its industry and its capital; opening springs, perennial springs of national wealth and of endless fertility; and that it is a resource, which, left to itself, is of no possible profit. Not like some of our other great natural resources, which, if neglected, are not wholly unproductive: as our wild lands, for instance, which, though not cultivated, are still growing in value, from the growing numbers of our population, and the progressive advance of our settlements. But this resource lies in the brine of the ocean, and the brine in the bowels of the earth; valueless where it is, and as it is; and, in that state, must forever remain valueless; but, if developed, will be a new faculty acquired to the country; and, if fully developed, one of almost infinite power.

Consider, too, that, in this peculiar manufacture, the whole capital is fixed, and that none of it, or next to none, is floating, and employed in hiring and subsisting labor, or in purchasing the gross material; and that, if you destroy this manufacture, you annihilate this capital. Not like capital in trade, which, if excluded from one channel, still remains entire, and may be employed in another; here it is annihilated and lost; lost as completely as if it was buried in the bottom of the ocean. By one legislative breath you are about to annihilate five millions of property, as well as to preclude yourselves from a resource of countless millions in future.

Now let us look to the operation of this measure upon this manufacture and to the consequences of that operation. One effect must be, to arrest the progress of this manufacture, and prevent its further extension. Of this there can be no question; for, if mere doubts of the continuance of this protecting duty have operated to keep back capital from this employment, which is known to be the fact—when these doubts are converted into a certainty, and the duty is discontinued, will capital go to that employment? It would be idle, it would be foolish, to expect it. Then all the residue of this great resource, of this wide and profitable field for industry and capital, is to be cut off at once, and lost to the country forever. But the mischief will not stop here; the measure will not only arrest the further progress of this manufacture; it will be, it must be, ruinous to it. For, consider the present state of things, and how that state has been produced. The domestic manufacture has deprived the foreign manufacturer, in a great degree, of this market; and, this being his great market, the consequence is, that salt, at all the foreign salt ports, has fallen to a mere drug—to less than 50 per centum below its former cost there. Now, by this measure, you will give to the foreign manufacturer a bounty of ten cents on every bushel. Then salt being to be purchased, at all the foreign salt ports, at less than half the former cost, and paying here only half the present duty, it can be imported and sold here, and at a profit, at less than it can be made here at present. Then it will be imported, and in immense quantities; all our markets will be glutted with it. Our manufacturers will struggle against the overwhelming ruin, but they will struggle in vain. They must be prostrated; their works must be abandoned. I speak with the utmost confidence as to all the sea-board establishments, and to all the interior establishments, whose salt is water borne to market; it may not be so ruinous to those more inland, and whose salt supplies an inland market; but to them it must be very injurious.

Now, when those establishments are prostrated and abandoned, what will be the consequence? Salt will begin to rise; it will rise here; it will rise abroad; it will rise till it reaches its former price; the monopoly price of the foreign monopolist; which is always the maximum price at which the thing can be sold, not the minimum price at which it can be made, as is always the case when the domestic manufacture is supported against the foreign competition. Now what will be the remedy for this state of things? It will be to re-establish the domestic manufacture. How can this be done? Only by re-establishing the protecting duty, which you are now about to repeal or reduce. Let me remark, here, that it will be much more difficult to re-establish the manufacture, by re-establishing the duty, than it has been to acquire the manufacture, by imposing the duty; for the adventurers will then know what before they did not know, that they are liable to be ruined by the instability of our legislation. It will be much, if their confidence gets the better of their fears, and they again venture their capital where it has once been lost, and may be again, from the same peril. Who would commit himself to the peril of quicksands, in which he had seen others and might find himself swallowed up and lost? Here I would invite the attention of the Senate to one topic, which, though a general one, has a direct bearing on this question, as well as on all questions of this class. If I could impress it upon others as it impresses itself upon my mind, I should flatter myself that its weight would be found most decisive in the present case.

The great difficulty in building up a State, by its policy, and especially a free State, is not so much in devising that policy, arduous as that is, as in persuading to the sacrifices incident to its adoption.

The excellence of all excellent policy is in a steady permanent adherence to its principle; without that adherence, the fruits of that policy cannot be realized; without it, the policy, however excellent in itself, ceases to be so in effect. Indeed it is the worse for that excellence: for it is in its nature costly, attended with sacrifices; but these are all to be made in the beginning. If, after these are made, the policy is departed from, all its evils have been borne, and none of its benefits have been realized; it has been productive purely of evil, which might have been avoided, by the vulgar policy of letting things alone, and leaving them to their natural course.

Every scheme of great national policy looks ahead, and to another day, for its full and perfect results. If the scheme be good in itself, and it be steadily adhered to, time, in due season, will bring these forth; and these have commonly been found to exceed in magnitude every anticipation, even the most sanguine that has been formed of them. It was the maxim of adhering to a policy once adopted and begun, that laid the foundation, and insured the military greatness of Rome; it was this that laid the foundation, and has insured the commercial greatness of Great Britain; and that greatness, in both instances, far exceeded the anticipations of either People. It is a remarkable fact in the political economy of Great Britain, that, in no instance in which they have adopted a policy for acquiring a manufacture within themselves, has she receded one iota from that policy, for one moment. The consequence has been, that she never has failed to acquire and establish that manufacture, however unpromising the attempt might seem to be; and another consequence also has been, ultimately, to obtain the article manufactured at a cheaper rate, and of a better quality, than it could be imported. And the proof is, that the same article has become an article of export, and finds a ready market in all other countries of the world, not excepting that from which it had been imported, and still might be imported. The silk manufacture, for instance, originally, would look like a most unpromising attempt; in the then experience of the world, it would seem forbidden by the very nature of things; the climate, seemingly ungenial to the tree, as not being indigenous to the soil; ungenial to that tender and delicate worm, which feeds upon the tree, and produces the gross material, and which then had never been found to exist, but in warmer latitudes. Yet the attempt was made, and has succeeded. Silks are now the second article in rank in the list of their exports; they are below their cottons, which is the first article, but is above their woollens, which is the third on the list.

The principle of that policy has been this: to give to the proposed manufacture such a protecting duty, as would ultimately give to it the exclusive market of the country, and to adhere to that principle steadily and unvaryingly, from time to time, and in all times, and not to suffer that adherence to be intermitted or remitted for a moment; to suffer no revolution of parties, no transition of power from one to another; to suffer no change of men in power; to suffer no change, even of the Government itself, to make any change in this adherence. The laws of nature herself are not more steady in their operations than has been their adherence to that principle. The consequence is, that she is now the wealthiest nation existing, or that ever has existed on earth; and, in her wealth, commands the means of more physical force than ever before was wielded by any one nation. Why is it that other nations of Europe, who have seen and would emulate the success of Great Britain, and by the same means, too, have fallen so much in her rear? It is because, though they have adopted the same policy, they have not adhered to it with the same steadiness. The policy with them has been more variable and fluctuating. It has by them been more timidly taken up, more faintly pursued, and, at times, weakly abandoned. The doctrines of Adam Smith had a charm to the Continental Nations of Europe, which they never had on his own nation, the British. Their own experience refuted his reasoning; the refutation was visible—was palpable to them, in their own prosperity, produced by a practice the reverse of his theory. The success of Great Britain is an experimental proof to her, it ought to be a monumental proof to other nations, of the falsity of his doctrines. But these nations, and especially Germany, was infatuated with these doctrines. She threw down all the restrictions, by which her own industry was protected; and threw open all her markets to the equal competition of all the world. Free trade was the cry all over that country. What was the consequence? Free trade, in a short time, paralysed and prostrated all her own manufactures; and with them, all their other interests. They all felt the blow of free trade, either directly or indirectly. Free trade was a common calamity to them all; and all went down together; and, in this prostrate condition, they lie to this hour: for, though her statesmen have long since waked from the dreams of their folly, they have found it much easier to destroy, than to rebuild what has once been destroyed. It must be so. Fluctuation in that policy by which a manufacture has been acquired, must be fatal to it; and when lost thereby, to every hope of its revival. When a manufacture is abandoned in consequence of the policy by which it was protected, that faith is gone which is necessary to induce a renewal of the adventure. What prudent man will risk capital where he sees it has been lost, and is equally expected to be so again? The ruin of former adventurers stands as a wreck upon the coast, to warn him to keep clear of its hidden dangers; and against following on in a track that had led others, and may lead him, to destruction. The question now is not whether we shall impose a duty, in order to acquire a manufacture, but, whether we shall continue a duty, in order to preserve a manufacture already acquired. If the effect of this measure shall be to destroy this manufacture, and that it will, I consider as a moral certainty, we may bid a final farewell to every hope of its future revival.

Mr. MACON said, that the Government was not the same now, as when he and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] first came into Congress. He thanked the gentleman from Ohio for bringing this bill forward; and would appeal to the candor of the gentleman from New York, whether the State he [Mr. MACON] represented was in a condition to bear the burden of this tax. The people did not complain, and probably sent fewer petitions to Congress than any other State; but they felt it severely. There were certain things which ought not to be taxed in any country—things that entered into the plain food of the poor and laboring classes, and which were necessary to sustain life. He had generally found, that, when the Senate did not want to pass a bill, it was argued that it would not be taken up in the other House. But that was no objection on this floor. The Senate was not to decide for the other House. When the bill came before them they should decide for themselves. This duty seemed to him in the light of stock which Congress had got out of the People, and which they were determined to hold on upon. If this bill were to pass in the Senate, and be rejected in the other House, it would make no difference in his opinion. I do not believe that the arguments of Mr. Anderson's book, quoted last year by the gentleman from New Hampshire, can be controverted. Neither do I consider that a more perfect exposition of the odiousness of this tax can be made, than was last year made by that gentleman [Mr. WOODBURY]. This article goes into every meal we eat. Not a mouthful goes down the poor man's throat, which is not seasoned with it. And why should not the duty be reduced? Because those who are engaged in the manufacture would get a less price. But, is even our food to be taxed because a few individuals own salt springs? He deprecated the principle which was fast gaining ground, of legislating partially in favor of one class of the community, which would have the effect, if not opposed, of establishing an oligarchy among us. What, said Mr. M. must unite the country? A fellow-feeling for all parts of it. If a single citizen's rights were touched, every man ought to feel as if the case were his own. But it could not be held that, if they got a road made for the benefit of one part of the country, and neglected another, there could be a fellow-feeling between them. Sir, said Mr. M. I will appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACON here addressed himself to Mr. VAN BUREN] if he did not find every thing in ruins in the State which I represent, when he passed through it—and whether the tariff has not destroyed us? I am glad the gentleman went there; and I hope he will go again. In the war, North Carolina was very much oppressed by the loss of commerce, and other injuries. And now she is equally burthened with this protective system. The principle of protection had been carried too far. When I was young, this word, protection, had a bad sound to me; and it is quite as bad now. It seems to mean that, where there is any place highly favored by nature, more must be done for it than for any other. This duty has been truly called a "war-tax." Nobody knows better that it is so, Mr. President, than you do. And I told you, on a former occasion, that I would never vote for a bill that had salt in it. Is this Government partial? What would you say of a parent that would feed one half of his children, and let the other starve? Salt sells now, in the market towns, higher than it formerly did in the interior of the country. It has been sold for 12½ cents, and the duty is now 20 cents per bushel; and the measure in those days was good—not your 56 lbs. It is a heavy article, and the transportation of it inland makes it cost, in many places, over 50 cents per bushel. The duty of 20 cents was first put on at the commencement of the war. Part of it was afterwards taken off. But it is now 20 cents. Those who voted for it then, said they would vote against it when the war was over. It is said that it is an article which cannot be smuggled—and is that a reason why it should be taxed? Is it good reasoning to say, that, because laces and silks can be smuggled, they must not be taxed as high as an article of necessity to the poor? They don't enter into the consumption of the poor man. Sir, said Mr. M., I have always considered this system of high duties as the strife of private interest against the public good. It had been said to the South, a few years ago, "only pass our tariff bill and your cotton will rise." But it has not. I don't know that they promised us a rise on tobacco. But we were told that it would increase the consumption of cotton. How does it turn out? With every kind of protection, instead of our manufacturers underselling the foreigners, the foreigners undersell us. They go away with good prices. He saw, by a Boston paper, not long since, that the prices had not fallen. The promise was, however, that every thing should fall; and it reminds me of the maxim that, "while the grass grows the steed starves." He thought he should die before there would be any fall. Sir, I think, said Mr. M. that we are so frightened about foreign products, that we would be almost willing to starve ourselves, and go naked, rather than eat and wear them. The full intention of this system seems to be, that we are to have nothing but what is made in this country. Sir, if the Southern States had looked as sharp after their own affairs as the North have, where would the great export trade have come from? In nothing ought equality to be more strictly observed, than in taxation. But every body knows, that, if you collect in one part of the country, and expend in another, you do not deal equally. It was an old fashioned opinion, with him, that the maxim which directed that every body should be let alone, and do that which they could do best, contained a sound doctrine. Free trade and sailor's rights, was formerly the motto of our system; but now, every point must be settled by law. He had hoped that this bill would pass;

but his hopes were now very faint. Whether it did or did not, he should always be of opinion that justice required its passage.

Mr. BRANCH made a few remarks in support of the bill.

Mr. HAYNE said, that the gentleman from New York was right as to the effect of the bill, should it pass. It would, doubtless, reduce the price; but it was questionable whether the revenue would be at all diminished. In political arithmetic, two and two did not always make four. It was well acknowledged, that, as the duty was reduced on articles of prime necessity, in the same ratio the consumption would increase. If, therefore, by the operation of this bill, the consumption of salt should be increased one third in the year, there would, as far as the revenue was concerned, be no reduction at all, and the People would be enabled to get the quantity wanted by them of this article at a much lower price.

The gentleman from New York supposes that there will be no increase of consumption, in consequence of this measure. But he is, surely, in error. Every individual would have a larger allowance, and it would be used largely in husbandry, both as manure and for fattening of cattle. And, said Mr. HAYNE, my life upon it, instead of only increasing one-third, the increase of consumption will be much larger. The gentleman was also mistaken as to the fact of this duty being originally a war tax. He thinks that it was not. But how does he reconcile his opinion to the fact, that it was laid on at the suggestion of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, during the war, and that it was taken off on the return of peace? It was a curious fact, that, of the whole budget reported by that Committee, laying imposts to carry on the war, but one was rejected by the House; and that was the duty on salt; and it was stated in the Senate, last year, that the members, in order to carry their point, pledged themselves that it was a war-tax only, and not intended to remain in existence in times of peace. The duty on salt, therefore, is emphatically a war-tax, and nothing else. He had no design to enter into a general argument on the bill, but rose merely to correct the Senator from New York.

Mr. SANFORD said that the renewal of the duty in 1816 proved that it was not a war measure. If so, then the duties laid on every other article, by the law of that year, came under the denomination of war-taxes.

Mr. HAYNE said, in reply, that names were not things, as could be easily demonstrated. The gentleman supposed that this is not a war-tax, because it was included in the act of 1816. But I say it is a war-tax, said Mr. H. because it originated during the war, and to carry it on.

The bill was then laid on the table.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to graduate the price of public lands was taken up; and the substitute offered by Mr. BARTON for the original bill, being under consideration—

Mr. BENTON addressed the Senate at considerable length, advocating the original bill.

TUESDAY, APRIL 8, 1828.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill from the House making appropriations for Internal Improvement, was taken up, together with sundry amendments reported to the bill by the Committee on Finance.

The principal amendment under consideration was a proviso that the appropriation of 30,000 dollars for surveys should be expended on no other surveys but those already commenced. It was explained by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland. He observed that a majority of the committee had agreed to this amendment. Surveys had already been made of certain works, and if this amendment passed no new ones would be commenced until those now in progress were completed. He had not agreed with his colleagues on the committee, in recommending this amendment; and it was for the Senate to consider whether it was expedient to deprive those States to which surveys had not been extended, of any of the benefits of this appropriation, until those were completed which were already commenced.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, opposed the amendment, on the ground that, now that all the larger States had been listened to, and all their plans had been completed, it was unjust to cut off those smaller or more remote States that had hitherto asked no assistance. He was also against the amendment, because the other House had fully discussed this appropriation, and had decided in its favor. From that fact, it was obvious that they would not adopt the amendment, even if it should pass the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, did not think the Senate had any thing to do with the decisions of the other House. He went with the gentleman from Louisiana, as to the effect of the amendment. Mr. S. then handed the Secretary a letter from the Secretary of War; which was read. He also laid on the table a statement of the different items of expenditure for surveys, and the objects on which they had been expended.

Mr. RUGGLES opposed the amendment, as a departure from the intentions of the act of 1824. He thought the best manner of employing the graduates from West Point, during a time of profound peace, was in surveying the unexplored parts of the country, and developing its resources. He thought, also, that injustice would be done by breaking off the surveys at the present time.

Mr. WEBSTER inquired as to the reasons of the committee in reporting the amendment. He understood that the chairman [Mr. SMITH] was opposed to it. He therefore desired information from some one of the gentlemen who formed the majority of the committee.

Mr. PARRIS explained at some length the views of the members of the committee, observing that the power of making surveys had not hitherto been extended beyond the scope and purpose of the act of 1824. Many surveys had been made for other than national objects, and many for the benefit of individuals or corporations. It was thought better to finish what had been begun, than to go on with any new works, before the others were completed. It was also believed, that if the numerous surveys now projected, were progressed with, it would require that the Engineer corps should be enlarged.

Mr. WEBSTER opposed the amendment at considerable length. He thought it would have been better to move to repeal the law of 1824, or to have struck out the appropriation. He was in favor of the act of 1824, and he had rejoiced in its operation. As to the complaint that these surveys had been exercised for States, for individuals, and corporations, he saw no objections to such an exercise of the power, as it mattered not whether objects of public utility were proposed by corporations, which had very often more regard to public good than to private interest. As to concluding the surveys commenced, he did not see the benefit which would arise from such a course, as the whole system was one of comparison. Many plans were presented for one work; and, until the whole subject should be brought before Congress, they could not decide upon it. He objected to the amendment, because it would withhold from those States that had not applied for assistance the benefits which had been felt by others. The Engineer corps could not be employed better than in exploring the country and opening its resources. He wished to see the great work go on, and that no impediments might be thrown in its way.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, expressed himself as hostile to the amendment. He wished the provision might be left open. The Baltimore Rail-road Company had received aid from the United States' Engineers, which was of great value; and he understood that similar aid was wanted in South Carolina. He should feel great regret were this amendment to cause it to be withheld from that State, or any other which might be in need of it.

Mr. CHANDLER thought they had better go on and complete what had been begun; but he wished, after that was done, the work might go on as usual. He, therefore, moved to amend the amendment, so that other projects might be progressed in, after those already under survey were completed, by inserting the words, "until the surveys already commenced are completed."

Mr. McLANE signified his approbation of Mr. CHANDLER's amendment; and proceeded to reply, at some length, to certain remarks of Mr. WEBSTER. He was as much an advocate of the act of 1824 as that gentleman; but he wished to confine those surveys to the limits fixed by that act—to national objects only. His object in advocating in the committee the amendment reported, was to bring back the system of surveys to its original grounds, and restrict it to its constitutional province. He considered that Congress ought not to authorize surveys of works which it was not the intention of Congress to complete. They had been carried much farther, and local objects had been surveyed which were never embraced in the law of 1824. He did not lay this fault to the Secretary of War; but members of Congress had made representations to the Secretary, on which he thought himself authorized to detail a party of Engineers to make surveys. Thus he had been deceived, and the United States' officers engaged in duties not authorized by the law under which they acted. He thought that, if a State projected a work of a local nature, and required the science of the United States' Corps of Engineers, their aid ought to be given; but then the State ought to pay the expense of it.

Mr. WEBSTER opposed the amendment offered by Mr. CHANDLER. He did not see that the amendment reported by the committee would effect the object of the gentleman from Delaware—to bring the exercise of the power of making surveys to those of objects exclusively national. It was said that many of those surveys which had been made thus far, were of a local nature, and how would the amendment, which proposed merely that they should all be completed before any others were commenced, effect that object? If all those surveys were to be completed, whether national or local, how did the amendment confine them to national works? Mr. W. spoke at some length in demonstration of the difficulty that existed in fixing upon what works were really national or local.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, referred to the list of works which had been surveyed, and were now in progress, (which was read by the Secretary,) and contended that it did not contain a single object which was not of a national character.

Mr. McLANE replied to Mr. WEBSTER at considerable length. He thought the gentleman had departed from the ground at first taken by him. If he had not misunderstood him, he declared his willingness to increase the number of Engineers, and to prosecute surveys of a local as well as national character.

[Here Mr. WEBSTER explained, that he had said he was willing to allow the surveys to go on as far as the law would authorize, whether for objects adopted by a State or corporation.]

Mr. McLANE continued his remarks, and went at some length into the consideration of the distinction between national and other works. He also commented in answer to the remarks of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, upon the list of surveys, pointing out several which he maintained were not of a national character.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill was laid on the table.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill to graduate the price of the public lands, was taken up; and the substitute offered by Mr. BARTON being still under consideration—

Mr. BENTON continued his speech (commenced yesterday) in support of the original bill.

About 3 o'clock, Mr. BENTON moved an adjournment, intimating that he should continue his remarks to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1828.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Md. the bill making appropriations for Internal Improvement was again taken up. The amendment of Mr. CHANDLER to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, in relation to surveys, being under consideration, the question was taken and it was rejected.

The question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou., rose to reply to some remarks of Mr. McLANE, made in the debate of yesterday. He considered that, if the gentleman from Delaware had examined the subject with his usual accuracy, he would have found that, in the list of surveys, alluded to by him, not one of them were other than of a national character.

Mr. J. spoke at length on the difficulty of defining the terms of the bill of 1824, and of pointing out exactly the meaning of the words "national importance."—He believed that the Secretary of War had adhered strictly to the meaning of the bill, and had been correct in his construction. The list of surveys, amounting to 69, was swelled to that amount by the subdivision of the different objects. Many of those which the gentleman from Delaware looked upon as local, had been ordered by Congress, and many of them were connecting links in the great chain of national works. It was impossible that it should be known, whether a work was of great national importance, until it had been surveyed. When that was done, and the reports laid before Congress, they would be able to decide whether it was or was not proper to make appropriations for the work—in fact, whether they were objects of national importance. He believed that the act of 1824, had been strictly adhered to.

Mr. McLANE replied, and remarked, that the gentleman from Louisiana had misconceived him. He said nothing against any object proposed to be carried into effect by this bill; but, on the contrary, was in favor of its provisions. His remarks, yesterday, had been confined to surveys; and his only desire was, that they should be confined to the limits contemplated by the act of 1824. His objection was to the employment of the corps of United States' Engineers for objects entirely local. Such he considered the Rail Road in Maryland, which ran from point to point in that State. He was, as he had yesterday declared, willing that the States should have the benefit of the science of the corps; but the extra expense ought to be defrayed by the States in all such cases. The gentleman from Louisiana, and himself, perfectly agreed as to the difficulty of deciding whether an object was national or not; and they also agreed in thinking that Congress ought to decide the question. The power of surveying a road, Mr. McL. considered to be derived from the power of making it; therefore, he did not think it the proper course to search the whole country for national objects by means of surveys, which had nothing to do with the matter, but to elucidate the practicability of the plans previously designated. As far as the law of 1824 went, he was willing to go. But he could not believe that it was even contemplated by that law, that a member of Congress, on his mere motion, should cause a survey to be made, whether of a national or local object. In making such surveys, he was fully satisfied that the act of '24 had been departed from.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, replied, at considerable length, and combated the opinion expressed by Mr. McLANE, as to the local value of certain objects, particularly the Rail Road in Maryland. He thought it a strange proposition, that the United States should hire out their Engineers to the States. He could not comprehend the distinction drawn by Mr. McL. between local and national works; and considered it not altogether a good argument, that, although the United States could not survey a road which they had no right to make, the corps of Engineers could be detailed to survey roads for the States of an entirely local character. The power of surveying, although derived from the power of Congress to make roads, was nevertheless exerted of necessity previous to their construction, and even before a decision in favor of their construction. It was by no means certain that surveys were to be followed up by appropriations. It was neither proper nor useful that Congress should take from the Secretary of War the direction of the surveys for the defence of the country. Each Department ought to move in its own proper sphere; and while scientific men were employed in obtaining the necessary knowledge for framing an effectual system of defence, Congress ought not to thwart their plans. He was averse to the plan of allowing all the minor works to be delayed until the greater ones were finished, as it would keep those States, in which only subordinate improvements were necessary, in the back ground for a series of years. The money expended for these objects ought to be distributed as equally as the circumstances of the country would allow. As to the conduct of the Secretary of War, he believed that he had acted with propriety, and that the discretion had better remain in his hands.

Mr. HAYNE next rose, and went at large into argument in favor of the amendment, bestowing much censure on the manner in which the discretion of the Secretary of War had been exercised in pointing out objects for survey. He had formerly been in favor of the act of 1824, and he had learnt a lesson in legislation, which he should carry to his grave. He was not then aware that the most important question in passing a law, was not "what its benefits would be, but to what extent its provisions might be abused." He was not then aware that the consideration in granting power to a public officer, was not what the effect of its legitimate exercise would be, but to what extent it might be transcended, and misapplied. He then went into a consideration of the extent to which the power of the Government to make internal improvements, had been declared by the act of 1824, and maintained, that, instead of adhering to the works designated by that law, objects of every description had been surveyed. He recollected that, at the time of the passage of that act, only a few great national objects were designated. But the system, instead of being confined to those bounds, had been extended to innumerable surveys in every part of the country, of objects, whether national or local, and promised to become interminable. Every road, every canal, was said to be national. Sixty-nine have already been commenced, and the Secretary of War had reported thirty-eight more. For all this the Engineer Corps was incompetent: as he had been informed by a gentleman attached to it, that the completion of the surveys already commenced are sufficient to occupy the present corps, and that other works could not be begun, without an increase of the number of the corps. He saw no object in going on in this manner, but one, and that was to commit the country continually in new and unfinished projects. Thus, from year to year, the country would be in the same situation, and at the end of ten years, they would be no nearer the end of the system than at present, after having surveyed the whole face of the country. The effect of this system, he declared, would be to raise false hopes, and paralyze the exertions of the States themselves, in projecting and carrying on local improvements.

Mr. McLANE, in further reply to Mr. JOHNSTON, said, that he did not propose to hire the Engineer Corps of the United States to the States. He merely proposed, that, when they were not otherwise occupied, their services might be employed for local objects in the several States, and that then their extra expences should be defrayed by the States. It was not a new idea with him. The same course had formerly been practised, and the departure from it, in late years, was the cause of the torrent of complaint that had been brought against internal improvement. In reply to some other remarks of Mr. JOHNSTON, he observed, that no great system of internal improvement had been reported to Congress. The Secretary of War had departed entirely from the object of the law of '24; and it was the design of the Committee, in reporting the amendment, to confine the power of the Secretary within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, rejoined. He could not perceive how, (Mr. J. observed,) if the United States could survey no works but such as they could go on with and complete, they could employ their Engineers in the service of the States. Such had been his meaning in his previous remarks. He replied to the observations of Mr. HAYNE. It was a complaint that the system had been carried on irregularly. It was true; but the reason was, that the friends of the system could not do otherwise. The opponents of the system prevented them. He thought the gentleman from South Carolina defined too narrowly the powers granted by the bill; and observed, that the power given to the Secretary of War to cause surveys to be made for the defence of the country, was a most vague and general power, and that the dependence must always be upon Congress to exercise its wisdom and discretion, in deciding upon what course was right. He had a list of six surveys of improvements of a national character, made before the passage of the act of '24, which had been done under the power to provide for the defence of the country. A thousand difficulties were in the way of this system. And it was impossible, under the circumstances, that it could go on any better than it had. He hoped the amendment would not be adopted, and moved that the question be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was then taken, and the following vote was given:

YEAS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, McKinley, McLane, Macon, Parris, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Woodbury.—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Benton, Boulligny, Chase, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Ky. Johnston, of La. Kanc, Knight, Marks, Robbins, Rugles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md. Thomas, Webster, Wiley.—21.

Graduation of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

The VICE PRESIDENT rose, and said : The Chair votes in the affirmative. The Chair has no doubt if the system is not confined to the provisions of the law of 1824, it will, and ought to run down. He then observed that this was no new opinion—that when the law was framed, he was at the head of the Department of War, and had made a report upon the subject ; and concluded by a remark which was not clearly understood by our Reporter, in which a message of the President of the United States was mentioned.

So the amendment was adopted.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to graduate the price of public lands was then taken up, the substitute offered by Mr. BARTON being still under consideration.

Mr. BENTON again took the floor, and concluded his remarks.

[Here follows the speech of Mr. B. in a connected form.]

Mr. BENTON began with saying that he had meditated the subject matter of this bill for eight years, and had been at work upon it for four years. He had begun to think of it in the year 1820, when he was a private citizen in Missouri ; and had begun to give it form and effect as a legislative measure in the Spring of 1824, when he asked and obtained leave from the Senate to introduce his first bill for reducing the price of the public lands. That bill had been brought in, and with some modifications had been annually renewed ever since. It had been discussed on several occasions, but never pressed to a final vote, because he knew that, on a subject of so much magnitude, time must be allowed for public opinion to develop itself, and for the minds of Senators to consider what ought to be done. That time had been allowed. Four years had elapsed since he first brought in his bill, and two since he had made a full exposition of its merits to the Senate. Public opinion had developed itself, at least in the West, from which numerous memorials and petitions had been received in favor of the bill ; and the minds of Senators were ready to proceed from consideration to judgment, as the votes and speeches of several will prove, who were at first doubtful of the merits of the bill, and who are, now ready to declare in its favor.

Mr. B. then stated the objects of his bill to be, first to benefit the public treasury by accelerating the sales of the public lands ; and, next, to benefit the new States by procuring for them, within some reasonable time, the use of all the soil within their limits, for the purposes of settlement, taxation, and general jurisdiction. The sales, he said, were too slow at present to answer these purposes. They scarcely advanced at all, and certainly made no sensible impression on the mass of the public lands. The Federal Government held 260 millions of acres in the States and Territories, to which the Indian title had been extinguished ; about 50 millions more to which it had not been extinguished ; about 90 millions on the Upper Mississippi, between the State of Illinois and Lake Superior, and about 700 millions west of the Mississippi and east of the Rocky Mountains ; making 1,100 millions of acres of undisputed public domain, exclusive of our territorial claims and possessions in the valley of the Columbia river and on the coast of the Pacific Ocean. Of this immense mass no more than 20 millions of acres have been sold by the Federal Government in a period of 40 years ; and only 32 millions of purchase money paid into the Treasury : from which is to be deducted $2,165,000 for the expense of surveying ; $1,155,000 for the expenses of selling ; $35,000 per annum for expenses of the General Land Office ; $3,392,000 for the expense of holding Indian treaties for the extinction of Indian titles ; and annuities, chiefly permanent, amounting at present to about $240,000 per annum. The gain to the Treasury would be but little from such sales ; and as to the new States and Territories, a simple question in the Rule of Three would show that it would take 520 years to extinguish the Federal title within their limits, at the rate the sales had been going on for the forty years past, and about 2000 years more to complete the sales to the head of the Mississippi and to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. Having stated these results, Mr. B. suggested to the Senate that 520 years was rather too long a period for the new States to remain without the privilege of taxing and cultivating the lands within their limits ; rather too long for the public debt to remain unpaid, and for the people of the old States to continue to raise money from other sources to pay its annual interest.

Mr. B. then took up the bill, and stated the nature of its several provisions. He said that it consisted of four distinct clauses, comprised in five sections ; and that each clause presented a separate question for the consideration and decision of the Senate. The first clause applied the graduation principle to the lands which had been heretofore offered at public sale, and remained unsold at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre ; the second clause applied the same principle to the lands hereafter to come into market ; the third clause proposed donations of small tracts to actual settlers ; and the fourth made provision for the cession of the refuse lands to the States in which they lie, for the promotion of the great cause of education and Internal Improvement.

Having stated the nature of the different clauses in his bill, Mr. B. went on to examine these clauses in the order in which they stood, and to show their practical effect upon the public lands and the public Treasury. For this purpose he took up the first clause, which applied the graduation principle to the lands now in market, and said that the proper decision of it required a knowledge, first, of the quantity, and, secondly, of the quality of the lands, to which it would apply. As the author of the bill, he felt it to be his duty to give to the Senate full and correct information upon those points, and he should do so with all the brevity and precision which the magnitude of the subject would admit of. He had been collecting this information for many years, and without pretending to the minute accuracy of a clerk stating an account, he would confine himself to round numbers, and assure the Senate that his statements would be found to be sufficiently correct and particular for all the practical purposes of the statesman and the legislator.

On the first point, he would say, that the number of acres on which the first clause of his bill would operate, was about 80 millions, and he verified this statement by showing from printed documents and manuscript memorandums, taken from the General Land Office, that the quantity of public land surveyed, was 140 millions of acres ; the quantity sold was 20 millions ; the quantity given away, reserved from sale, or not brought into market, was 40 millions ; leaving the aforesaid quantity of 80 millions of acres for the application of the first clause in his bill. So much for the quantity. On the second point, Mr. B. would say, that he had a great deal of personal knowledge of the quality of these lands. They lay in seven States and three Territories ; and of each of these, except one Territory, that of Michigan, he had a personal knowledge from travelling and visits ; and although the soil of the whole of them might be characterized as rich, yet, as the fattest animal must have bones and offal, and inferior parts, so the richest country must have its rocks, and hills, and sterile spots. This was essentially true of the States and Territories which contained the public lands ; and of the relative proportions of good and bad, those to the South possessed much the largest alloy of bad. In every State and Territory these lands had been picked ; in the forks of the Ohio and Missisissippi, chiefly under the laws of the United States; and in the others, for a long time, under the bountiful dispensations of foreign sovereigns, before they became subject to the more rigorous system of the Federal Government. The eighty millions unsold was the residuum of repeated pickings and cullings, by sales and donations, for periods of ten, fifty, and an hundred years, under four different sovereignties, and might be assumed to be at least one half unfit for cultivation, and worth nothing at all, and the other half alloyed in all assignable proportions with mixtures of bad land, and hardly worth an average of forty or fifty cents per acre.

Having made this general statement, which he treated as the proposition of his subject, Mr. B. proceeded to sustain and verify it by a rapid view of the actual condition of the public lands in the different States and Territories. Passing over the State of Tennessee, in which the Federal Government held a residuary and contingent interest in some lands derived from North Carolina, and which he conceived to be of too little value to justify the expense of setting up the official machinery which it would require to survey and sell it, and which ought to be ceded at once to the State for the improvement of its roads and rivers, he would proceed to the States in which his bill would find an ample and appropriate field for the operation of its respective clauses. At the head of these States he would place Louisiana, contrary to the received opinion which assigned that station to Ohio. Louisiana, in point of early and considerable settlement, was one of the oldest States in the valley of the Mississippi; and, in point of territorial alienations, was certainly the State most completely dispossessed of its good lands, and, therefore, most ripe and ready for the operation of the different clauses, and especially of the two last clauses of the Graduation Bill. It had been settled above an hundred years ago, and the alienations of its soil, by the gratuitous donations of the Kings of France and Spain, amounted to five millions of acres before its transfer to the United States. Since that epoch, no more than 182,000 acres had been sold, and the bare statement of this fact, included the whole argument in favor of a change in the mode of selling there. Louisiana was situated in the southern latitudes, in a climate adapted to the cultivation of the rich products of cotton, sugar, rice, and indigo. Twenty-five millions of acres of her soil were vacant, and three land offices were in operation; yet, in a period of a quarter of a century, no more land had been disposed of than the pitiful quantity he had named. The inference was obvious and irresistible. The valuable lands were taken under the former governments; the remainder is not worth the minimum price which is set upon it. All the alluvion grounds upon the margins of the Mississippi, the Red River, the Washita, and their bayous; the best of the uplands in Attakapas, Opelousas, and back of Baton Rouge, are held in private hands; and the vast extent of pine woods, prairies, and inundated plains, are more fit for donations—the former to herdsmen, who would cover them with cattle, and the latter to planters, who would reclaim them—than to any system of sales that could be devised. The donation and the cession clauses of the bill were peculiarly desirable to Louisiana. She had applied for them through her Legislature. Her Senators on this floor (Messrs. JENKINSON and BOULIER), seconded her wishes. To refuse her request, would be to make light of the prayers of a sovereign State, and to doom the most exposed point in the Union to remain longest without an adequate population to sustain and defend it.

The State of Ohio was second to Louisiana in the list of States most ripe and ready for the operation of the Graduation Bill. She had seven millions of acres to be disposed of under it, out of fifteen millions which the Federal Government once owned within her limits. The quality of these seven millions comprehended all the varieties of second and third rate lands, with a large proportion of what was unfit for cultivation. They were the refuse of above forty years of sales, made first at one dollar per acre, in certificates of the public debt; afterwards, at two dollars per acre, under the credit system; and, since 1820, at one dollar twenty-five cents per acre, for ready money. Several millions of these seven might be sold in four years at the different prices fixed in the bill. The balance, comprehending all that would not command twenty-five cents per acre, would fall to individuals under the donation clause or to the State, under the cession clause; and by the State Legislature, with its intimate knowledge of localities and near superintendence, might be made available, in no inconsiderable degree, in promoting the great cause of education and internal improvement.

Alabama was the third State to which Mr. B. adverted. Her superficial content was thirty-three millions of acres; of which the Indians held eleven millions, the Federal Government about eighteen millions, and individuals about three and a quarter millions. The quantity to be affected by this bill was about fourteen millions; of which he would say that much the largest portion was unfit for cultivation. The good land of the State lay on the margins of the rivers, or in bodies which had chiefly been sold; the unsold part consisted of pine woods, worth but little. The graduation clause of the bill would not have a very extensive operation in this State. Her soil changed suddenly from good to bad. The richest and the poorest were often in contact. The intermediate qualities of second and third rates, were not in proportion to the two extremes of best and worst. The donation and cession clauses would be necessary to free that State from vacant land, and bring all her soil under the dominion of private owners. Mr. B. then referred to the memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, praying for the passage of the Graduation Bill, commenting upon the deference which was due to her request, and making his thanks for the manner in which his name had been mentioned in the memorial.

The State of Mississippi claimed his next attention. This State, he said, was almost entirely in the hands of the Indians and the Federal Government, and it was difficult to decide which of the two opposed the greatest bar to her prosperity. Only one million and three-quarters had been sold by the Federal Government, out of thirty millions of acres which the State contained; and out of nine millions which had been surveyed, only about seven would come under the operation of this bill. Of these seven millions, he could safely say, and on appealing to one of her Senators, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) he was confirmed in the declaration, that more than half of it was unfit for cultivation. The general face of the State was subject to the same description which he had given of Alabama, and he would not trouble the Senate with repetitions where a reference would answer. He would barely stop for a moment in his rapid view of the condition of the new States, to say that the fate of Mississippi had been peculiarly hard. She comprehended within her limits the most ancient of the European settlements on the gulf frontier of the United States—the Biloxi—which was settled by the French in 1680. Her chief town, Natchez, became the residence of a white population above an hundred years ago. In 1783, the chief part of her territory became annexed to the Union by the terms of the treaty with Great Britain. In 1798, she was formed into a Territory, and in 1817 erected into a State. Such are the dates of her civil and political existence; yet at this late day, after the lapse of a century and a half from her first settlement, nearly half a century from the incorporation of her soil with the Union, thirty years from the time of her erection into that primary political state called a Territory, and eleven years after her elevation to the rank of a sovereign State, and with a form and magnitude and natural advantages to rank with the great States, she still remains, in the political scale, among the smallest, and, what was worse, seemed there most likely to remain. The Indians held half her land, and the best half, and refused to sell it; the Federal Government held nearly the whole of the remaining half; and while pretending to sell, was, in reality, locking up the lands from sale, by the operation of an arbitrary minimum, which set purchasers and bidders at absolute defiance. The donation and cession clauses of his bill, presented the remedies of which this State stood most in need.

Mr. B. proceeded to his own State, Missouri, the State of his adoption, to which he owed faithful, grateful, and devoted services, for the signal honor of two elections to the Senate of the United States, in the first eleven years of his residence there. She needed the beneficent operation of all the clauses of the graduation bill, as the statement he was about to submit would pre-eminently show. Her superficial content was forty millions of acres; her surveyed lands amounted to twenty-three millions, and the sales under the laws of the United States to one million. The quantity subject to the operation of this bill, would be about half the quantity surveyed, the remainder having been disposed of in donations, or in satisfaction of New Madrid claims, or military bounties, or never having been brought into market, or having been reserved from sale on account of private claims, or on suspicion of containing lead, or iron ore, or salt water. All these appropriations and reservations reduced the large amount of surveyed lands to the quantity of ten or eleven millions of acres, which would come under the operation of his bill. The quality and actual value of these ten or eleven millions was the next part of the inquiry. To answer this inquiry with full and entire effect, Mr. B. said it was necessary to indulge in some historical recollections—to go back to the year 1764, when Upper Louisiana, now constituting the State of Missouri, was a province of the Spanish Monarchy, and began to be settled by emigrants from Illinois, from Canada, and from Europe. The Spanish Government then, as now, was a perfect despotism; but, in one respect, namely, in the distribution of the crown lands among the king's subjects, was truly parental. It gave to whomsoever would take; and it is worthy of remark, that the effective words of distribution in the ordinances of the kings, and in the testamentary devises of parents, were always the same, "repartir," and "repartimientos." After the year 1790, these parental distributions were not confined to Europeans or their immediate descendants. Spain conceived the idea of strengthening Upper Louisiana, and settlers from the United States were admitted to the king's bounty, upon the liberal terms which had been enjoyed by his old subjects. Under these bountiful dispensations the country had become extensively settled, and its choice lands widely appropriated, before the province changed masters in 1803, and passed into the hands of the United States. The counties of New Madrid, Cape Girardeau, Ste. Genevieve, St. Louis, and St. Charles, each as large as the third-rate States of this Union, possessed a population in number, wealth, and intelligence, which enabled them to sustain the organization of our judicial system, and all the regulations of county government, the instant the change of sovereignty took effect. The settlements extended for above 200 miles from north to south, from below New Madrid to above St. Charles. The grants and concessions of land extended still further; they reached west into the Boonslick country, and north into the Salt River country, each above an hundred miles from the limits of the settlements. These concessions were choice selections made at the will of the grantee, and located according to his pleasure. They amounted to near three millions of arpens; of which about one million had been confirmed under the laws of the United States, and the remainder, being reserved from sale by a law of Congress of 1811, will not be subject to be disposed of under any clause of this bill. From this statement, Mr. B. said it would be seen that the country had been extensively picked of its good lands before it came into the hands of the United States—that the cream had been taken off, and it was a dish of skimmed milk when the Federal Government sat down to it; and, since that time, it had been picked again by sales, by pre-emption rights, by New Madrid claims, by donations, by reservations, and by military bounties, until what was left unsold at $1 25 per acre, was essentially a refuse; comprehending much that was unfit for cultivation, much that was second and third rate, and perhaps not a single quarter section that could be deemed first rate. At a minimum of $1 25 per acre, the sale of such lands could not be accomplished in ages and centuries to come; at graduated prices, as regulated in the bill, several millions of acres would be sold in five years; the Federal Treasury would get its real value; the People would have it for cultivation, the State for taxation; timber would be saved, instead of being destroyed; many poor families would be furnished with homes, and would love and cherish the Government whose bounty they enjoyed; and what would not sell for 25 cents per acre, could be made available by the State Legislature, for the meritorious objects of improving the minds of the People and the face of the country.

Mr. B. said, that when he brought in his bill in 1824, the Legislature of Missouri had sent in a memorial praying for its passage; and at the present session he had presented petitions for the same purpose, signed by upwards of four thousand inhabitants of the State. Of the character which had been given on this floor of the signers of these petitions, he would say that it was as unjust in fact as it was ungenerous in manner; that the petitioners were persons of respectability; and that, if he had time to read over the names, the Senators from all the middle States, and especially from Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio, would recognize many of their connexions, and many of their oldest and most esteemed friends and neighbors.

The State of Illinois next claimed the attention of Mr. B. He said her superficial content was forty millions of acres, of which twenty-seven millions had been surveyed, and about one million and a quarter sold. The quantity subject to the operation of the bill would not exceed thirteen or fourteen millions of acres, as much of what had been surveyed had not been brought into market, or had been destined for military bounties. The quality of these thirteen or fourteen millions was such as might be expected from the picking to which the State had been subjected in sales and pre-emption rights under the laws of the United States and in donations or concessions under the French Government. One-third or one-half might be set down as unfit for cultivation, on account of the number and extent of the prairies. The Legislature of the State had applied, in memorials, for the passage of the bill, and had mentioned his (Mr. B.'s) name in a manner which commanded his public acknowledgments and best exertions to accomplish her wishes: a task in which he was efficiently aided by her Senator, [Mr. KANE] who had spoken for the bill with so much ability in this Chamber, and by her Representative, [Mr. DUNCAN] who had reported for it with so much strength and clearness, in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The State of Indiana was the State, of all others, which had applied most frequently to Congress upon the subject of the public lands, and was, probably, the State to be, above all others, most extensively benefited by the passage of the graduation bill, on account of the mixed nature of its soil and the number of poor families who move into it from the neighboring slave-holding States. Her Senators (Messrs. NONZ and HENDRICKS) had represented her wishes, and left but little for him (Mr. B.) to say. The superficial content of the State was twenty-two millions of acres; of which the Indians held six millions, the inhabitants three and a quarter millions, and the Federal Government the remainder. About sixteen millions had been surveyed; of which about ten millions would come under the operation of this bill. The quality of these ten millions was such, that about one-third might be considered as unfit for cultivation; the rest principally reduced to second and third rate tracts, by the pickings it had undergone under the French Government, from 1680 to 1763; under the British, from that time till 1783; and since, under the laws of the United States. Land Offices had been established at Jeffersonville and Vincennes since the year 1804. Sales had become slow and inconsiderable in the old districts; emigrants pushing on to the new ones, where they could get first choices of land for the same price they would have to give for the refuse tracts in old districts. Still these old districts contained much desirable land which old settlers and new comers would be glad to buy for what it was worth. The donation and cession clauses would operate well in this State, where many poor families would receive with gratitude the bounty of the Government, and where the unsaleable lands, which would not command twenty-five cents per acre, would be made useful by the State Legislature in supporting schools, opening roads, improving rivers, and completing the connexions with the lakes which nature herself had begun and almost finished.

The three Territories claimed a brief notice from Mr. B. Arkansas, which had applied by memorial for the passage of the graduation bill, had done the author of it the honor to mention his name, for which he returned his public thanks, had but about six millions of acres, out of nearly forty millions, subject to its operation. Only fifty-four thousand acres had been sold there under the laws of the United States, in the twenty-five years which the Territory had been a part of the Union. Florida, which had also applied by memorial, had but one and a half millions of acres subject to the bill. Her sales amounted to a quarter of a million of acres in the three years that the Land Offices had been opened. Michigan had but four and a quarter millions of acres subject to the action of the bill, and had sold but three hundred and seventy-five acres under the laws of the United States, in the very long period that she had belonged to the Federal Government. All three of these Territories had been picked under former sovereignties, and contained large portions of land unfit for cultivation—Florida and Arkansas especially; in both of which the extensive pine woods, common to the South, widely prevailed.

It is now made manifest, Mr. President, that out of 1,100 millions of acres of land which is held in trust for the People of the United States by the Federal Government, and of which 260 millions, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, besides 50 millions more to which it has not, lies in seven States and three territories—it is now made manifest, sir, by official documents and incontrovertible statements, that out of this immense domain, the first clause of my bill, which is the clause now under consideration, will only apply to about 80 millions of acres; that of this 80 millions, about one-half may be thrown out as unfit for cultivation, and the other half set down as a mere refuse—the leavings of a century's sales and donations under the laws of the United States and foreign sovereigns, and which the Federal Government has been in vain endeavoring to sell at its minimum price of $1 25 per acre, for many years past.

This being the quantity, and such the quality, of the land to which the first section of my bill is applicable, let us see if it is true, as has been asserted on this floor, that this quantity is more than the People will need in the four years that the bill allows for its sale, and whether the value of it is greater than they can pay in that time? The existing population in the States and Territories in which these lands lie, is about two millions of souls, and is daily increasing by births and emigration, at a rate to double their numbers in a very short period. Many of the present inhabitants are without land, and would be glad to get at it equitable rates under this bill; many of the freeholders would want more, either for themselves or their children, and all the emigrants would, of course, be buyers to the extent of their means. The quantity of 40 millions of acres apportioned among the existing population, would give 20 acres per head, and the same quantity divided among the increased population which four years will give, would probably diminish the distributive proportions to 15 acres a head, which, allowing 6 souls to every family, would make 90 acres to the family. This proportion could not be considered excessive in new countries, where men of tolerable property count their lands by hundreds and by thousands of acres. With respect to the amount of money which it would require to pay for it, I apprehend that it would not exceed in number of dollars more than half the number of acres sold, as I should consider 50 cents an acre a high average for such inferior and refuse ground; and as the donations to the poor, contemplated by the third clause, would, if it succeeds, be numerous, and in the aggregate considerable, though made up of small parcels; it would follow that the amount of money to be raised would not be above three or four millions of dollars per annum, or twice or thrice the amount now paid annually for lands; an amount which the people of the new States could readily spare by increasing their exertions and retrenching other expenses, for the few years which the operation of the system would require. And this finishes, Mr. President, the exposition which I had to make of the nature and effect of the first clause of my bill.

I will now proceed to the second clause, contained in the second section, and dismiss it with a brief notice, because I do not mean to struggle for its preservation. I mean to abandon it, not because I think it indefensible, but because it is objected to by some of the real friends of the bill, to whose wishes and judgment it is my duty and pleasure to defer, whenever it can be done without injury to the main question. This second clause applies the graduation principle to the public lands hereafter to come into market; that is to say, to the whole body of the lands. It is objected that this would occasion the lands to be disposed of too rapidly; that there would be neither buyers to purchase, nor money to pay for, such an excessive quantity. But there is no foundation, in my opinion, for the objection. The bill does not bring the land into market; it only operates upon it after it is brought in, upon the proclamation of the President. It will depend upon his discretion after the passage of the bill, as it now depends upon it, to order portions of the land, from time to time, to be exposed to sale. It will still be as the law now is. The President, for the time being, may order as little into market as he pleases. He may order none at all. He may stop the sales, so far as their stoppage depends upon the issuing of his proclamations. It would be an abuse to bring an excessive and inordinate quantity into market at once; an abuse which has not yet been committed, and of which there is more reason to apprehend the reverse than the fact. Still some of the real friends of the bill are opposed to it, especially my venerable friend from North Carolina [Mr. MACON.] He and several others are willing to take the first section as an experiment—to make trial of the graduating principle upon the refuse lands to which that section is applicable—and if it succeeds on this trial, it can afterwards be extended to the whole body of the public lands. Sir, I have respect for their wishes, and defer to them accordingly; and, so far as my consent is concerned, this second section can be considered as struck from the bill.

The third and fourth sections of the bill contain the donation clause, which proposes to give a half quarter section of land, after it has fallen to 25 cents per acre, to any actual settler who will cultivate it for five years. I have an objection myself, sir, to this clause, which I stated two years ago—it is to the smallness of the donation; and I now repeat what I then said, that I trust it will be doubled by the votes of the Senate.

The fifth, and last section, contains the cession clause, being the fourth and last clause in the bill, which proposes to cede to the States in which they lie, all the refuse lands which will not sell for 25 cents, after being offered for one year at that price.

I have now finished, Mr. President, the exposition of the four clauses of the bill. I have stated the case of the new States and Territories, which pray for its passage; not skilfully or powerfully, I must admit, but truly and intelligibly, as I hope and believe. I have now given the facts to the Senate, upon which their judgments are required to act. I have shown the present land system to be inefficient for all the purposes of its creation; and this brings us to the inquiry, whether a change of some sort in the mode of selling the public lands, is not demanded by the interest of the country? I shall maintain the affirmative of this inquiry, and shall undertake to show that a change is demanded, and such a change as my bill contemplates, by every interest that is party to the question. I will show that this change is due—

1. To the old States who ceded their vacant lands to the Federal Government.

2. To the new States in which these lands lie.

3. To the Union, for whose benefit they were ceded.

That a change is due to the ceding States, results from the object and terms of the cession, and the non-fulfilment on the part of the Federal Government, of the conditions upon which it was made. The lands were ceded to be disposed of for the payment of the public debt; they were accepted, to be disposed of for that purpose. The Federal Government was constituted the trustee of the lands, and bound to make application of them to a specific object. She accepted the trust, and neither party dreamed at the time that the lands were ceded in fee simple, and in perpetuity, to the Federal Government, to be kept forever, or lavished upon innumerable objects, as the whim or interest of her sovereign will should dictate. Virginia and Georgia were the great efficient donors: Massachusetts, the next greatest possessor of vacant lands, acted a more cautious part. She held her 30,000 square miles of vacant territory in her own hands; cherished upon it her province of Maine; eventually saw that province erected into a State; and, upon the accomplishment of that event, divided the remaining vacant lands with the new sovereign, and each are now selling their respective proportions upon fair and equitable terms, adapted to the real value of all the varieties of soil, timber, and locality. Such was the safe and prudent conduct of Massachusetts; and in so doing she put it out of the power of the Federal Government to violate any engagement with her. Not so Virginia and Georgia,* and the two Carolinas. They threw up their lands upon the altar of the public good. They divested themselves of hundreds of millions of acres, upon the cardinal condition that the Federal Government should dispose of them for the payment of the public debt. This was in the year 1785, on the part of Virginia, and 1802 on the part of Georgia. The value of this condition was to consist in the fact, that by the sale of these lands the public debt should be paid off, and the ceding States saved from the imposition of taxes for the discharge of that revolutionary legacy. This was stated and enforced in all the state papers of the day, relative to the subject. It was particularly insisted upon in the first message of President Washington to Congress. In one of these messages, he earnestly recommended "timely" and "judicious" sales to be made of these lands, for the express purpose of paying the "principal" as well as the "interest" of the public debt, and to save the People from being taxed in their persons and property for its payment. What was meant by timely and judicious sales was fully explained in the report of Secretary Hamilton, which followed and enforced the message which contained this recommendation. By timely, was there seen to be the present time; and by judicious sales, were shown to be sales for the then present actual value of the lands; and this value was fixed by Secretary Hamilton, at an average of twenty cents per acre. Such was the recommendation of Washington and Hamilton. But "other counsels ruled the hour." The Congress of that day became impregnated with the insane conception of getting rich upon the sale of these lands. Nothing was heard of but their future value. The wildest calculations were indulged in. Figures and numbers became too feeble, inadequate, and inexpressive, to show off the future product of this new mine. Dimensions were resorted to; and one calculator was wild enough to estimate its future product at the value of a pile of gold five miles long, five miles wide, and five miles high! Well, their plan was adopted. A minimum, ten times the amount of Hamilton's average price, was fixed upon, and this minimum was for the bad land only; a system of auctions and of periodical sales was adopted for the good, which was to carry their price to ten and twenty dollars an acre. This was nearly forty years ago: and what has been the result? Twenty millions of acres sold; 32,000,000 of dollars received; 2,165,000 dollars paid for surveying; 1,155,000 dollars for selling; 35,000 dollars per annum for keeping up the General Land Office; 3,393,000 dollars for Indian treaties; and 240,000 dollars per annum for Indian annuities, most of them perpetual! Such are the fruits of the system! On the other hand, interest to the amount of 150,000,000 dollars has been paid upon the public debt; the debt itself is nearly as large as it was; and the people of the States who made so great a provision for its payment, are still recurred to, to furnish their proportions of ten millions annually, to be levied through the custom-house, on their comforts and necessities, to meet its annual interest, and a fraction of the principal. Upon this view of the fruits of the present system, I submit to the Senate, that justice to the States which ceded their vacant lands to the Federal Government, demands a change.

That a change is due to the new States in which these lands lie, results from the fact already shown, that, under the improgessive movement of the present system, ages and centuries must roll away before the federal title can be extinguished to the lands within their limits. It is also due to them upon other grounds. In the first place, to enable them to strengthen their settlements and improve their social condition. At present, the old districts have no attraction for emigrants. The new comers push forward to new districts where first rate land is got for the same price which is demanded for second and third-rate in the old ones. This leaves the old settlements thin and weak, and the neighbors divided from each other by tracts of vacant lands, and all the labor and expense of sustaining the social state aggravated and increased by having too few to bear them; roads and bridges more laborious to be made and kept in order; the county levies higher; the service of jurors more frequent and continued; mills, schools, and churches more scarce; the labors of harvesting, house-raising, and log-rolling more heavy—no such “log-rolling” as takes place in this Capitol, Mr. President, but the real heavy “toating” of “butt-cuts,” which take twelve pair of strong men to lift from their beds. Such are the evils of the thin settlements, made thin and kept thin, by fixing one uniform price for all qualities of land; and which evils would vanish and disappear under the operation of a change which would sell second and third rate land for what it was worth. In the next place, a change which would accelerate the sales of the lands, is due to the new States, upon the principle of letting them have something to tax. Indirect taxes upon imports are surrendered to the Federal Government by the terms of the Constitution; direct taxes upon land is the chief resource remaining to the States for the support of their Governments; and of this resource, so far as it depends upon sales of public land, the new States are lamentably deficient. For example: the sales in Ohio amount to 8 millions of acres out of 15; in Indiana to 3½ millions out of 22; in Illinois to 1½ out of 40; in Missouri to 1 out of 40; in Mississippi to 1½ out of 38; in Alabama to 3½ out of 32; and in Louisiana to one-sixth of a million out of 25 millions. In all these States, the greater part of their soil, covered by the mantle of Federal dominion, is free from all contributions for the support of Government: and for want of this cardinal resource, the State authorities are forced to descend to the taxation of objects which ought to remain as free from the scrutiny as from the burthens of the Government, such as the beds on which people sleep, the chairs on which they sit, the tables off which they eat, the horse which drags the plough, the cow that gives milk to little children—yea, to the orphan children who have lost their mother. At the same time, the Federal Government holds 260 millions of acres of land in these States and Territories, on which it pays no tax, and which it refuses to sell for a just price.

In the third place, a change is due to the new States upon the fair import of their compacts with the Federal Government. By one of the clauses of these compacts, the new States bound themselves not to tax the Federal lands before they are sold, and were to receive three per cent. out of the nett proceeds of the sales, as an indemnity for the loss of the taxes while the sales are going on. But the sales, under the present system, hardly go on at all. It will take hundreds of years to complete them; and, in the mean time, the new States lose the taxes which they would have got without the compacts, and lose the indemnities which they were to have got by them. This is inconsistent with the import of the compacts, and with the fair interpretation of the stipulation not to tax the Federal lands before they were sold; a stipulation which implies that they were to be sold, and to be sold in a reasonable time, and of course for their present value.

It is due to the whole Union to make this change. First, to save their property from depreciation in the universal destruction of timber upon a line of 4000 miles in extent; from the northwest corner of Pennsylvania, round by the valley of the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico, to the southeast corner of Georgia. Great is the daily destruction of Federal timber upon this immense line; not only for fuel, fences, and buildings among the neighbors, but upon the larger scale of supplying saw-mills with logs, tanneries with bark, steam-boats, steam mills, iron-works, and salt-works, with wood to burn; and boat yards and ship yards with the choicest timber for the construction of vessels. For all these purposes the forests resound daily with the blows of axes, the rivers teem both night and day with innumerable rafts. The Federal Government has enacted its laws and charged its officers to stop this destruction. But what are laws when unsupported by public opinion? The forest laws of the Federal Government are not only not supported by public opinion, but are condemned and execrated by it. The people say, this timber is as much mine as any body's. It is public! They say, further, I am ready to pay a just price for it; but the Federal Government will not take a just price, and I had as well use it as let it stand and do nothing, or fall down and rot. Such is their compendious logic, and they quickly suit the action to the word. Penal laws are of no avail. They serve only to give fees to officers, to excite odium against the Government, and sometimes to put an instrument of revenge into the hands of a malignant neighbor. The true remedy is to sell the lands, and then the public will get the value of the land and timber both; private owners will take care of their wood, and the country will have a supply of fuel, and of fencing and building timber, for centuries to come. Secondly, as the means of saving the value of the land itself. In every period of sixteen years the amount of this value is lost in the payment of interest upon the public debt. It would be just as well, for all the purposes of revenue, to sell those lands now for 25 cents per acre, as to sell them for 50 cents sixteen years hence; or for 100 cents thirty-two years hence; or for two dollars sixty-four years hence; and so on to the end of time, or to the end of the sales, which would probably be about the same epoch under the present system. What a loss in not having adopted the system of Hamilton thirty-six years ago! One hundred millions of acres, sold then for an average of 20 cents, would have produced twenty millions of dollars; the interest of that sum would have been forty millions; and this much stopped out of the principal and interest of the public debt, would have left us at this day without the incumbrance of a shilling. In the third place, a change is due to the whole Union, for the purpose of getting the entire business of disposing of the public lands out of the halls of Congress. This business is now consuming one-third or more of the whole time allowed to the sessions of Congress, occupying it with details and minutiae proper for the local legislation of the States, and to the exclusion of its own appropriate business. This is an evil of great and increasing magnitude; but, great as it is, it yields in enormity to another, of which the two Houses of Congress must soon begin to feel the fatal approaches—the evil of corrupt legislation, of which the public lands will form at once the subject and the instrument.

I have shown, Mr. President, that it is due to the old States which ceded these lands to the Federal Government—due to the new States in which they lie—and due to the whole Union, for whose use they were intended, to change our present system of selling them. What that change should be, is the next inquiry; and upon this point I can say, that, after eight years meditation, I have fixed upon the plan contained in the bill before you: that this plan is approved by seventeen out of eighteen Senators from the Western States; and that it has in its favor seven legislative memorials, and the petitions of four thousand persons, which have been laid upon your table, and printed by your order. Strong in my own convictions of the justice of this plan—cheered and supported by the approving voice of seven States and three Territories—by the votes and speeches of so many Senators from the West, and of several from the Atlantic States—it is no more in my nature than it is consistent with my duty, to yield to objections which have no force, or to suffer the bill to be cut and slashed to pieces with amendments, (as they are called,) which, whatever be their object, can have no other effect than to divide its friends and ensure its defeat. Of course, I speak of amendments which are thrust at the bill without any consultation with me—whose matter and manner are equally objectionable—and not of the amendments coming from the friendly hands of the Senator from Virginia, who sits before me, [Mr. TAKEWELL]; the Senator from North Carolina, who sits to my left, [Mr. MACON]; or the Senator from Georgia, who sits over the way, [Mr. COBB.] Amendments from such hands as these come in no "questionable shape." I know their "intent to be charitable;" and as long as they harmonize with the general plan of the bill, it will be my duty, as it is my pleasure, to receive them with respect and deference.

But the bill meets with several objections; at the head of which stands one of a novel and extraordinary character, not connected with the merits of the question, but growing out of supposed injuries which it is to inflict upon the old States. It is said that the bill will have the effect of drawing off the population of these States, diminishing the weight of their political influence, sinking the value of their lands, and retarding the progress of their manufactures.

These are strange objections, Mr. President, to be urged in a country blessed with a Constitution founded on the rights of man. They would come well from feudal lords in the old baronial times of Great Britain, or from the masters of the serfs and vassals of Russia and Poland at the present day; but they grate harshly upon my ear—they harmonize badly with the feelings of my bosom—coming from American statesmen, and intended to restrain the free inhabitants of the old States from bettering their condition by removing to the West. Admitting all the evils apprehended, and it would still be an invalid objection; for the People have a right under our Constitution, to go where they please; even to expatriate themselves, and go into foreign countries in pursuit of wealth or happiness. It is their own privilege to go or stay, and no rightful power resides in this Government to restrain them. But the evils will be much less than seem to be apprehended, even in the parts of the Union from which the objections chiefly come. Emigration has never depopulated a good country. The chasm made by one person moving away is always filled in such a country by another coming in, and usually a richer one. Political influence is not diminished, but increased, by such emigrations. Of this the two Halls of Congress furnish abundant proof. Lands in the old States will certainly not produce less in consequence of such removals. The prolific principle of the soil will still be the same; and if it sells for less, it is also bought for less. The thing balances itself. The buyer gains what the seller loses; and as the seller is to be the emigrant, the advantage remains with the one that remains in the country. In many places, the price of land is as low now in the old States as my bill proposes to make it in the new ones. My friends tell me that land fit for cultivation, and with some improvement upon it, and convenient to all the advantages of old established institutions, can be had now in North Carolina for one dollar per acre. In Virginia, I see from the assessment of 1817, when the price of real estate there, as elsewhere, was double what it now is, that a large county, bearing the name of one of her Senators, here present, (Tyler,) and containing as many acres as the Federal Government has ever sold in Missouri, was assessed at 68 cents per acre, improvements and all; that another county of about the same size, bearing the name of another of her Senators present, (Tazewell,) was assessed at 33 cents per acre; and three others at the respective prices of 24, 23, and 18 cents per acre. Gentlemen will say these are inferior lands. I answer, that the prices in my bill also apply to inferior land, and that so far as price is concerned, there will be no inducement for emigration from old States to new ones. To the south of the Potomac, and in all the slave-holding States emigration is more beneficial than otherwise. The poor are not needed there. Slaves perform all the menial services, and do the principal part of the labor. In the non slave-holding States, and especially in the manufacturing districts, it is somewhat different. There the poor are wanted for tenants, for day laborers, for domestic servants, and to work in the manufactories. To such States it might be some disadvantage to lose their poor; but it is a loss which they have no moral or lawful right to prevent, by passing laws to restrain their removal. But, Mr. President, I will drop these objections. I do not think it would be justifiable in Senators from old States to vote upon such considerations; and of course it is not becoming in me to presume that an argument is necessary to prevent them from doing so.

I will proceed to the next objection, which is also of a novel and extraordinary character, and seems to have its origin in a benevolent inclination to save the People of the new States from the consequences of their own folly. It goes upon the supposition that the price of all the land held by individuals, will be sunk to the scale of prices fixed in the bill, and that these landholders will be injured in their property to that degree. This is the ostensible nature of the objection; but it may be that it has a different object; that its real design is not charitable, but insidious; and that it is intended to excite these landholders against the bill. In the first point of view, it is, to say the least of it, a very unexpected ebullition of superserviceable benevolence, which the individuals referred to will resist and repudiate. They have no need, and it is no compliment to their understandings to suppose that they have any need for such intrusive guardianship. They know that their lands will produce as good crops after as before the passage of the bill. Many of them will want to purchase lands at the graduated prices. All will know that individuals are now selling second and third rate land for the same prices mentioned in the bill, and every one is conscious that population gives value to land, and that their own will rise in value in proportion to the settlement and improvement of the country.

The third objection that I shall notice is the one so incessantly repeated, that no one will buy until the lands fall to the lowest price. This, Mr. President, is the same objection which was made to the graduation principle in Tennessee, and which, for several years, retarded the establishment of the system there. When it was established, the objection was discovered to have no foundation. This we learn from the letter of Mr. Mitchell, of the House of Representatives, the author of the system in Tennessee, and the statement of Mr. Smith, the entry taker in one of the districts. These papers have been printed by order of the Senate, laid upon our tables, and are presumed to be read by every member. I will not, therefore, consume the time of the Senate in reading them over, amply as their contents would repay that trouble; but I must take leave to present a second time, the table of sales actually made in the Hiwassee district, a district of only forty miles square, and which proves the utter fallacy and total inapplicability of the objection. The following is the table:

Amount of land entered in the Entry Office of the Hiwassee District, Tennessee, and amount of cash received from the 2d February, 1824, to the 2d February, 1828.

Price per acre.	No. of acres.	Cash received.
$ 1 50	100,000	$ 150,000
1 00	53,000	53,000
0 50	90,000	45,000
0 25	80,000	20,000
0 12½	56,000	7,000
0 01	132,000	1,200
		$ 276,220

Such is the triumphant answer which actual experiment gives to this objection. It was the experiment of one district; but the result was the same in others, for the law was co-extensive in its application with the existence of the State lands. But even without this experimental answer, the objection would have vanished before an argument. Instead of waiting for the lowest price, many would be tempted to give more than the land was worth, either to save a quarter section which was necessary to complete the size and form of their estate, or to supply it with wood, or a stream of water, or a stone quarry, or a sugar orchard, or to keep off a bad neighbor, or to form a settlement for a child, or to keep open an outlet for stock. Such was the natural progress and order of things. He that wanted a piece of land that suited him would cheerfully embrace the first opportunity of taking it up for its real value, lest another should forestall him in the purchase, and make him afterwards pay more than the value. To suppose otherwise, and to assert, as this objection implies, that the People of the new States and Territories would wait with each other for four years, until the price of all land fell to 25 cents per acre, is to suppose the existence of a universal combination, as impossible in practice as it would be dishonorable in conception. And, after all, it could end in no advantage; for when the lands had fallen to 25 cents, the actual settlers would have the preference, and the purchasers would have to stand off until they were satisfied, and then the contest would begin among them; for if two or more applied at the same time, for the same tract, they would have to bid for it, and the price might be run up higher than ever.

The fourth objection to my bill is found in the apprehension of speculators. It is the same old objection, Mr. President, which had its effect for a while in Tennessee, as we learn from Messrs. Smith and Mitchell, and which was completely falsified by the event there, and is ready to be overthrown by argument here. Sir, there can be no such thing as speculation in wild land, in the present state of America. A speculator buys to sell again. His plan is to buy low, and sell high; but, in the present condition of America, although he may buy low enough, yet he will soon be forced to sell still lower. What chance is there for wild land to rise? The United States own eleven hundred millions of acres, for which she can find purchasers. Mexico and Canada have more than they can give away. The old States and the new States are full of improved land, offered for sale on the most reduced terms. You see ten sellers for one purchaser. The old speculators of 1817-18, that is to say, the few that have escaped ruin, cannot sell their lands, and are, in fact, the real authors of this objection. The body of the People do not make it. They laugh at it. They know that the laws of entail and primogeniture are abolished, and that the greatest landholder of the present day is only the trustee for other people's children; that his posterity, and the posterity of his present tenants, will exchange positions in two or three generations, perhaps in one generation; and, as for present purchases, they know that they can rise as early, ride as fast, get to the office as soon, and show as good money as any speculator. If it comes to bidding, they can bid as high. If it comes to drawing lots, they stand as good a chance as any man for the long straw. In a word, sir, the People are not afraid of speculators. They know there is no such thing. The objection has been tried upon them, and they laugh at it.

The fifth objection supposes that the Federal Government will not get the value of its lands under my bill. I demand, sir, if it gets the value under the present system? And I answer no! I assert that it gets nothing under the present system; that the thirty-two millions of dollars received in forty-two years, for twenty millions of acres, has been sunk, and double sunk, and five times over sunk, in the payment of interest on the public debt, while this sum was collecting, and in the expenses of the system. I say that it will get quickly under my bill, what it gets at all; that an average of fifty cents per acre, received in four or five years, for the refuse lands, will be worth more to the Treasury than $125, received for the same lands, would be worth thirty or forty years hence. But I dismiss this calculation as one of inferior and subordinate consideration. I look to the cultivation of the lands more than to their sales. It is the cultivation of the soil which enriches the country; and in this point of view, the country is always a gainer when any portion of the public lands is passed from the Federal Government, which cannot cultivate them, into the hands of private owners who can. As a proof of this, look to the duties which have been received on imports, which imports are founded on the exports which are the products of the soil. You will see them amounting, in thirty-seven years, the period that the present Constitution has been in force, to $575,000,000. Yes, sir, to five hundred and seventy-five millions of dollars! And this source of revenue, instead of being exhausted by one year's cultivation, like the revenue from the sale of the lands, which can only be received once is perennial and eternal, renewing itself incessantly, and augmenting from year to year, with the increase of wealth and of population. Surely it is our policy to increase this bountiful source of revenue, and for that purpose to give a quarter section of land to every inhabitant that will cultivate it.

I cannot dismiss the objections which have been made to the graduation clause of my bill, Mr. President, without noticing one which I heard in Missouri, but which has not been enforced by any speaker on this floor. It was the objection of a tanner who supplied his vats with bark from the public lands, and who, after running over all the worn out objections about speculators, etc. admitted that his true objection was altogether of a different nature: that if the bill passed, all the land would be brought up, and he would get no more "public bark" to tan with.

I now proceed, sir, to the donation clause, and admit at once that its primary intention is to better the condition of the poor. I know it to be written in that Book which is the epitome of all knowledge, "that the rich ruleth the poor, and the borrower is the servant of the lender." I know, too, that it is said by my venerable and venerated friend from North Carolina, [Mr. Maco] that Governments are not made for the poor, but against them; that the rich get the benefits, and the poor get the burthens of Government; and I know that this severe remark has much foundation in the history of mankind, yet it has not always been so. There have been exceptions, and especially in that great republic, whose name, after the lapse of two thousand years, still shines as a leading star in the firmament of nations. It was not so among the ancient Romans. With that heroic people, although the Government was chiefly in the hands of the Patricians, yet the poor had an interest in their country, and that interest was founded in their share of the public lands. When a conquest was made, half the lands were immediately set aside for gratuitous distribution among the poor; the other half was put up to sale for the benefit of the public treasury. Besides this fundamental law, we read in the history of that great people, of occasional donations of land to 20,000 poor families at a time. Many laws were made for the protection of their lands—as the Licinian law, which secured their possessions for several hundred years, and for the enforcement of which the Gracchi lost their lives. It was this interest in the soil of their country, which made the love of that country so strong a passion in the breast of the Roman citizen. It was this which made every Roman glory in the name, and hold himself forever ready to fight and die for his country. And cannot the same cause produce the same effect with us? Congress is charged with providing for "the common defence" of the nation, and she expends millions upon the fortifications of the seacoast, and upon the equipment of ships for the sea. And may she not give land for the defence of the Western Frontier? Great Britain is now filling Upper Canada with freeholders, at a great expense to the Crown. One hundred and fifty acres of choice land to each emigrant—expenses of removal—provisions for one year—seed-grains for the first crop—farming tools and household utensils—a cow, at the cost of £4 10 sterling: such are the inducements which England holds out for the settlement of Upper Canada. And why? For the obvious purpose of strengthening herself against us in that quarter: and shall we not strengthen ourselves against her in the opposite quarter? And by the same means? The defence furnished by patriotism and valor, has been called “the cheap defence of nations,” and so in fact it is. A brave People, devoted to their country, is its cheapest, as well as its surest, defence. Of this defence, it is in the power of this Government to avail itself to any degree. It may have as many warriors as it pleases on its frontier. It has hundreds of millions of acres of vacant land in the frontier States and Territories, and some hundred thousand citizens without freeholds. Let it give them land; let it give them an interest in their country; a home for their wives and their little ones; and they will never be found without a horse and a rifle; without a willing mind, a courageous heart, and a strong arm, when that country demands their service. Let not the character of these People be judged by the infamous British publications, to which too many of our statesmen look for information of their own country. I have one of these publications, which I have reserved to read in this place, that I might bear witness, on this elevated theatre, before the whole American Senate, to its base and libellous character. It is from the British Quarterly Review, No. 61. Listen to it:

“We affirm, without fear of contradiction, or of error, that there is not to be found, on the face of the globe, a race of men so utterly abandoned to vice and to crime, so devoid of all fear of God, and regard towards man, as the outsettlers, of Kentucky, Ohio, and other back States.”

Now, Mr. President, I affirm, without fear of error, and with utter contempt for all contradiction, that a baser libel was never published, against any People, than this which I have read. It has been exposed by one who knows its falsity, (Governor Cass, of Michigan, in the North American Review,) and I add my voice to his, and from personal knowledge. I have known the People of the frontier States from my boyhood—have travelled among them, and lived among them; and can truly say, that, for all the manly virtues—for integrity, fair dealing, courage, generosity, and hospitality, they are proverbial and unrivalled. The benighted stranger never knocks at their gate in vain: the traveller never quits their house hungry: locks and bars are not necessary for the security of cribs and barns: the mail needs no guard: the solitary unarmed traveller, in a journey of a thousand miles, enjoys a safety by day and by night, which he would look for in vain in the streets of that capital of Great Britain, from which issued the infamous libel which I have read to you. It is the People of these frontier States to whom we are chiefly indebted for the glories of the late war. It is to them we are chiefly to look in future wars. They are with us “the cheap defence of the nation.” And shall they not have an inheritance in the land of their fathers? Shall they not have a home, as well as a grave, in the land which they defend? Shall we part with no ground but for gold and silver? Shall we consider money more valuable than patriotism? Shall we act upon the principle which I have heard asserted on this floor, that the man who cannot pay $100 for eighty acres of land is not worth having for a citizen? Sir, I know better. I know that an immense proportion of the inhabitants of new countries never see the day when they are masters of 100 silver dollars, to be paid down for a piece of land. Early marriages, the cares of family, current expenses for indispensable objects, accidents, misfortunes, and losses, prevent the accumulation of such a sum—small as it may seem to those who are in the habit of handling money, but great, in fact, to him who gets nothing but by the labor of his hands, and whose first earnings go to the daily support of his wife and his children. Poverty is not always the effect of vice or laziness. Many are born poor, and remain so; many are born rich, and become poor through misfortune; and, to all, the change of condition from tenant to freeholder, is the most difficult part of their lives. Let the Federal Government make that change for them. It can do it for hundreds of thousands, and be none the weaker or poorer, but richer and stronger on account of it. Great and meritorious are the services of the poor. They are soldiers in the time of war, and cultivators both in war and peace. Their daily labor is the perennial source of food to man and beast. Daily do they moisten the earth with the sweat of their brow. Shall that sweat continue to fall upon ground which is not their own? Shall they remain without land under a Government abounding with land? Shall they be compelled to choose between the hard alternatives of being trespassers or tenants, all their lives? Shall they see for ever this Federal Government, after constituting itself sole purchaser of land from Indians, resolve itself into the hard character of speculator and monopolizer, and make “merchandise” out of God’s first and greatest gift to man?

The cession clause, Mr. President, to which I now proceed, is the fourth and last clause in the bill. Its nature has been explained. The other clauses being adopted, the adoption of this one would seem a matter of course. It could no longer be an object to keep up offices in the old districts, to sell the miserable refuse which would remain unsold for a year, after having been offered at twenty-five cents per acre. The expense would not justify it. The only question would be between giving them up to the States for beneficial purposes, or suffering them to lie idle for hundreds of years, under the barren sceptre of the Federal Government. That, with me, would be no question at all. The States, with the advantage of local knowledge, and near superintendence, could make them available in promoting education and improving the country: in the hands of the Federal Government, they would be a harbor for wild beasts, and nuisances to the country for hundreds of years. I dwell particularly, Mr. President, on this idea. These refuse lands are the sources of disease and death. I have in my hand the statement of an officer whose habitual correctness is above all praise—a gentleman who hides superior merit in a subordinate station—one who takes pains to conceal more science than any other gentleman of my acquaintance can show—I speak of Col. McRee, Surveyor General in Missouri, whose report upon the inundated lands of Missouri and Illinois was made under your instructions, and printed by your order—I have, I say, his statement in my hand, which shows 1096 ponds, lakes, and marshes in these two States, on an area of four millions of acres, or the one-twentieth part of their surface. They cover several hundred thousand acres of land. The most of them belong to the Federal Government. They are nuisances to the country, and nuisances which the local authorities have not the means to abate. They are the source of sickness and death to the neighboring inhabitants; even to those who have bought land from the owner of the nuisance. Many such, after years of contention with noxious and pestilential air, spending their money, and losing many members of their family in the vain conflict, have been compelled to move away, abandoning their possessions without rent or sale. Sir, I consider it as plain language, not amounting to metaphorical, to call these 1096 ponds, lakes, swamps, and marshes, so many Federal garrisons, manned by innumerable and invisible agents of destruction, in the shape of various diseases, for the extermination of the inhabitants. The American Bottom is the chief seat of these 1096 garrisons, and melancholy is the havoc which they have made upon it. Who has not heard or read of this incomparable and unrivalled bottom, called by pre-eminence, American? And how faint and inadequate is the conception which any description can give to those who have not seen it! Figure to yourself, Mr. President, an alluvion bottom, ninety miles long, and averaging five miles wide, washed on one side by the Mississippi, fortified on the other by a lofty rampart of limestone rock; divided and subdivided in its whole extent into woodland and prairie; the wood filled with vines and wild fruit; the prairies covered with grass and flowers; the soil rich, like the Delta of the Nile, and too loose, too light, to hold the streams of water which gush from the rampart of rock, or fall from the high country above, and which are swallowed up in their vain attempt to reach the river; situated under the temperate latitude of 37 and 38, opposite to the flourishing market town of St. Louis, and within four days sail of New Orleans: Figure to yourself these objects, and you then have an outline of the American Bottom, which your own rich imagination may fill up, in its happier days, with fields almost black with dark green corn; other fields yellow with ripening wheat, barley, rye, and oats, reflecting the rays of a brilliant sun from their level, golden, uniform, and waving surface; orchards loaded with young fruit; vines with grapes; vast herds of cattle wading up to their sides in the tall prairie grass; and all this in an atmosphere fragrant with the fresh perfume of innumerable flowers and blossoms. This magnificent bottom was the first abode of the French in the valley of the Mississippi. Its settlement, by the followers of La Salle, about the year 1680, was coeval with the settlement of Philadelphia. Before the peace of 1763, which transferred the Canadas and Illinois to the British Crown, it was the seat of a numerous population, which supplied New Orleans with provisions, and sent three companies of militia to assist in the destruction of Braddock, at fort Duquesne. Kaskaskia was then a rich and flourishing town; Cahokia, Prairie de Rocher, and Prairie de Pont, were gay and smiling villages; Fort Chartres, with its numerous and brilliant garrison, gave security to the inhabitants, and imparted life and animation to their innocent joys. But, since then, how changed! The transfer of the Illinois to Great Britain, gave the first blow to its prosperity. Fort Chartres lost its numerous garrison. The Jesuits, who had a college at Kaskaskia, led many of their flock to the Spanish side of the river, and founded St. Louis and Ste. Genevieve. The expedition of General Clark, in '78, scared off others; and, to crown all these causes of emigration, came the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory, and for the exclusion of slavery from it. The French are attached, Mr. President, to their slaves. They call them by kind and gentle appellations, "mon ami," "mon enfant," "ma fille," are not unfrequent terms of address to their "bond men" and their "bond women." The fear of losing this species of property, under the new ordinance, gave the last impulsion to the emigrating spirit, and the greater part of the remaining slaveholders followed their countrymen across the Mississippi, or down it to New Orleans. At the arrival of the Americans, as we were called, upon the acquisition of Louisiana in 1804, the population was found to be three-fourths gone; and at Kaskaskia, Fort Chartres, and the villages, the traveller was astonished at the sight of ruins in the heart of the New World. But the bottom had too many attractions to be overlooked by emigrants. Our People began to settle upon it, and to apply their energies to its cultivation; but they also have been compelled to remove. The pools of water, formed by reflux currents from the river, or by rains from the hills, has taken possession of the low parts, and formed permanent lakes, by the deposit of the tenacious clayey sediment which came from the cultivated lands. The population was too weak to drain them, or to fence out the river by levees, at the low places. The State authorities lacked the power or the means to do it. The Federal Government, to whom all these nuisances belonged, like an Irish landlord, living in London, was ignorant of their existence. The very water which forms these lakes and ponds, was supposed by it to be land, and is offered for sale at the minimum price of one dollar twenty-five cents the superficial acre. The consequence is, that the American Bottom is less populous now than it was at the period of the acquisition of Louisiana; less so than it was when I first saw it, twelve years ago, and becoming less populous every year. The stagnant waters encroach upon the People, and the People retire from before them. The Federal Government owns these nuisances, and will neither abate them, nor contribute its proportion among other landholders, to have them abated. They increase in size and number, and are becoming the lords of the bottom: but if the ceasion clause in my bill should take effect, the clause which I am now pressing on the attention of the Senate, this sad picture may soon be reversed. These nuisances, and their proximate domain, would change owners, and, in the change, they would get a master on the spot to treat them as they deserve. They would soon cease to be garrisons, either State or Federal, metaphorical or real, for the destruction of People's lives. Wise laws would be passed by the State Legislature, founded in local knowledge, adapted to the evil, and executed by persons interested in their success. Ponds, lakes, and swamps would disappear; their pestilential airs would vanish; health would be restored to the American Bottom; and, with it, an unalloyed enjoyment to the planter and farmer of this terrestrial Paradise. I have confined what I have to say, Mr. President, upon the subject of these nuisances, to the American Bottom alone, not because it is their only seat, but because I wished to strike the imagination, and fix the attention with one eminent example of this evil, which would do for a thousand lesser instances. But they are not limited to that bottom. These nuisances are found in ample number, differing in magnitude, not in nature, upon the margins of all the creeks and rivers in all the States and Territories, from the Gulf coast of Louisiana, Alabama, and Florida, to the Lake shores of Indiana and Michigan. They extend from Detroit to New Orleans. They are the property of the Federal Government, and every where they are sources of disease. Will the Federal Government hold on to them for ever? Will it continue to wave its barren sceptre over pestilential swamps and marshes, as well as over desert prairies, flinty hills, and sterile ridges?

Mr. B. concluded with an appeal to the Senate. He would not recapitulate on a subject on which he had spoken fully two years ago—again at the commencement of the present session—and now, for the third time, and extended into the third day. He made an appeal to the members upon the sacred nature of the duty which the decision of this bill devolved upon them. It was a local subject, vitally interesting to seven States, and was to be decided upon by a National Legislature, composed of members no way responsible to those States. The decision was in the hands of Senators, not chosen by the States interested, not amenable to them, without any interest in the success of the bill, and, by possibility, laboring under the delusive belief of having an interest in its defeat. Such circumstances put human nature to its severest trial—they put our form of government to its severest trial—to the trial at which every confederacy has heretofore failed—the trial which subjects the local interest of one part, and a weaker part of the confederacy, to the final award and decision of the other part, and the stronger part. Certainly it was inconsiderate, it was imprudent, it was highly unwise in these seven States, to come into the confederacy before they had provided for their own ultimate independence, and for the certain extinction, within some reasonable time, of the Federal title to the land within their limits. Instead of binding themselves never to interfere with the primary disposition of the soil—never to tax the Federal lands—they ought to have made these restrictions upon their sovereignty temporary in duration, and contingent in application. They ought to have submitted to these restrictions for limited periods only, and to have reserved the right of taxing all the land that was not sold in a reasonable time, which times should have been fixed in the compacts. No one can doubt but that if these stipulations had been contended for, at the first admission of the new States, they would have been granted, and that the periods fixed for the full enjoyment of their sovereign rights would have been much shorter than have elapsed since the oldest of them was admitted. But the day for making stipulations has gone by; the time for supplicating is now come. The compacts are made, and so far as the sovereignty and independence of the new States is concerned, they are capitulations without terms—submissions without appeal—surrenders at discretion, to the will of Congress! They can only appeal to your justice, and that appeal is now made, not in my speech alone, but in the memorials of Legislatures, and in the petitions of individuals, and in the united voices of seventeen out of eighteen Senators, that you have upon this floor, from the valley of the Mississippi. May their appeal not be in vain. May it be such as to prevent them from ever thinking of applying to the Congress of the United States, the seventh clause in the Declaration of Independence against the King of Great Britain.

THURSDAY, APRIL 10, 1828.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill making appropriations for internal improvement was again taken up.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the appropriation of 175,000 dollars for the completion of the Cumberland Road to Zanesville, observing that a bill for this purpose had passed the Senate at an early period of the session. His motion was to insert the bill alluded to, instead of the provision in the present bill. Mr. B. went at considerable length into an argument against the principle of allowing the Executive to originate bills, taking, thereby, its legitimate powers from the legislative body. He thought, on such subjects as that now before the Senate, in particular, the legislature ought to originate bills. He thought the evil was gaining ground, and wished to stay its course. The question, therefore, which his motion would propose, would be, whether the legislative or Executive discretion should be exercised in originating bills.

On motion of Mr. PARRIS, the motion was divided, so as to take the question first on striking out.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the amendment. He did not look upon this as an Executive measure. The remarks of the gentleman from Missouri did not apply to this bill, as all the appropriations had been sanctioned by former acts of Congress. He did not see that censure could rest any where. It was true that many things had been put into the bill which did not belong there—such as provisions for light-houses—yet he did not consider that it displayed, in any degree, the exercise of a power to originate bills on the part of the Executive. He should vote against striking out.

Mr. McLANE dissented from the opinions of Mr. BENTON. He presumed the subject of the Cumberland Road had been reported upon by the Committee on Roads and Canals, and that this part of the bill had not originated with the Committee of Ways and Means. He thought there could not well be any difference between the views of the Department and those of the gentleman from Missouri, as they had the same object in view.

Mr. BENTON expressed a doubt whether the Department and himself held, in all respects, the same views of the subject. He certainly agreed in an issue to extend the road to Zanesville. It had been proposed, he said, at a very early period, in a report made by Mr. Jefferson, to extend the road to the Seat of Government of Missouri; but he had reason to believe that, as the line of the road had not yet been indicated, it was intended to divert it from the course originally laid out. The people of Missouri and Illinois were very anxious to ascertain the route which the road was to take, in order to lay out their farms accordingly; and it was for that reason that he had framed the bill to which he had alluded, and which passed the Senate. The people of Kentucky and Alabama had no reason to doubt his friendly disposition. He was willing to advocate roads through their States, but he wished also to save his own. He, therefore, had proposed this amendment.

Mr. RUGGLES made a few remarks in opposition to the amendment.

The question on striking out being then taken, it was agreed to.

Mr. KING thought it unnecessary to insert the bill proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, as the bill passed in the Senate, at an early period of the session, was now in the House of Representatives, and had not been acted upon there. By not inserting the bill now proposed, the objection would be got rid of, that this bill was encumbered with objects which ought not to be inserted in an appropriation bill.

Mr. RUGGLES said, that he should regret having voted in favor of striking out, if the motion to insert was abandoned. He, therefore, hoped the motion to insert would be agreed to.

Mr. BARTON did not think this amendment would come under the general objection of mixing up incongruous matters in an appropriation bill. It was not improper, in making an appropriation, to state for what it was made; and in this alone did the amendment, now proposed, differ from the provision in the bill before the Senate.

Mr. PARRIS thought the adoption of this motion might possibly produce an awkward state of affairs. If the House were to take up the bill passed in the Senate, and pass it, there would be two appropriations made for the same object. There were many portions of the bill which he was in favor of; but he had been opposed to that for the Cumberland Road from the commencement. He, therefore, wished that it might be separated from this bill, because he wished to give his vote on it separately. He thought it ought to stand on its own ground; and, as it would be passed in the other House, he thought there was no necessity of inserting it in this bill.

Mr. BENTON said, that it was to remove that embarrassment of which the gentleman from Maine had spoken, that he introduced the bill which was now before the House of Representatives. As the season was now far advanced, he was anxious that this appropriation should be made at once; and if the road to the capital of Missouri could not be located, he was anxious that the road to Zanesville should be completed: and, although it was against his principles to vote for a bill composed of incongruous materials, in this case he was forced to do it.

Mr. TAZEWELL asked whether this proposition was in order. He supposed that a bill that had been acted upon and disposed of, could not be acted upon again during the same session. If the bill had been rejected, it could not have been brought forward again. He thought a bill as much out of reach of the Senate, when it had been passed and gone to the other House, as though it had been rejected. He rose to ask the question, whether it was in order to propose this bill as an amendment.

The CHAIR said that the proposition was in order; as there was a distinction between acting upon an original bill which had been disposed of, and an amendment proposed to another bill.

The question was then taken on inserting the bill in relation to the Cumberland Road, alluded to by Mr. BENTON, as an amendment to the bill under consideration, and the motion was rejected—ayes 18, noes 22.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; and the amendment adopted yesterday in Committee of the Whole, to restrict the surveys of internal improvements to those objects already commenced, being proposed for confirmation—

Mr. KANE opposed the amendment at considerable length, and replied to the arguments of Mr. McLANE, of yesterday. He inquired of the Committee of Finance, how long it would require to finish the works already commenced, and what amount would be required to defray the expenses of those objects?

Mr. HENDRICKS followed, in opposition to the amendment, which he looked upon as a step towards the abandonment of the whole system of internal improvement.

Mr. HAYNE explained some of his remarks, made yesterday, which had been alluded to by Mr. HENDRICKS.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, went into an examination, at great length, of the surveys already made under the act of 1824, and supported the opinion, formerly expressed by him, that they were all works of a national character.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in reply to the inquiries of Mr. KANE, observed that the Committee on Finance had no information as to the amount of expense required to finish the surveys already commenced, or the time which their completion would take. From an examination of the documents, he should be led to the conclusion that a surplus would remain out of the 30,000 dollars, after the completion of those surveys.

Mr. NOBLE spoke at great length in opposition to the amendment, and with great severity of persons who had changed their course on this subject, and maintained the partial and unjust influence which arresting the surveys at this period would have upon the Western States.

Mr. KANE made some further remarks, and observed that, if the supposition of the gentleman from Maryland was correct, he was still more opposed to the amendment, as it was not customary to make appropriations larger than the object to be effected by them required.

Mr. BARTON explained the grounds on which he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. BRANCH said a few words.

The question being then taken on the amendment, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, King, McKinley, McLane, Macon, Parrie, Ridgely, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury.—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Bouigny, Chase, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Sibley, Smith, of Maryland, Thomas, Webster, Willey.—23.

The VICE PRESIDENT rose, and said he hoped it would not be considered assumption in the Chair to offer an explanation to the Senate of the ground on which the casting vote had been given on this question yesterday. As the Chair understood his motives had been called in question, it seemed necessary to explain them, and to shew that the Chair had, in giving that casting vote, abandoned no opinions formerly entertained. From the beginning, the Chair had been of opinion that this system was subject to great difficulties, which might eventually run it down; that it might be diverted from national to local objects; and that it might be made subservient to political combinations. The Chair does not pretend to assert that the system has been misdirected, or that the powers delegated by the law have been abused. But it was always the opinion of the Chair, that such results should be guarded against. It was the fortune of the individual who now fills the Chair, at a former period to preside over the War Department when this subject was agitated, and, in pursuance of a resolution of the other House, he had drawn up a project, which was submitted to the President of the United States, and communicated by him to Congress in the year 1824. In that document, the opinions of the Chair upon the powers of Congress were fully stated. He had always acted upon the principle that Congress ought to have the control over the whole subject; that the responsibility was too great to be reposed in one individual; and that specific appropriations ought to be made to carry on the various objects of the system. These were always the opinions of the humble individual who now fills the Chair. While a member of the other House, at an early period, he had contended for the specific appropriation of money to objects of internal improvement. The casting vote given yesterday had been dictated by those principles. The VICE PRESIDENT remarked that allusions had been made to a casting vote given by him, two years since, on the bill making appropriations for a canal in Illinois. That vote had been a silent one, and he now took occasion to explain it. The Chair then applied to the two Senators, and remarked to them, that, from the closeness of the previous votes, it was not improbable that a casting vote might occur, and that, unless the bill was amended, the vote of the Chair must be against it. The bill proposed to set aside a portion of land for the construction of the canal. The Chair considered the public lands the property of the Government, and to be disposed of for the common benefit; and that if a canal were to be provided for out of those common funds, it ought to be toll free to the People of the United States. The Senators from Illinois did not consider themselves authorized, by the wishes of their constituents, to offer an amendment to the bill, and the Chair voted against it. The opinion of the Chair still remains unaltered. He had never seen any ground for any other decision. He could not see the justice of giving a free passage through that canal to the people of Illinois, and, at the same time, of levying a tax on the people of Missouri and Mississippi, who were as much interested in the work as the citizens of Illinois. The Chair said, in conclusion, that he hoped to be excused by the Senate for this explanation. He had always been free to declare his sentiments and motives, and on no occasion had he endeavored to conceal them. If, said he, I know myself, I have never been guilty of such conduct, and have been above concealing my opinions on all public measures.

Mr. NOBLE said that he understood the Chair to allude to the remarks of certain of the Senators who had taken part in the debate on this subject. For his own part, he should be willing that the Chair should designate the individuals.

Office of Major General.—Internal Improvements.

[SENATE.]

[Several voices here joined in a call to order.]

The VICE PRESIDENT rose, and said, that he did understand both of the Senators from Indiana to allude to an abandonment of the system of internal improvement, and to a desertion by the Chair of the principles which he had formerly avowed.

Mr. NOBLE rose again; and several voices called to order. He said that he wished to explain. Gentlemen might call to order as much as they please—

He was here going on, but the CHAIR interposed, observing that there was no question before the Senate.

Mr. NOBLE said he understood that there had been no question before the Senate when the President addressed the body, and it appeared to him that the Chair had addressed himself.

Mr. TAZEWELL called Mr. NOBLE to order.

The CHAIR said there was no question before the Senate. The Senator from Indiana will take his seat.

Mr. NOBLE observed, that, if he must sit down, he would submit; and then took his seat.

On the amendment offered in Committee of the Whole by Mr. BENTON, to strike out the provision for the Cumberland Road, Mr. RUGGLES asked the yeas and nays.

Some further conversation took place on this question, between Messrs. EATON, RUGGLES, SMITH, of Maryland, CHANDLER, FOOT, HARRISON, TAZEWELL, and WEBSTER; when, the vote being taken, it was decided in the negative—17 to 30.

FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1828.

OFFICE OF MAJOR GENERAL.

Mr. HARRISON moved to take up the report on the resolution formerly passed in the Senate, in relation to abolishing the office of Major General of the Army; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the resolution, so as to strike out the word "not"—in effect to support the resolution, and to abolish the office. He also moved to recommit the resolution, with orders to bring in a bill to abolish the office of Major General. Mr. C. supported the motion by a few remarks, in which he repeated his conviction that the office was unnecessary, and that its abolition would be a saving to the country.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed the amendment offered by Mr. CHANDLER, and argued at some length on the necessity of a military head.

Mr. HARRISON gave a history of the office in this country, and supported its necessity for the safety and complete organization of the Army.

Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and EATON expressed themselves at length in favor of Mr. CHANDLER'S amendment.

Mr. BARNARD expressed himself at large against the amendment, and maintaining that the office of Major General was absolutely necessary for the well-being of our military establishment.

Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and CHANDLER replied briefly to Mr. BARNARD.

Mr. NOBLE supported the amendment, chiefly on the ground that the office of Major General was a sinecure.

Mr. BARNARD replied to the remarks of Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and CHANDLER.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that this question had been one on which he had felt considerable doubt, not being a military man. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. CHANDLER] deserved great credit for the vigilance with which he detected, and the spirit with which he opposed, any expenditure which was not required by the wants of the country. And if he [Mr. V. B.] thought the office unnecessary, he would join him with pleasure. He had come to the Senate with doubts as to the course which he should take; but the view which the gentleman from Pennsylvania had taken, had convinced him that the office could not safely be abolished. Although his impression had been that he should vote for abolishing the office, his opinion had been so completely changed by the arguments of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that he should give his vote against the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was then taken on the motion to recommit the report, and decided in the negative.

The question being then taken on agreeing to the report of the Military Committee, that it is inexpedient to abolish the office of Major General of the Army, it was decided in the affirmative.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill making appropriations for internal improvement, was then taken up, and the question being on ordering the bill to a third reading—

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, addressed the Senate: He said, as the amendments were now disposed of, his intention was to offer his objections to the passage of the bill, as he had yet to learn by what delegated power this Senate could sustain the principles upon which it was founded. He was aware of the disadvantages under which he should have to approach this important question. He had been warned, and perhaps correctly, that his opposition to the bill would avail nothing, because, it was said, a majority of the Senate were in favor of it. This, to be sure, was not very flattering to his purpose. But he deemed it incorrect to yield up principles, implicitly and silently, to majorities. It would, however, by no means, be unfair or disrespectful to inquire upon what ground this majority arrived at their conclusion. Nor was this the first time he had ventured to oppose his humble opinion to that of a supposed majority. And as his cause was that of the Constitution and of his country, he would not shrink from his duty, although it should prove unavailing. In doing so, he had the consolation to know he had no confessions to make, nor retractions to offer. He had long since formed his opinions upon this subject; since when he had given his adhesion to the political creed of no man who maintained this ruinous doctrine, but had invariably pursued the even tenor of his own way. Not because he conceived his own opinions to be infallible, nor from a want of due respect to the opinions of others, but because their arguments were unfounded.

He intended to confine his remarks to a few prominent points. To the extravagant length to which this system already had, and must continue to lead us; to the great inequality and injustice of its practical operations in the different sections of the Union; and to the flagrant outrage it offered to the Constitution, by violating its fundamental principles.

For the first thirty years after the adoption of the Constitution, economy, and a sacred observance of that instrument, were regarded as cardinal virtues in a statesman. One administration had been pulled down, and another erected upon its ruins, because it was supposed economy had been overlooked, and the Constitution violated by the former. Those times have passed away. Economy is now parsimony, and a regard for the Constitution is a want of patriotism.

As an evidence of the extravagance to which we were running, the document No. 172, would exhibit a specimen of no ordinary character. It contained an official report of sixty-nine distinct surveys of roads, of canals, of rivers, of creeks, and of harbors.

[Here Mr. S. quoted from the document the list of the surveys, 69 in number, to which he had referred.]

He could not ask the Senate to hear his remarks on all these surveys, however important they might be, but would invite their attention to some of the most promiment objects; among which was the "Survey of a route for connecting the Atlantic with the Gulf of Mexico."

This canal would probably be one of the most unprofitable and expensive works contemplated in that report. If executed in a style to render it efficient for ship navigation, for which it was intended, it would cost the United States $50,000,000, and when completed would not last a fortnight. The same current and counter current that formed Cape Florida, originally, would overwhelm it the first gale that blew. Besides, the most experienced mariners that frequent that coast, have pronounced it utterly impracticable to approach it, surrounded as it is with sand banks that shift with every tide.

The road from the western boundary of Missouri to the confines of Mexico—a distance of five hundred miles, and must be constructed at an expense to this Government of not less than $5,000,000—may be useful to a few wandering traders, but it is impossible to suppose it to be a governmental object, as regards the policy and safety of the United States. Border wars are always more destructive, and more bloody, and excite more hostility and vengeance, from the facilities afforded by the proximity of the parties, than any other wars among nations. All other bordering nations guard against such consequences. But it seems to be the policy of our Government to pave the way to our neighboring nations if they should choose to make inroads upon our frontiers.

In addition to the preceding sixty-nine plans and surveys, Mr. S. said he had collected from the documents recently laid on the tables of the members, thirty-eight other reports, and bills making appropriations for roads, for private turnpike companies, for canals, for harbors, for break-waters, for piers, for sea-walls, for artificial harbors, for removing obstructions from rivers, for removing obstructions from creeks, for charitable institutions, for colleges, for schools, and for the public bounty to as many private citizens of the West as choose to ask for it. All of which are disclosed in the following table: [Here Mr. S. quoted from the reports.]

What, he would ask, has Congress to do with the Milesburg and Smith Port turnpike road? Or with the Washington and Frederick Turnpike Company? Or with the Baltimore and Ohio Rail-road? Do not the reports and surveys before us display an ample field for governmental patronage, without taking charge of the concerns of every corporation? These are the property of private adventurers, who call upon you for appropriations from the public treasury to assist in advancing their private fortunes. $10,000 of the last year's appropriation was expended in surveying the route for the Baltimore and Ohio Rail-road, and more is asked for in the bill before the Senate, for the same purpose. And its first fruits were an inordinate speculation in selling out the shares; some of which were sold as high as seventeen hundred per cent. upon the amount paid in. You are to survey this road, and become identified with the company, and should that fail, or find it a losing business, the road can be turned over to the Government to finish. There was another road in which the United States had as little interest as they had in the Baltimore Rail-road. It was a magnificent road from the city of Washington to Buffalo, on Lake Erie. A road five hundred miles in length, to be eighty feet wide, trees grubbed out, and paved with metal, the style of all your roads, and to cost the Government $6,000,000, at the least calculation. And when done can only accommodate a few members of Congress and other persons visiting Washington. There is a road from Zanesville, in Ohio, to Florence, in Alabama, another magnificent work, four hundred miles long, and to be finished in national taste, and which will cost you another $5,000,000.

Break-waters, sea-walls, and artificial harbors, are becoming fashionable. For the Delaware break-water you have just appropriated $2,326,627. The commerce of Philadelphia, broken down by the manufacturing mania, must be revived, and this is an effort, at the expense of the public treasury, to do so; and which, according to every experience upon public works, will cost you $5,000,000 before it is finished. It is said this will be a place of protection to distressed mariners, and especially to those from the South. If the object is protection to southern mariners, why place it at the mouth of the Delaware Bay? There was no plan or estimate for any thing of this character, for the protection of distressed mariners from the capes of Delaware, in the North, to the mouth of the Sabine, in the South, a dangerous coast of more than two thousand miles long. There the distressed mariners are left to buffet the waves.

You are also asked, by a few fishermen who had settled on Nantucket Island, to construct an artificial harbor for their special accommodation, although they have Boston almost in sight, on one side, and Martha's Vineyard on the other: two excellent harbors. Among the reasons assigned for this very expensive work, is a cogent one by the distinguished engineer who made the survey. He says, for want of such an harbor, they frequently lose favorable periods for making the voyage round Cape Horn. Nantucket lies in about 42° North, and Cape Horn in 50° South, seven thousand miles distant, across the Tropics; where they meet every wind that blows, and are driven to every point of the compass. Where vessels are one while becalmed, and the next hour in a hurricane. An artificial harbor, however, at Nantucket is to overcome all these obstacles. Can any thing be more preposterous? Yet this is the opinion of an engineer of boasted science. Mr. S. observed, were he of the break-water school, he should deem it equally justifiable to construct artificial islands on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, for our fishermen to dry their fish on, as, by the treaty of 1783, between the United States and Great Britain, they must abandon the native islands they use for that purpose, on the happening of a certain event. One would be quite as just as the other, and equally constitutional.

So yielding has Congress been to these applications, that the State of Illinois asks for thirty thousand acres of land, not only to clear out her small creeks, but to defray the ordinary expense of building a penitentiary, the common jail for the use of the State.

The Legislature of Indiana, not content with near one million of acres of public land, given to that State during the last session, for her own roads and canals, now asks for lands enough to make a permanent road, bridges, causeways, &c. through the States of Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. A road through four different States, to cost this Government $8,000,000, at the request of Indiana, that asks, at the same time, through another legislative memorial, for the speedy extension of the great Cumberland Road through that State also, for the purpose of encouraging emigration, that the population of the State may be increased! We should think this conclusive evidence of the unlimited and gross extravagance to which this system is approximating with rapidity. What motive can the Government of the United States have for increasing the population of Indiana, more than that of any other State? You are called upon to beat up for volunteers, at a most exorbitant bounty, to go to Indiana to increase her population, and thereby increase her census, to give her more weight in this Government, or it will be deemed illiberal and unjust!

The General Government, in disposing of the public lands in the Western States, gave as an appendage to each township, the central section for the use of schools, to which the children of indigent parents could have an easy access, without the expense of boarding abroad. A plan borrowed from the New England States, where it has long manifested its beneficial effects upon the poorer classes of the community. Two years ago the State of Ohio, with great difficulty, obtained a law of Congress to enable that State to sell these central sections, and place the proceeds in their banks; by which the generous bounty of this Government has been prostituted to the vile purposes of fraud and speculation, in propping up their tottering and insolvent banks. And, in addition to two millions of acres which she now asks for roads, for canals, for harbors, for rivers, for creeks, for bridges, for colleges, and for squatters, that State unblushingly asks for large quantities of other lands for the use of common schools.

Mr. S. said, a beautiful drawing of a road from the city of New York to the city of Albany, a distance of one hundred and sixty miles, had made its appearance. It was difficult to devise what was the object of this road, because one of the finest rivers in the world leads directly from one city to the other; and more than ten steamboats ply between the two every day, carrying from five hundred to one thousand passengers each. Besides, the whole river, from one city to the other, is constantly whitened with sail-boats. And if there be any one route, of the same distance, in the world, that excels all others for an easy, secure, certain, cheap, and speedy passage, it is to be found on that majestic river between New York and Albany. To execute this road in a suitable taste for that region, if compared with the cost of other roads constructed by the United States, will amount to $3,000,000.

As a specimen of government economy, the Engineer had made eight separate surveys to ascertain the proper route for a road whereon to transport the mail from Baltimore to Philadelphia; the constructing of which, as regarded the transportation of the mail, would produce to the United States a considerable loss. This was demonstrable from existing facts, and a comparison with other roads. From Philadelphia to New York was 96 miles, on a good turnpike road. The mail is transported daily between the two for 13,400 dollars. From Baltimore to Philadelphia is also 96 miles, on a road constructed and kept up by the People, who understand their true interest better than Congress, with all its train of Engineers, and the mail is also transported daily between these two cities, and an additional mail transported daily from Baltimore to Washington, during the session of Congress, all for 13,735 dollars. So that the mail is transported from Baltimore to Philadelphia, on a country road, for a less sum than from Philadelphia to New York, on a turnpike road. If we take into consideration the character of this road, its bridges, and especially the one over the Susquehanna, more than a mile wide, its width, its ornaments, and its fripperies, we cannot estimate the cost at less than $1,500,000, the interest of which, at six per cent. will amount to 90,000 dollars per annum. Then, taking these plain facts together, they will give you this result: By adding 13,735 dollars, the sum now paid by the Government for the transportation of the mail, to 90,000 dollars, the interest on the money expended, it will give you $103,735, the real sum the transportation of the mail will cost you for ever after.

Mr. S. remarked, that, when the bill to make an appropriation for the repairs of the Cumberland Road was before the Senate, he stated the average cost of that road had exceeded 13,000 dollars. It was contradicted by one gentleman, who attempted to prove from documents that it did not exceed $6,000 per mile. In defence of what he had then stated, as well as to lay before the Senate an official statement of the cost of the road-making system, in which the United States had so largely embarked, he had collected certain documents of 1827.

In a Report from the Treasury Department, 6th January, 1827, relative to the cost of that road, it appeared it had cost, up to that period, from Cumberland to Wheeling, a distance of only 130 miles, $1,710,298 93, which gives an average of 13,156 dollars per mile, on the whole distance. The sum paid to Commissioners and a Superintendent for that 130 miles, is 78,430 dollars 47 cents, which will average 604 dollars 31 cents per mile, for superintendence only—a sum sufficient itself to make a good road.

Casper W. Wever, the Superintendent, in an official report of the 25th of May, 1827, to the Chief Engineer, gives his estimate of 328,983 dollars 68 cents, then indispensably necessary for the repairs of that 130 miles, which will average 2,522 dollars 95 cents per mile, for repairs only!

Mr. Wever, in another official report, 16th November, 1827, to the Chief Engineer, says: It was of great moment that a system or plan for the regular repairs of that great monument of the wisdom and munificence of the General Government should be established by Congress. And then goes on to say, the road had become too bad to be mended, and must, in a great degree, be made anew. And then further adds, without constant repairs it could never be travelled!

So incredible are the facts relative to the cost of this road that it had become necessary to prove to the Senate, by their own official documents, the truth of their own acts. And, indeed, so extravagant are the facts, that, without such proof, it would appear like an idle dream, that a road cost the Government 13,156 dollars per mile, to construct it, and 2,522 dollars per mile to repair it, in one year, and before that year had expired, had become impassable until it should be made anew. And to insure its future usefulness, the Government must set apart a separate fund, to be drawn upon forever, at the will and pleasure of a superintendent whose interest it was to be perpetually making and mending. Yet, true as this is, and with all its enormities, it is only a foretaste of what is to come, if we are to pursue this system; and more especially when the Government shall have fully embarked in constructing canals, of which there were as many as thirty in the plans and surveys now exhibited to the Senate, some of them 500 miles in length. Among them are the James River and Kenhawa Canal, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, concerning which, Mr. S. said, he would offer a few facts from the reports of the Engineers.

These two canals, very similar in character, taken together, give a distance of about 500 miles in length, and are entirely in the mountains, where nothing was to be seen, from the beginning to the end, but craggy rocks, deep sunken valleys, cataracts, and awful precipices, which were to be encountered at every step. These canals were to be made up of aqueducts, of dams, of culverts, of embankments, of bridges, of locks, and of tunnels. A sample of which is given by the Engineer, in the eastern section of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, a distance of only 186 miles, on the most favorable and least mountainous ground. There are 218 culverts, 9 aqueducts, 160 bridges, and 635 locks; and yet the Engineer estimates the cost of this section to average only 23,985 dollars per mile, whereas, on the middle section, of 70 miles in length, he estimates the average cost at 143,258 dollars per mile. On this section, he estimates the cost of a single tunnel, only 5 miles in length, at 3,500,000 dollars, which will average 700,000 dollars per mile. From these estimates it would be a fair conclusion, that less than 50,000,000 dollars will not be adequate to complete this 500 miles of canal, as the James River and Kenhawa Canal would, according to the survey of the Engineer, require tunnels 10 miles in length, and dams 70 feet high.

In times of old, they levelled the hills and filled up the valleys; but we, who are a wiser People, root up the mountains, and march through their centre. Nature had been bountiful, almost to excess, in the abundance of her rivers and water communications between the Western and Eastern sections of this Union, on which an easy and expeditious intercourse can always be had. But, hereafter, instead of passing along these native channels, at the rate of 15 or 20 miles an hour, we are to be lifted and lowered through more than 2000 locks, to be dragged over 50 aqueducts, and creep, at a snail's pace, through protracted tunnels, as dark and dismal as the mansions of the dead, under the base of tremendous mountains. Surely nothing could surpass the folly of such a project, but the ambition and intrigue of those who planned and cherished it. It reminds us of a modern philosopher of the West, who, not long since, asked you for an outfit to enable him to visit the North Pole, and thence to the centre of the earth, in search of a concave sphere, which he conceived existed there. Were he now to ask, it would not be matter of surprise if his outfit should be granted; provided he would shift his course, and instead of the tedious route by the North Pole, would commence his voyage at one of these tunnels, and make his reconnaissance directly through.

Mr. President, there certainly exists a strange incompatibility in the policy we are pursuing, with regard to economy. On some occasions it is cherished with a zeal that would promise to correct every abuse that may have crept into every branch of the Government, and ensure in future a circumspect and prudent administration of your public funds. But, on other occasions, the public interest seems to be lost sight of. And this diversity of policy was never more obvious than at this moment. Congress are, on one hand, running the full career of retrenchment; exploring the recesses of every department; examining every functionary; and probing every administration to the very quick, that they may save the People's money, and put down a system of corruption; whilst, on the other hand, they were practicing an extravagance and profusion without limits. And the public money is regarded more as common spoil than as the property of the General Government; and he who can first lay hands upon it, bears it off. And if this course is permitted to continue, it must bankrupt this Government, and introduce a species of corruption that would taint it to its vitals. A system, to use the language of a distinguished statesman, to whose eminence he could never aspire, of buying the People with their own money.

Yes, sir, of buying the People with their own money! Eight separate and distinct routes have been surveyed between Baltimore and Philadelphia, by the Engineers appointed to that service; some of them made, without regard to the public interest, under the influence of distinguished men, to suit their own convenience, if we are to give credit to the memorial of the citizens of the county and city of Philadelphia. And that whole community are now enlisted in the cause, who had taken no interest in the question, until these surveys were made, but were moving on in the spirit of laudable enterprise, to construct a turnpike road for themselves.

The Brigade of Engineers who were ordered to survey the route for a great national road from the city of Washington to New Orleans, discharged that duty with very little deviation, by travelling along the public highways, in carriages and steamboats, like other gentlemen; stopping at towns and villages to enlist the feelings of the inhabitants on the side of Internal Improvement, by inducing every man to believe the national road would pass his door. This quieted opposition, and even inquiry, as to the constitutional power of Congress over the subject. Plain, honest, men, who, perhaps, had never looked at the Constitution, were willing to sacrifice their scruples to their interest.

But, Mr. S. observed, notwithstanding these abuses, and many other abuses to which this system was eminently calculated to lead, and to which it must always lead, and would lead, he was not prepared to attach the blame to the President or the other functionaries to whom it had been confided. He was not the advocate of the President or any other man; but he would censure no man but for good cause. You have conferred on the President of the United States the dignified office of an overseer of the roads, and given him two or three Brigades of Engineers to survey the routes and report upon them. When they set out upon a reconnaissance, can he follow in their train, to see that each man does his duty? You have, by the act of 1824, submitted entirely to his discretion to decide what roads were of national importance. And by what means is he to determine this abstruse question? Is the President to travel over the whole United States, in quest of roads, and inspect the grounds on which they are to pass, before he decides upon their nationality? Is this practicable? If it is not, by what means is he to arrive at his purpose, but by means of information from others? When he has done so, it is ascribed to him as partiality. And the members of Congress are quarrelling with the President, and among themselves, because some have got the start of others in this race for roads. The members complain they have not obtained their full share. Some say they are not in favor, and therefore have not succeeded in their efforts to obtain surveys of their favorite roads.

It was, Mr. S. said, among his objections to the system, the great inequality and injustice of its practical operations in the different sections of the Union. And this fact was fully demonstrated. At the present session there were applications from the Western States, all of which had received already large donations in public lands, for at least 10,000,000 of acres, for Internal Improvements, and other purposes of their own. And there were applications now before Congress, in some shape or other, for appropriations for Internal Improvements in the different States, except the States of South Carolina and Georgia, for more than $300,000,000. And with all this preparation and appropriation, in the other States, to fill them with roads and canals, at the expense of the public Treasury, not a chain had been stretched, nor a Jacob staff planted, within the States of South Carolina and Georgia, by authority of the General Government, for that purpose; and because their Legislatures have not deemed it constitutional, nor proper that their members in Congress should join in the general struggle for the mere favors of the General Government, and higgles and huckster for a road or a canal, as they would in a market or fair for a bale of goods or an ox.

Among the arguments why we should appropriate $2,326,000; to begin a Breakwater at the mouth of the Delaware Bay, we are told of the customs collected in the port of Philadelphia, on foreign goods imported, which gave that city high claims to the protection of the Government. Sir, it is not the revenue you collect on foreign merchandise that constitutes the real wealth of a nation. It is the amount of your exports you are enabled to send abroad that constitutes your national wealth. If you have nothing to send abroad, you can expect nothing to bring home. And turn it as you will, all your revenue is ultimately paid from the agricultural pursuits of the laboring community, who are entitled to their full share of the dividends of the Treasury. In order to ascertain the relative proportions of the agricultural product of each State and Territory, and thereby test the proportion of protection each one was entitled to on that principle, he had extracted from the statistics of Waterston and Van Zandt the following table; and had selected the year 1818, as a medium year, and one as little encumbered with foreign or domestic embarrassment as any other. In that year, the exports were, from—

If we deduct the exports from South Carolina and Georgia

And if we again take into calculation that portion of our produce which goes coastwise, and is either manufactured or exported from the Northern States, it will be seen, evidently, that the small States of South Carolina and Georgia, both of which have but sixteen Representatives in Congress, out of two hundred and thirteen, exported more than half as much as all the other States and Territories in the Union, including the vast and fertile valley of the Mississippi. If the Constitution authorizes this system of road and canal making, why are not provisions and benefits extended to those two States that have contributed so largely to the growing prosperity of the Union, as well as to all the other States and Territories? The Constitution has wisely provided that all the privileges, immunities, and benefits therein provided for, shall be extended to each State upon some uniform and fixed principle, and not left to chance; nor yet to the opinions of an interested majority, who should carve out for themselves what suits their own purposes, without regard to the interest of the minority.

The advocates of this system, from the earliest efforts to bring it into operation, have not been able to agree upon any one given power in the Constitution that will justify it. Some derive it from the power given to Congress to declare war; some from the power to establish post offices and post roads; some from the power to regulate commerce; some from the power to provide for the common defence and general welfare; and others from the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. And they have travelled on with these uncertain guides, and with this diversity of opinion, each coming to the same conclusion from different premises, and making a joint stock business of it, and playing political sequents—do you take your road, and then give me mine—until it is justified upon any ground that happens to correspond with a gentleman's views of what he would call good policy.

We are told by some gentlemen they are pleased with this system, and wish it to be carried on upon an enlarged plan, because it develops the resources of your country, and facilitates your commercial intercourse, and prepares you for war during peace. Others say, without it you cannot dispose of your surplus revenue. And they tell us so, with a perfect knowledge of a public debt of seventy millions of dollars hanging over our heads; a great proportion of which is the debt created for the support of your Revolutionary war, more than fifty years ago. But some of your most sage and experienced statesmen of the present day, have recently discovered that a national debt is a national blessing. They tell you, were you to pay off your national debt, you would throw too large a quantity of money into circulation; and this is given as a reason for going on with the system of roads and canals. But how fallacious is the argument? If you are to expend your revenue in constructing roads and canals, and lavish it away upon undertakers and idle engineers, will it not throw your money as much into circulation as it would were you to pay it to your public creditors? And can it be material, as to its effect, through what channel it goes into circulation? This argument is about as well-founded as any other that has been offered in support of this system. Your national debt will be a national blessing to contractors and undertakers of your roads and canals, who will share largely in the spoil; and it will be a blessing to your money lenders, to speculators, to brokers, and to stock-jobbers, whose trade it is to watch over the misfortunes of the rest of the community, and take advantage of their adversities; but will prove a national curse to the morals of the people of this Government, and bankrupt the Government itself, as it has done in all other Governments that have pursued it; and you will enjoy this blessing to your utmost wishes, before you are done with your roads and canals!

Gentlemen tell us they consider not only the policy, but the constitutional principle likewise, are both settled as regards this long contested question.

Ask upon what principle it had been settled, and one gentleman tells you it was settled by the law of Congress passed on the 30th of April, 1824, "to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates upon the subject of roads and canals;" and which another gentleman very frankly avows was forced through Congress, and which passed the Senate by less than one-half of its members.

Another gentleman affirms the constitutional question was settled twenty years ago, when Congress voted a donation of $50,000 worth of flour to the people of Caraccas, and shipped it to that city in American vessels, after they had suffered by the earthquake. This donation was voted by Congress in a moment of good feeling, because they were republicans. And, immediately upon its reaching its port of destination, was seized by a band of royal forces, and made prize of. And there your republican present terminated. And because Congress arbitrarily assumed the right of voting away a sum of money to a foreign people, it is taken as a fair exposition of the Constitution, to warrant any disposition Congress may think fit to make of the public moneys in future; and consequently to appropriate any sum within its grasp to internal improvement.

Mr. S. supposed the Greek frigate, when it shall have become sufficiently known to bring it on the theatre of action, will be ranked in the first class of Congressional precedents. This Greek frigate was purchased to save a falling mercantile house in New York. Congress, in the exuberance of its good feelings, of which it always has an abundance in store, was casting about to find some fit occasion to expend a little money in the Greek cause, as they were Christians, and occupied that classic ground once the seat of the Muses; when it was suggested by some of the members, the expediency of building a frigate, and sending it out for their service. And this was buzzed about Congress in broken accents and whispers, and was adopted with great enthusiasm; and those New York broken merchants got the job, and with it upwards of $300,000 of your public money; and the frigate they supplied you good for nothing. Here your Greek benevolence expired! But the deed itself will remain as a monument of your power to give away, or to waste as much public money as you please, whenever a majority in Congress shall think fit to do so.

Another gentleman asks, what is to become of the Military Academy at West Point, if you do not go on with internal improvement? And further asks, for what are you giving a mathematical and scientific education to the young men of your country, if you would not employ them in developing the resources of the nation? And tells us this city is to be the centre of science, where all the scientific men in the Union will be brought together. And then asks you, how are the States and companies to progress in their internal improvements, but by obtaining the benefit of this science from the General Government? And seems to think this a strong illustration of your constitutional power over the subject.

Mr. S. said he would answer those interrogatories. If the Government of the United States is to keep up a Military Academy at West Point, or elsewhere, to educate the sons of members of Congress, and the sons of their friends and favorites, where they were educated entirely at the expense of the Government, and under pay, in the mean time, of $228 per year, there could be no question but you would soon have a number of scientific men without employment. And if you would then give them commissions in the Army, with high pay, and increase that pay every session, which you were pretty much in the habit of doing, with additional pay as engineers, transportation and expenses paid, for amusing themselves through the country, you would soon render this the seat of science. And with these inducements, and the growing prospects for all Government agents, you will not only collect to this place all the military science from West Point, but from the whole Union, for where the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered. But if it has been the policy of the Government to increase the military science of the country, and place it here in bureaux and other seats of idleness, what had that to do with the constitutional question of the powers of Congress to construct roads and canals?

Mr. President, instead of referring to the Constitution itself, the unerring standard of its own solutions, laid down as a guide, even to future ages, are we to look for the solutions of its principles in the laws and resolutions of Congress, passed, no matter under what influence, by less than a majority of either House; and many of them passed without even a majority being present? Or are we to look for the solution of its principles in the Military Academy, or the accumulation of science at the Seat of Government? This is but a feeble demonstration of the charter of your liberties. It is the road to tyranny. The despot does not grasp the sceptre at a single move, but by a succession of usurpations that ripen into law. No tyrant that ever lived, who did not make his way by the sword, had ever made greater inroads upon the fundamental principles of free Government, in the same space of time, than Congress had upon the obvious principles of the Constitution within the last twelve years.

Mr. S. said, when he took the oath, in the presence of this Senate, to protect the Constitution of the United States, he did not go into the Secretary's office, and turn over the musty documents that had lain there for forty years, to teach him the knowledge of that Constitution he had sworn upon the holy Evangelists to protect. Nor did he believe the duty prescribed under that sacred obligation was to be found in the law of the 30th of April, 1824. Nor did he resort to the brigades of engineers, with all their science of mathematics, and differential calculus, to inspire him with their touch, but to the Constitution itself, to learn its provisions.

But if this important question rested upon authorities alone, the weight of authorities are opposed to the system. General Hamilton, who was anxious to support it, doubted, and recommended an amendment of the Constitution, to provide for it. But he had too much good sense to sacrifice the Constitution to convenience; and remarked that "the degree in which a thing was necessary could never be the test of the legal right to adopt it."

Mr. Jefferson is said to have recommended the construction of the Cumberland Road. But all the advocates of the road system place that road on the ground of compact. Besides, Mr. Jefferson, at the time he recommended it, expressed his doubts, and, like General Hamilton, advised that the Constitution should be amended. Yet he lived to look back upon it as the greatest error of his political life, and to regret it with bitterness of soul.

President Madison negatived the celebrated bonus bill, in 1817, the rallying point of the aspiring politicians of that day, for which he assigned reasons, recorded in your annals, that will bear the scrutiny of the profoundest statesman, and convince the most visionary opponent. Nor did that bill pass in the House of Representatives by more than two votes of a majority, 84 to 82, and that upon grounds that are entirely abandoned now.

President Monroe, in his first message to Congress, at the succeeding session, anticipated the question, and assured Congress as the subject had undergone an elaborate discussion, and had been negatived by his predecessor, he also would negative such a bill were they to pass it. Although this was no more than fulfilling a faithful duty, yet it gave rise to much zeal, which was followed up by a report that censured the President for anticipating, prematurely, as they supposed, a subject of so much interest; and a number of resolutions were submitted, and discussed at great length. Three of which he would bring to the attention of the Senate, and show how they resulted:

2. "Resolved, That Congress have power, under the Constitution, to construct post roads and military roads. Provided private property be not taken for public use without just compensation." Negatived—yeas 82, nays 84.

3. "Resolved, That Congress have power, under the Constitution, to construct roads and canals, necessary for commerce between the States. Provided private property be not taken for public use without just compensation." Negatived—yeas 71, nays 95.

4. "Resolved, That Congress have power, under the Constitution, to construct canals for military purposes. Provided private property be not taken for public use without just compensation." Negatived—yeas 81, nays 83.

These resolutions put the question into every shape,

* See his Report, 119.

Internal Improvements.

and protected the rights of individuals, yet not one succeeded. A number of gentlemen who voted uniformly against all those resolutions, and against every modification in which they were, on that occasion, so variously placed, are now among the zealous supporters of this system, with their votes recorded against the constitutional power. Some of those gentlemen are now with us, and voting for this bill. What was unconstitutional ten years ago, is constitutional now.

This project proved abortive, and fell in the House of Representatives. But, in consequence of censure thrown on President Monroe by that report, he wrote a book, and communicated it to Congress five years after, in the form of a message, with his negative of the "bill to establish turnpike gates on the Cumberland Road," in which he demonstrated, with unanswerable arguments and illustrations, that Congress did not possess the power to construct roads and canals. That message is also recorded in your annals with President Madison's negative, where they will remain as monuments of the true construction of the Constitution, and of wisdom, that will outweigh all your theories of constructive power, and necessity, and convenience, put together.

Now it is evident that all the authorities are opposed to the system, up to the law of 30th April, 1824, which, we are told, was forced through Congress, and which passed the Senate by less than a majority of its members. Previous to that law, it had never received the legal sanction of the Government in a single instance, except the Cumberland Road, and some Territorial roads, both of which its friends had considered exceptions. It was true, the former Secretary of War had a number of those objects of internal improvement examined and surveyed, before the passage of the law of 1824, not by authority of any law, but by virtue of his inherent power as Secretary of War, and which were called national objects.

The term, National was a new word that had crept into our political vocabulary, and growing pretty much into use. It was a term unknown to the origin and theory of our Government. The first article of the confederation says, "The style of this confederacy shall be 'The United States of America.'" A part of the Federal Convention styled it a National Government. It was, however, made a question, and Mr. Ellsworth moved to expunge the word National, and place in the room of it "Government of the United States,"* which was agreed to by the unanimous vote of the Convention. Mr. Ellsworth, who was a distinguished patriot, and an eminent statesman, saw the bearing of the word National, and therefore moved, not in the ordinary phraseology to strike out, but to expunge it! However, all that guarded precaution is now exploded, and the word has become technical.

Although he denied the legitimacy of the term, and considered it an insidious word, when used as descriptive of our Government, he would nevertheless adopt it upon this occasion. And without wishing to impugn the private or political character of any functionary of the government, he would ask, who clothed the Secretary of War, or the President of the United States, with power to designate any road a National road, or any canal a National canal? Or, he would ask, by what rule an agent of the government can distinguish between roads and canals that are national, and roads and canals that are not national? The Senator from Delaware [Mr. M'LANE,] strenuously argues, that there is manifestly a clear distinction, and that the Breakwater in Delaware Bay is a national object, and the road to be constructed between the city of Baltimore and the city of Philadelphia is a national road. Mr. S. said, he would ask any gentleman learned on this subject, to inform him where the nationality of a road begins, or where its nationality ends? He would test the question in this way. Suppose the road that is to lead from Baltimore to Philadelphia to be a national road, as the gentleman supposes; would it lose its national character were it to deviate and pass two degrees west of Philadelphia? If it would not, would it do so were it to deviate ten degrees west of Philadelphia? If it would, at what point between two and ten degrees did it lose its national character? If a road be national that leads from one point to another, and not national if it leads to a different point, at what shade of deviation does it become denationalized?

This question is susceptible of but one definition. A road, canal, breakwater, river, or creek, becomes national or not national, in the ratio of its supporters, and and the influence of those who ask it. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. M'LANE,] says he will support none of those objects, unless they are national objects; and that the Delaware breakwater, for which you have appropriated the large sum of 2,326,000 dollars, is a national object, because it is for the benefit of the community at large. How will he estimate Cunningham creek in Ohio, for which this bill appropriates only 1517 dollars? Is that a national object? A petty creek! Still that gentleman votes for it; although we have not heard a word of its utility to any body. He thought with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] that one road was as much national as another, if made for the use of the community.

Until Congress became road makers, every portion of the community made their own roads. Are one portion of the community to be relieved of this burthen, and the others left to bear it? And if the Constitution has transferred the power from the community to Congress, to construct commercial roads, has not every man an equal claim to a portion of them? And is not the road over which the poor farmer travels with his one-horse cart, but twenty miles, to seek a market for the small product of his yearly labor, as much a national road as the road from the western frontier of Missouri to the confines of Mexico, over which the rich capitalists of that State are to travel, in quest of the gold and silver bullion and the dollars of their Spanish neighbors? The more you investigate this subject, the more abstruse it appears, and every step you advance adds new proofs of its absurdity.

Mr. S. here left this part of the subject, and said he would now examine the bearings of the constitution upon this question. The constitution was formed at a time, and under circumstances, that forbid a belief that any power was left to chance or construction. It was formed, too, by an assemblage of patriots, whose talents would have graced a Roman Senate, in times of its meridian splendor, and whose virtues were yet untainted by intrigue or ambition. Their object was to confer certain powers on the general government, but to fix a permanent limit to those powers; not to form a constitution that should be a plaything in the hands of Congress, to be applied as convenience or interest should dictate. It was the first written constitution the world ever saw, except that given from Heaven to the people of Israel.—But in less than 30 years from its adoption, it has been thrown aside among the rubbish, as not understood, or, if understood at all, not by any two politicians in the same way. Gentlemen are weary of the Constitution. It has become too unfashionable, and not easily defined. Every other art and science, and every calling and profession among civilized men, are understood by those who pursue them; and are understood in the same way; because they have their appropriate and technical means of being understood. This protection is denied to the constitution. It had been stript of all the ordinary rules of construction, by which alone the meaning of this or any other instrument can be perpetuated. But, however unfashionable it may be, or however unavailing the result, he would endeavor, by the ordinary rules of construction, and the fair import of the words employed in the constitution itself, to demonstrate that the construction contended for by the advocates of this power was erroneous, and dangerous to this government.

Among those who attempt to derive this power from the Constitution, some of them have relied upon that clause which gives Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

Nothing can be more foreign to the common and universally received import of the words "to regulate commerce," than to suppose they contain a positive power to egress, to construct roads and canals, or piers and breakwaters. The power is given to regulate, not to create commerce. Commerce has a definite signification. It means the ordinary buying and selling, and bartering, between the citizens of the same country, and the citizens of one country with the citizens of another country—and it means no more. Universal usage has fixed its boundaries so permanently, they cannot be shaken by any artificial or sophistical argument. It needs no foreign aid—if it did, every thing said upon the subject supports this definition. Mortimer's Commercial Dictionary defines it to be the interchange of commodities for other articles, or some representative of value for which other commodities can be procured." But he connects no roads or canals, piers or breakwaters with it. That addition has been exclusively a work of Congress.

Chancellor Kent, of New-York, one of the ablest jurists of the age, in his Commentaries upon the Laws of the United States, as well as of his own State, has treated largely on the powers of Congress to regulate commerce, in his remarks upon the decision of the Court of the United States in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, † in which he confines it entirely to a power to regulate traffic and intercourse. But the commentator says, in treating further upon the opinions of the Court—"It was admitted, that inspection laws, relative to the quality of articles to be exported, and quarantine laws, and health laws of every description, and laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c. were component parts of an immense mass of legislation, not surrendered to the general government." ‡

This is the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, upon the very point in question, in which they say the right is not surrendered to the General Government. If you have this power, why not grasp the whole subject, and regulate the turnpike roads and ferries, and regulate the inspection laws? They are more intimately connected with commerce than roads and canals. Sir, as well might we say Congress had the power to furnish the boats, as to make the canals on which they are to ply. As well might we say Congress shall provide the wagons and teams, as to construct and keep in repair the roads on which they are to travel. It can be done for much less money, and it equally concerns trade and commerce.

If he was permitted to construe this clause of the Constitution from the context, which was sanctioned by the known and established rules of construction, he thought he could give a new view of the subject, which had not heretofore been broached by any body, and one which he conceived conclusive against the power.

It is only necessary to state the case to render it self-evident. This clause contains three distinct paragraphs. The first, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations;" the second, "to regulate commerce among the several States;" the third, "to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes." The very same powers, precisely, are conferred on Congress, by each paragraph. They are so minutely the same, that the most subtle casuist cannot discriminate between them. Will you then carry through your scheme, and whilst you are constructing the national road from the western frontier of Missouri to the confines of Mexico, continue that national road through the Spanish province to the City of Mexico? Or will you, whilst constructing the road from Mattawamkeag to Mars Hill, in Maine, continue it on through the British province to Montreal or Quebec? If you have the power, under the second paragraph, to construct a road in Maine or Missouri, you clearly have it under the first to construct a road in Mexico or Canada. For it would never have been intended by the Convention to form any part of the Constitution, in the same words, to be applied to the same objects, and to produce the same results, without a shade of difference, wherein it was more than evident that one part could be executed, and the remainder could not, under any possible circumstances. Can sophistry itself obviate this palpable absurdity?

But it is said that under the power given to Congress "to establish post offices and post roads," the power is unlimited. But here the power, as in the case of regulating commerce, must depend upon the phraseology of the sentence, and the practicability of the object to be accomplished. If neither of them justify this implied construction, the power cannot exist. It is said, the word "establish," means to construct. When a majority of a political assembly were bent upon their object, they could give such definition to a word as best suited their purpose. But the word "establish," as settled by all lexicographers, means nothing more than to fix, to settle, to make permanent. And Congress itself, in all its post road laws, had confirmed that definition. And surely their own legal definitions are good authority.—The title of the bill now before the Senate for that purpose is "A bill to alter and establish post roads." The act for that purpose of the 2d of March, 1827, by its title, is "An act to establish sundry post roads." Its enacting section is, "That the following be established as post roads." This act establishes 270 new post roads. Some of them more than 300 miles in length. And taken together, not less than 10,000 miles in length. When Congress pass a law to construct a road, they say so in so many words; as in an act of the same date of the above, the title of which is, "An act to authorize the laying out and opening certain roads."

This was also an object totally beyond the capacity of the government to accomplish, and must have been known to the Convention to be so; therefore could never have entered into the plan of "establishing post offices and post roads," to leave an implied power that must consume annually three times the amount of your revenue. Because, if to "establish" signifies to construct, it then becomes imperative on Congress to construct every post road in the Union. And to show that it was a work far beyond the resources of this government to execute, it was only necessary to say, there were already 7000 post offices, all of which the government must build, and 100,000 miles of post roads to construct; which, according to the cheapest estimates of the post roads heretofore constructed, would cost the government 500,000,000 dollars, with an average increase of 5000 annually. § It would cost you four times as much annually as the whole expense of administering this government, including every department in it, army, navy, and all. It is utterly impossible, Sir, to imagine, that a deliberative assembly, like that convention, could have dreamed of leaving such a formidable power concealed within another power, and to be dragged out only by implication, when, some thirty or forty years thereafter, the majority of Congress should think fit to call it into action. The enormity of this power is none the less because Congress have not hitherto, constructed all the roads they claim the power over.—But the exercise of that power is now about to commence its operation in its most extravagant form.

It has been argued by the friends of this measure, that, without this implied construction, Congress could not carry on the ordinary operations of the mail. It might, they say, be impeded by the States. But if it were possible that any State, or any people, could be so lost to their own interest as to obstruct the mail, you have already passed laws more than sufficient to punish such wanton temerity. You have given by law the superiority of the roads and highways to the mail carriers; and every body is obliged to give the road. If any person obstructs the passage of the mail, he is punishable by fine and imprisonment. If the mail is robbed, it is made a penitentiary offence. If, in robbing the mail, the mail carrier is put in fear of his life, you punish the offender with death. And surely the power you hold over the purse, over the personal liberty, and over the life and death of the offender who shall dare to obstruct the passage of the mail, is as ample as it would be safe to place in the hands of Congress.

The power given by the Constitution of the United States "to declare war," has been greatly relied on, as giving, by implication, the power to construct military roads; which, we are told, can be used, in times of peace, for post roads, and commercial roads. You have passed through two bloody wars successfully, without a military road. Is it to be supposed your enemy is to meet you at the end of your military road, or is he to use it as well as you who make it? You must be prepared to meet your enemy wherever you find him; not where you would wish. War roads, when necessary, can only be made for the occasion, and that must be left to the discretion of the commander of your army. Can any thing be more ridiculous than Congress constructing military roads without knowing where the operations of war are to rage? The universal consent of mankind has established it, without repeal, that the operations of war provide their own roads.

It is a rule of construction, never to be departed from, that, in reconciling a doubtful law, it is only necessary to ascertain the intention of the lawgiver, and that will settle the construction. The intention of the Convention, on that occasion, is so palpable as to leave no doubt whatever. Various propositions were submitted by different members of that Convention; among them was Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina. One of Mr. Pinckney's propositions was, "That Congress should have power to establish military roads." Although many of Mr. Pinckney's other propositions were adopted, they rejected this one to establish military roads. Rejecting it, is a demonstration that the power was not given; and therefore cannot be implied without violating the settled principles of construction.

Besides, it is a power by no means essential to either raising or supporting an army. Nor did the Convention believe so, or they must have adopted it; and more especially, as the proposition was directly submitted. The evidence is abundant from the constitution itself. They gave Congress "power to declare war," which would irresistibly have implied a power to raise and support armies. They might have declared war, but how were they to carry it on without an army? They did carry on a prosperous war without constructing a single road.—Raising an army would also irresistibly imply the power to support an army. Yet they are both expressly provided for in so many words. There is a distinct clause giving Congress "the power to provide and maintain a navy." Another to make rules concerning captures on land and water; and various other distinct provisions; all of which are minutely and separately expressed—whilst the power to construct military roads is left to be picked out of some of the other powers by implication.

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare."

On the last clause of this paragraph, "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," great reliance had also been placed, to derive the power to construct roads and canals: to which a concise answer would be sufficient. As this precedes the enumeration of powers, it can have no allusion, but to the several objects therein enumerated, all of which are intended to promote either the common defence or general welfare: providing a navy, raising an army, &c. are providing for the common defence. Regulating commerce, establishing post offices, &c. are providing for the general welfare. But a saving clause, to precede the enumerated powers, would be a palpable absurdity. It would resemble a conveyancer, who should convey the appurtenances, before he conveyed the premises; or a dying man, who should bequeath the residue of his estate, before he bequeathed the specific legacies. If this had succeeded the enumerated powers, it would have been an absurdity; because it would embrace every possible object within the scope of legislative action, and would have totally superseded every enumerated power, and left Congress under no other restraint than that of their own unbridled will.

A correlative doctrine is founded on the first part of the clause—the power of Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." Having the power to collect money, Congress can dispose of it in any manner they think fit; therefore, they have the power to apply it to construct roads and canals. General Hamilton first gave this opinion; others have since followed in his train. It is difficult to conceive how they reconcile this principle, that Congress can authorize another power to expend and distribute the public moneys, when the advocates of the measure acknowledge Congress itself cannot expend it for the same objects. This is a broad ground of construction, and one not warranted by the ordinary import of the words. The same remarks may be applied here, that were applied to the last part of the sentence, "the common defence and general welfare." "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises," compose the first enumerated power given to Congress. And then follows, in immediate succession, the objects upon which the moneys collected from taxes, duties, imposts and excises, shall be expended. And if there be any meaning at all in the sentence, it is limited, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Your debts are not yet paid, and "the common defence" is defined in the power given "to provide a navy, raise armies, organizing, training, and disciplining the militia," &c. And your "general welfare" is defined in the power given to "regulate commerce, establish post offices and post roads, coin money," &c.

Taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, are that part of the property of the people at large, which they are called upon to contribute, for carrying into operation the objects set forth in the enumerated powers. This they have heretofore yielded a willing obedience to. To support your wars, they submitted to a stamp act, to an excise, to furniture tax, &c. When the thirteenth Congress declared the last war with England, no member would hazard his popularity to propose a tax, and the war had nearly failed under their timid silence; the people goaded Congress into a tax, and an onerous one ensued, which they bore with the magnanimity of freemen, because they believed it a constitutional duty. But let your revenue from imposts fall short, and a tax be laid for roads and canals, breakwaters and tunnels—you would find a revolt from one end of the Union to another. They would not be led by the giddy dance of every politician that should construe the first part of the constitution he might happen to turn to, as containing implied powers to justify a burdensome tax upon his neighbor, to make convenient roads for himself. No gentleman of Congress, in these times, however, could be considered a constitutional lawyer, unless he was master of the implied powers that were supposed to lurk in all its provisions. The principles of construction that now govern us, reminded him of some merry writer in the newspapers, who said, "Construction is an artful swindler, and bubbles more people out of their rights than twenty armies. Give me construction for a lever, and I will construe the world off its hinges without any thing to rest my lever on." And should the powers of construction, which Congress have assumed, continue to advance, it would soon possess a more unlimited power than any monarch in Europe; and one that would shake this government to its centre. For this belief, evidences are not wanting.]

But with all these powers of implication, no one had yet found upon what clause of the Constitution the right of soil was given, whereon to construct those roads and canals, without which an implied power to construct would be destitute of foundation, and the whole fabric must tumble. This objection did not rest upon the simple negative, that the powers not delegated to the United States were retained by the States or the people, only, which was conclusive, but on another negative, which amounts to a positive denial of the right of sovereignty. Congress are expressly empowered, in the 8th section of the 1st article, the very section and article from whence the constructive powers are drawn,

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

Congress could not exercise the smallest degree of legislation over the ten miles square, itself, on which they have erected the Capitol of the United States, not so much as to lay the foundation of the building, until the States of Maryland and Virginia each passed laws authorizing the Government of the United States to take it, and Congress passed a law authorizing the acceptance. Nor can they build a fort, magazine, arsenal, or dockyard, all of which are indispensably necessary for the protection and defence of the country, and intimately connected with the subject of war, and without which your army must lose a main part of its safeguard, and your navy be neglected, until they first purchase the soil on which they are to be erected, by the consent of the States in which such place may lie, and pass a correspondent law to accept it for that purpose. Yet it is contended, that Congress have an implied power to construct roads and canals wheresoever they please. That this negative was a complete denial of the power, there could not be a question. For, according to a well known rule expressing what they might purchase and accept, by the consent of the Legislature of a State, excludes the power to accept any other. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The expression of one proposition excludes any other proposition. Because, if Congress had the power, there could be no reason for giving it again; if they had it not, they could take no more than what was given.

[Your Sedition Laws, Tariffs, Colonization Societies, Memorials for a General Emancipation, &c. &c. are all the off-spring of implied power.

The Senate has just passed an act for constructing a military road in the State of Maine: provided that the Legislature of the State of Maine shall consent thereto. And the Legislature of Pennsylvania has passed a resolution authorizing Congress to erect toll-gates on that portion of the Cumberland Road that lies within that State, with many provisos limiting and controlling the operations of Congress.

Sir, has it come to this, that the United States which have assumed and maintained so elevated a rank among the nations of the earth, and whose Constitution has been the admiration of the world, for its well defined, and well balanced, powers between the General Government and the Government of the States, by which alone they supposed its durability secured, must truckle to a single State, a member of its own body, and beg or chaffer for the paltry privilege of making a road within the limits, and for the benefit of that State—and to be dictated to and circumscribed in the exercise of that privilege? Does such a course comport with the dignity of this Government? Or, what is infinitely more important for our consideration, does it comport with the safety of this Government?

If the Government of the United States have not the right of sovereignty over the soil, by the power of the Constitution, can the State of Pennsylvania bestow that right of sovereignty? If she can, does it not put it in the power of a single State to make an essential change in the Constitution, and confer a power which all the States, in convention, withheld from the General Government? If the General Government has that right by the Constitution, Pennsylvania cannot bestow it. But suppose Pennsylvania should carry her doctrine further, and yield up the sovereignty of the whole State, for if she can yield a part she can yield the whole, and the State of New York and the State of Ohio should follow her example, could they not form a confederacy in the very centre, that would dictate to the whole Union, and originate a nucleus that would at once consolidate the Government? Sir, if the other States follow the example of Pennsylvania, and surrender their sovereignty by piecemeals, your State Governments will not be worth preserving; and, if they were, they could have that privilege but a little while. Who were the statesmen that first pushed this doctrine? Those who are looking to empire.

Sir, the tariff of 1816, for a system of protecting duties to manufactures; the bonus bill of 1817, for a system of Internal Improvements; the report of the Secretary of War, of 1819, recommending an extensive system of military road and canals; and the law of 1824, for procuring plans, estimates, and surveys for national roads and canals, were the priests that bound your Constitution fast in cords, and laid it at the foot of the altar of caprice, avarice, interest, and ambition, and we, their surrogates, are about to immolate the victim.

After Mr. S. concluded his speech, Mr. KANE said, he rose for the purpose of doing that which would better have been done yesterday, to respond to the appeal made to the Senators from Illinois, by the presiding officer of the Senate, as to his conversations and opinions upon the subject of the Illinois canal bill, which was before the Senate two years ago. The statement of the conversation, which that gentleman had done him the honor to hold with him, and of the opinions expressed by him, and at the time designated, corresponded substantially, and, he would say, exactly, with clear recollection upon the subject.

Mr. THOMAS remarked, that it would afford him great pleasure to have it in his power to corroborate the statement made by the President yesterday, but he had no recollection of the conversation alluded to by the President. On the contrary, he recollects distinctly to have gone to the table of one of the members from Indiana, [Mr. NOBLE,] to compare notes with him, both having counted the votes as the call was made. The votes being equal, I remarked that we should carry the bill; the President will give the casting vote in favor of it. The reply was, you are mistaken, sir; he will vote against the bill. I state this to show that I cannot be mistaken: but I again repeat, that I should be glad to have it in my power to corroborate the statement. Some time after the rejection of the bill, my colleague informed me that the Vice President and himself had held such a conversation as that stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT remarked, that, when he had the conversation with the Senator from Illinois, he had thought the other Senator was present—but it must have been another Senator.

Mr. T. said, that, but for the circumstance of his making the remark to the gentleman from Indiana, at the time, he might distrust his own memory.

The question being then taken on ordering the bill making appropriations for Internal Improvement to a third reading, it was decided in the affirmative—22 to 10.

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 1828.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BENTON moved to take up the bill to graduate the prices of public lands; which being agreed to, and the amendment, offered as a substitute, by Mr. BARTON, being under consideration—

Mr. BENTON said, that, to the two first amendments he had paid no attention in debate. They were parodies of his own bill, and good answers, as far as they went, to the arguments against his bill; but the third amendment was a different affair. It resembled his bill in nothing. It was a complex, unequal, and injurious measure; and he would first read it to the Senate, and then state his objections to it, point by point, and clause by clause.

The amendment: ["Strike out all the first section, after the word 'prices,' in the 8th line, and all the second section, and insert the following:"] "All lands that shall have been subject to entry at private sale, for the term of five years, at one dollar per acre; for the term of ten years, at seventy-five cents per acre; for the term of fifteen years, at fifty cents per acre; and for the term of twenty years, at twenty-five cents per acre."

The amendment being read, Mr. B. said he had various, distinct and separate objections to it, which he would state to the Senate with all possible brevity and precision.

In the first place, it would fix a separate day for every separate tract of land to come into market. He proved this by showing that each individual tract was to fall from one price to another, upon its own age, according to the length of time which it had been in market. The purchaser must find out how many years each tract had been subject to entry at the four different prices named; and this would introduce an infinite variety of days for different tracts to be purchasable at different prices. Not only districts and townships would have different days, but even parts of the same section; as all the time that any tract had been out of market, by previous sale, relinquishment, or reservation, would have to be deducted, and these deductions, added to the original inequality of proclaiming the lands for sale, or offering them for sale on different days. The infinite number of these dates which would have to be learned, and noted down, for no human memory could retain them, might be guessed at from the fact that a single million of acres would present fifty thousand of them. Every half quarter section would have its own date, at each successive reduction of price, the number of half quarter sections in a million of acres was twelve thousand five hundred, and the number of reductions of price would be four to each half quarter; by consequence, fifty thousand dates to every million of acres; and the first section of the bill was applicable to eighty millions of acres! The acquisition of these innumerable dates, and their application to their respective ranges, townships, and sections, would be impossible to the body of the people. Those only could learn them who could quit all other business, abandon their homes, and live at the land offices. This would give rise to an intermediate set of land agents, a set of persons to collect information of dates, and sell that information to the people; selling, perhaps, the wrong date as often as the right one.

Mr. B. contrasted this complicated and expensive machinery with the simplicity of the bill drawn by himself. His bill fixed but one day, and that the same day throughout all the States and Territories, for all the public lands to fall from price to price. That day would be fixed in the law, and would be known all over the Union. There could be no mistake or dispute about it. It was the first Monday in November next; and the first Monday in the same month, in the second, fourth, and sixth years thereafter. Mr. B. hoped that the Senate would appreciate the simplicity of his bill, and the complexity, oppression, and hardship of the amendment proposed to it. He begged them to save the people from the labor of learning, or the expense of purchasing a knowledge of fifty thousand dates for every million of acres of public land, with all the chances of being deceived and defrauded by a set of intermediate land agents.

In the next place, he objected to the deceptive name and nature of the amendment. It professed to keep up the graduating principle; but the profession was one thing, and the fact another. It was the imitation of the boatman, who looks one way and rows the other. While professing to graduate the price of the lands, the amendment, in point of fact, avoided all graduation, all regular descent by degrees, and leapt at once from the highest to the lowest price, from the topmost round to the bottom of the ladder. He read the amendment over again, and invoked the attention of the Senate to the import of its peculiar phraseology. He pointed out the variations between it and his own bill, and continued: Who is so blind as not to see, that, under this amendment, if it becomes a law, all the land that has been in market twenty years will be purchasable at twenty-five cents per acre the first day that the law goes into effect? and all that has been in market fifteen years will be purchasable on the same day for fifty cents per acre? The Senate had heard it incessantly objected to the graduation system contained in his bill, that it would degenerate into a mere scale of depreciation, and sink the price of all lands in five years to twenty-five cents. What, then, must be their astonishment to see the author of that objection propose a plan by which the price of the same land was to be thrown down, not in five years, but in one day, to the same identical sum? Mr. B. then exposed the injustice of offering lands which had been in market fifteen or twenty years, for less than was demanded for those which had been in market five or ten years. He said that the distinction was fallacious; that difference in the number of years which different lands had been in market, was no evidence of difference in their value, because all were held up at the same price—all at $1 25 per acre—all were stopped at the same value; and whether they had been held one year, or twenty years, at that price, was immaterial in the inquiry into their present value. The sales of the whole had been stopped, at the same point, and should recommence at the same point, and go on together. The oldest districts would have land worth one dollar, and seventy-five cents, and fifty cents per acre, as well as the newest.

The third objection which Mr. B. took to this proposed amendment, was on account of its palpable partiality and injustice, and the enormous injury it was calculated to do to the States of Missouri, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi. The land offices had been but lately opened in these States, and but little of their land would come into market, at the lower prices, for fifteen or twenty years to come. The first sales in Missouri were in 1818, and but little sold then; the principal sales in Alabama and Mississippi were made since the Creek war; and in Louisiana no land was sold by the United States before the year 1821. By consequence, no land in these States would be in market, under the operation of the amendment, for less than one dollar or seventy-five cents per acre; while, in the States of Ohio and Indiana, where the offices have been in operation since the years 1800 and 1804, and in Illinois, where they have been partially in operation since 1814, a great proportion of their lands would be in market at once, at twenty-five cents and fifty cents per acre. The effect would be, that a great injury would be done to the four slave-holding States which he had mentioned, including the State of Missouri, in which Mr. B. lived; and therefore could not agree to the distinction proposed. He detested the idea of making a distinction between the States, either founded upon their geographical position, or the fact of their holding or not holding slaves. His graduation bill made no such distinction. It steered clear of all partiality and injustice. It put all the new States upon an equal footing. It made the reduction of price commence together and go on together, in each and every one of them. It gave no advantage to the slave States, although the lands had been longer in market, in point of fact, and more thoroughly picked in some of these than in any of the non-slaveholding States, in Louisiana and Missouri, for example, where the lands were picked and culled under the bountiful dispensations of the Kings of France and Spain, for half a century before a land office was opened in Ohio and Indiana.

Graduation of the Public Lands.

[APRIL 14, 1838]

Mr. B. could not drop this objection without pursuing one step further the consequences of the partiality he had been deprecating. He had spoken of its effect upon States, but we had Territories also to be affected by it. We had two Territories in the South, (Florida and Arkansas,) which were slaveholding; and one in the North (Michigan) which was not. In the two Southern Territories the land offices had been but lately opened, to wit: in Arkansas in the year 1821, and in Florida in the year 1825; and, in the Territory to the North, an office had been established in one of its districts, to wit, at Detroit, in the year 1804. All these Territories were pressing forward to the rank of States; and the attainment of that rank would depend upon the attainment of a certain amount of population, say forty thousand souls. Great political advantages were counted upon in some quarters of the Union, in running in one of these Territories ahead of the rest—an event to be accomplished by accelerating its acquisition of the aforesaid quantum of population; and it was too obvious to need enforcement, that the adoption of this amendment would have that effect in favor of the Territory of Michigan.

Mr. B. concluded with saying that he seldom asked for the yeas and nays, and never, except in cases in which he believed that his constituents would wish to see them. He believed the vote on this amendment to present one of these cases; he would, therefore, now ask for them.

Mr. BARTON spoke in support of his amendment.

Mr. COBB expressed himself favorable to the first section of the bill presented by Mr. BENTON. He wished, however, to amend that section, so as to make the terms of the different graduations two years, and the whole term of the plan ten years instead of five.

Mr. BENTON opposed the motion briefly.

The amendment of Mr. COBB was then agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved farther to amend the bill, by striking out the second section, so as to confine the system of graduation to lands which have already been offered for sale. He remarked, that this bill was to be looked upon as an experiment; and in such important experiments, the movements of Congress ought to be gradual.

The question being put, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the words 1st day of July, and insert in the 1st section, the 5th of November; which was agreed to.

The question then occurred on the motion of Mr. BARTON, to strike out the first section of the bill, in order to insert a substitute; which being put, it was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Chandler, Chase, Dickerson, Foot, Knight, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md., Wiley.—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Cobb, Eaton, Ellis, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson, of Ken., Johnston, of Lou., Kane, King, McKinley, Macon, Marks, Noble, Parria, Ridgely, Rowan, Ruggles, Tazewell, Thomas, Tyler, White, Williams, Woodbury.—28.

Mr. BARTON withdrew some other amendments offered by him.

Mr. COBB moved to amend, at the end of the 9th line of the 3d section; to make the persons to whom the land shall be ceded, pay down five cents per acre.

Mr. C. observed, that it was probably known, that he thought the United States could not give away the public lands. He was, however, willing to put the compensation so low, as to make it merely nominal.

Mr. BENTON said, he did not object, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. KING moved to strike out that part of the third section which restricts those persons to whom donations are made, to lands which have been in market a year, at the price of 50 cents. He said this restriction would be oppressive on the poorer class of people, as he thought they ought to be allowed to take a patent on any of the public lands.

Mr. TAZEWELL opposed the motion as offering a new feature in the bill. Donations of land were not intended to be made until it would not bring 50 cents. The motion would destroy the harmony of the bill, and introduce a principle not contemplated by its mover. Mr. T. moved to amend, by striking out one and inserting two, so as to restrict donations of lands to such as have been in market two years, at 50 cents. Agreed to.

Mr. BENTON observed, that any change would destroy the harmony of the bill. He opposed the motion of Mr. KING.

Mr. KING sustained his motion. He did not know how it would operate in the Western States. But he would place no value on the bill, as regarded persons, in his State, who could not purchase at 50 cents an acre, if the amendment were not adopted.

The question being then taken, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAZEWELL suggested, that some provision ought to be made, that, when the refuse of lands should be ceded to the States, those persons authorized to take lands by the payment of 5 cents per acre should not enjoy the pre-emption rights.

Mr. BENTON moved an amendment in compliance with the suggestion; which was agreed to.

Mr. BRANCH offered a proviso, which provided that no State should enjoy the benefit of this bill, the Legislature of which State did not, within two years after its passage, relinquish all right to the two per cent. fund on the sale of the public lands; and, furthermore, agree to make no claim on Congress for appropriations in aid of Internal Improvement.

Graduation of the Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the question was divided so as to take the question first on that part of the proviso, before the word "furthermore."

Mr. KING conceived that the Legislatures could not release the United States. The two per cents. was granted by a compact entered into by the People in Convention, and the Legislatures of the States could not give up the compact. Nothing of importance would be obtained by the States in the refuse of land, while the power of the United States to tax the lands, which was felt in a most burthensome manner, was still retained.

Mr. BRANCH supported his proviso by a few remarks.

Mr. MCKINLEY contended that, in the State of Alabama, lands, after having been reduced to 25 cents an acre, and remained so one year, would be worth nothing. He would agree to the motion if it went further, and allowed the States to collect tolls on improvements made by them.

The first portion of the proviso was then rejected. The question then occurred on the second portion of the proviso; that the new States should make no claim on the United States, for Internal Improvement, after the cession of the refuse of the lands to the States.

Mr. BRANCH made some remarks in support of this proposition.

Mr. MCKINLEY replied to Mr. BRANCH.

Mr. TAZEWELL said, he liked the idea of the proposition, but not the manner in which it was offered. It would meet his views if it could be provided that the lands ceded should be applied for Internal Improvement, or any other public purpose; he did not care whether for education or Internal Improvement. He thought that, if it was not pointed out how these lands should be applied, it would create confusion in the Legislatures of the States.

Mr. BENTON remarked, that, if this motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, as modified by the gentleman from Virginia, were adopted, it would be for the States to consider whether they would take the refuse on these terms. He had intended to move to print the bill when amended; and, as most of the amendments had now been gone through with, he hoped it might now be ordered to be printed. It was a very important bill, and ought to be well considered.

Mr. ROWAN spoke in opposition to the motion.

Mr. NOBLE spoke at some length in opposition to the proviso offered by Mr. BRANCH. It would be in violation of the compact between the States and the United States. He did not care how the law was passed; the States could not violate the compact. If the proviso was added, the graduation of the price of public lands would be useless. Bills were now habitually filled with extraneous matter, until they were lost; and offensive amendments were crammed down the throats of the People of the West. If the bill was laid upon the table, it would not be by his vote. If they were to reject this bill, he hoped it would be done fairly, and by no indirect means. If any thing was to be done for the West, he hoped it would be done freely. Hitherto, God knows, they have had difficulty enough to get the Government to fulfil its obligations.

Mr. COBB said, that he had no further amendments to offer; neither did he wish to cram this proviso down the throats of the Western People.

Mr. BRANCH moved to lay the bill upon the table, and print it, with the amendments; which was agreed to.

TUESDAY, APRIL 15, 1828.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to graduate the prices of the public lands was again taken up.

VOL. IV—42

Mr. COBB moved to amend the fourth section, by adding a proviso, in substance that the cession of the refuse of the lands should not be made to the States until they had paid into the Treasury of the United States, the amount expended by the United States, in surveying the lands, &c. but withdrew his amendment temporarily.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to strike out the fourth section of the bill (providing for the cession of the refuse of the lands.)

Mr. BRANCH moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to annex certain conditions to the grant of the refuse of the lands to the States.

Mr. TAZEWELL suggested that it would be better to delay the motion to recommit until the question should be taken on the motion of Mr. CHANDLER.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., made the same suggestion, when Mr. BRANCH withdrew his motion.

Mr. TAZEWELL moved to strike out part of the 4th section, and substitute a provision that all lands which shall have been offered for sale at 25 cents per acre, for two years, shall be ceded to the States, to be appropriated to the purposes of education and Internal Improvement within the States. [Mr. TAZEWELL explained his views in offering the amendment. He thought a cession of a large quantity of lands, which might be of great value to the States, would be creative of evil effects; but, if the objects to which they should be applied were pointed out, the grant would probably be beneficial.]

Mr. SMITH, of Md., thought it ought to be applied to Internal Improvement alone. Education had already been provided for in those States by acts of Congress. He moved to strike out the words "education and."

Mr. RUGLES opposed the amendment. He thought that the lands ought to be applied as the States should think proper. There had been no application on the part of any of the States for diverting these lands from the objects to which they were originally directed.

Mr. CHANDLER also opposed Mr. TAZEWELL's amendment. If a sale of land was to be made to the States, he thought we ought not to impose conditions.

Mr. BENTON also spoke upon the amendment, and observed that the States had no desire to divert the lands from the objects pointed out by it.

Mr. HENDRICKS made a few remarks, and desired that the amendment might be modified so as to embrace donations to actual settlers.

Mr. ELLIS made some remarks, in reply to Mr. SMITH, of Md. It was known, he said, that the sixteenth sections were, in the greater number of instances, unproductive. He wished that the amendment might be so modified, that the lands should be disposed of under the direction of the Legislatures of the States. He was opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MCKINLEY said, that the amendment seemed to be grounded on the supposition, that the cession of these lands would cause electioneering and disturbance. If this was likely to take place at all, it would be increased by the number of objects to which it was applied. There would be a party in favor of each of the several objects, and the strife would be, which could obtain the largest share of the lands. He considered that Internal Improvement was the most important object, and he hoped that the condition of the cession would be confined to that object.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., said, his views were entirely met by the argument of the gentleman first up from Alabama, [Mr. MCKINLEY.] He argues that the different objects would cause continued electioneering and dissension. As to the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi, if the sixteenth sections are as poor as he represents them, let us give them better sections.

SENATE.]

Graduation of the Public Lands.—Indian Emigration.

[APRIL 16, 1828.]

Mr. ELLIS said, that the difficulty apprehended by the gentlemen from Maryland and Alabama might be prevented, by pointing out in the bill, that a certain proportion of the lands be applied to each object. His statement as to the worthlessness of the sixteenth sections was corroborated by a bill which had been introduced on a former day by the gentleman from Alabama, and which had been rejected.

Mr. COBB said, he could not vote for a cession of land to the States, without some nominal consideration. He had always been of opinion that these donations of land were unconstitutional.

Mr. TYLER expressed the same objection. He observed, that, in the expectation that the gentleman from Georgia would hereafter offer an amendment, which should require, at least, a show of consideration for the ceded lands, he had no scruple to vote for the amendment offered by his colleague.

Mr. NOBLE considered the cession of lands a different substantive question from the graduation of the prices of public lands. He spoke at considerable length, and asked whether these lands were to be ceded to the States, and confined to education and Internal Improvement, and the cession act of Virginia made null and void? He complained that the bill had been clogged and obstructed on every occasion on which it had been brought forward. This bill, and the objects which had been drawn into it, were distinct matters, having no analogy.

The amendment offered by Mr. SMITH, of Md., to the amendment, was then rejected.

On motion of Mr. TAZEWEILL, to strike out and insert, the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. BRANCH, and having been ordered, Mr. CHANDLER moved a division of the question, and the vote on striking out being first taken, was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MACON wished to make a motion in relation to the bill. It was one of great importance. He was in favor of the first section, as he thought the graduation experiment ought to be tried, and would, if it was in order, move to strike out all but that section.

The CHAIR stated that the motion would not now be in order.

Mr. COBB asked an explanation of Mr. TAZEWEILL, as to the object of his amendment.

Mr. TAZEWEILL explained in very near the words of his former remarks. The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. TAZEWEILL, which was decided in the negative.

Mr. COBB then renewed his motion to amend, (to make the cession only after the expense of surveying had been paid into the Treasury.)

The motion was opposed by Mr. BARTON, who moved to strike out the restriction to no smaller portion than one quarter section; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was in favor of the bill; but thought it better to drop the cession clause altogether. It was not necessary to act upon that part for several years. He wished the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw the motion.

Mr. COBB assented, if the gentleman from Missouri should desire it.

The CHAIR said it could not be withdrawn, as it had been amended, without unanimous consent.

Mr. BENTON said, that, as the cession clause seemed to produce much difficulty, he would acquiesce in the withdrawal of that portion of the bill, as it could be acted upon at a future period.

Mr. NOBLE spoke at considerable length in favor of the cession of the lands.

Mr. COBB withdrew his motion to amend, by unanimous consent; and the question being taken on the motion of Mr. CHANDLER, to strike out the 4th section, it was agreed to.

Mr. MACON moved to amend the 9th line of the 2d section, so as to allow no heads of family to enjoy pre-emption rights, until the lands had been offered two years at 25 cents (instead of fifty cents.)

Mr. BENTON said, that the reason for fixing this pre-emption, at the beginning, of the graduation of 25 cents, was because it would tempt those who were able to purchase, to pay for it at 50 cents.

Mr. WEBSTER made a few remarks on the donation of lands to actual settlers, which he thought a very important feature of the bill. He did not feel at liberty to act fully upon it at present. But on some points he was free to speak. He did not think it expedient to drive actual settlers to the refuse of the lands. If they were young men, and valuable citizens, what was given to them ought to be good. He also did not think that an equivalent would be gained by 5 cents an acre; allowing settlers to live on the lands and destroy the timber during four or five years, and to go away at the end of that time. He thought this would be cheap living for four or five years. His idea was that the price should be fixed at 30 or 40 per cent. to actual settlers, and should be worth the money in comparison to the sales of lands, or he should think the better plan would be to restrain donations until the land fell to the price of 25 cents.

Mr. TAZEWEILL said he was pleased with the plan of the gentleman from Missouri, but he thought it ought to extend farther. He would wish to have the arrangement something like this: While the lands are at the highest minimum, one dollar, allow actual settlers to have the pre-emption right at 75 cents; when they were at 75 cents, allow actual settlers to enter them at 50 cents; and so on down to the lowest. This, he thought, would be productive of a good effect, as it would be a continued encouragement to actual settlers, and give them an advantage over other purchasers. With this opinion, he should vote against the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina; and he threw out the suggestion to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BENTON said that he was highly pleased with the idea of the gentleman from Virginia, and should wish time to act upon it.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the bill was then ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 16, 1828.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to graduate the price of public lands was taken up; and the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. MACON having been withdrawn—

Mr. TAZEWEILL offered an amendment, making provision that, while the lands should be offered at one dollar, actual settlers should be allowed the right of pre-emption at seventy-five cents; that, when at seventy-five cents, actual settlers should be allowed that right at fifty cents; and, when at fifty cents, pre-emption right should be enjoyed by actual settlers at twenty-five cents.

On motion of Mr. TAZEWEILL, the bill was then laid upon the table.

INDIAN EMIGRATION.

The bill making appropriation for defraying the expense of a delegation of Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians to examine and survey lands West of the Mississippi was read a second time.

Mr. BENTON went into the merits of this subject at length, showing that safe policy as well as humanity dictated the measure. Mississippi and Alabama, particularly, but some others also had on their borders a numerous Indian population, always ready for depredations, and in the event of foreign war, might be induced to act against those States. It was a great object, he thought, to have these Indians removed: It was no less desirable for the Indians themselves than for States within which they resided.

Mr. COBB thought the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BAXTON] with the force of which he was particularly struck, applied as well to the Creeks and Cherokees, as to the Chickasaws and Choctaws; but he did not find that they were contemplated in the bill; he would, therefore, move to amend the same by inserting the words "Creeks and Cherokees," after the word Chickasaws, so as to make it read "a delegation of Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Cherokees."

Mr. ELLIS opposed the motion on the ground that the Creeks and Cherokees were desirous of remaining where they were, and had not asked to be removed. He hoped the amendment would be withdrawn, or at least not pressed upon the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, I feel a deep interest in every measure which involves directly or indirectly the happiness and prosperity of our red brothers of the forest. It is my deliberate opinion that we are under the most solemn obligations to the tribes within our jurisdiction, and we should seek every opportunity faithfully to discharge them—we should seek every opportunity to advance their condition, and place them as near as we possibly could upon an equality with the People of the United States; when enlightened they are worthy of those high privileges. The bill under discussion proposes to appropriate and set apart a certain sum of money, to enable the President to appoint agents to conduct a small number of the chiefs, or other influential men of these nations, to a new country west of the Mississippi, to examine it for themselves, and to bring back to the various tribes a correct account of all the advantages and disadvantages of the situation. The appropriation in the bill is confined to the two Southern tribes, the Chickasaws and Choctaws alone. Why should the provision be limited? It was said that we had received information from those two tribes that they were willing to examine this country to which the Government has invited them.

I hope, sir, that the provision will be made general—let the same offer be made to all within our limits—the expense would be very little increased. It would consist only in the rations which would be necessary for a few more individuals. It is well known that the Rev'd Mr. McCoy has been attending Congress during a part of this session for the express object of extending this same privilege to the Pattawattamies and other tribes to the North. Let the provision be general and ample, that all who accompany this exploring expedition shall have every comfort, and treated in the best manner. I am very happy that the measure has been introduced into the Senate, as it has this great advantage in it—this noble but unfortunate race of people will have the opportunity of exploring this new country at our expense, and without being under any compulsion to remove or not to remove; that point they reserve for themselves to settle when they have returned to the bosom of their tribes. This course of conduct is magnanimous and honorable. It should be distinctly understood that we do not mean or intend to use coercive measures to force them to any thing. Such a policy would be a violation of our duty to God and to man; but it is equally our duty to give them our opinion, as friends and brothers, and hold out every rational inducement for them to do what is most likely to make them a happy and a prosperous people; and when we have done this, and we have given them every opportunity of judging, let them decide upon their own destiny, as becomes high-minded men. We are powerful, they are weak; this is an additional reason why we should treat them as brothers, and extend to them every comfort and every advantage in our power. The Northern tribes are yet involved in mental darkness; the Southern tribes are in a better condition; they are considerably advanced in learning, in the arts and sciences, and in civilization. The present system of education for their children, will soon qualify them for a happy self-government, under the fostering protection of the United States. Such a people would be able to judge what was best for them to do. Among the Choctaws, that nation which has always been friendly to us, I am acquainted with some distinguished men who would do honor to any country. As to the plan of emigration, my opinion is, that many will embrace it, many will not—all will not stay, all will not go. It is natural for some to wish to inhabit the country of their ancestors, and bury their bones with their kindred—and in others there will be a strong disposition to change positions, with a hope of a better condition. These dispositions are the same in the bosom of the white man as the red man. We shall discharge our duty by making this provision, by which the opportunity is given to all. If tribes, or parts of tribes, should accept your invitation, after the country has been examined, let it be understood that we will guarantee their peace and security, their freedom and independence. As to those who may remain within the limits of the States, and who are unwilling to emigrate, let us act with tenderness towards them; let moderation distinguish every measure relative to their situation, and let our promises to them be faithfully executed. Time alone could ultimately decide or solve the problem of their destiny, and finally it would be self-evident what would be best for them and best for us. I am not unwilling to leave it to Providence; this course of conduct on our part will gain their confidence and their affections. He felt persuaded that a measure so humane and so liberal could not meet with any serious opposition, and he would not, therefore, trespass longer on the patience of the Senate by offering any further remarks.

Mr. COBB said he would by no means consent to withdraw the amendment he had offered. The General Government was bound by solemn compact to remove the Indians from the State of Georgia. Frequent opportunities had occurred of so doing. He could show from different occasions, where the Government might have improved these opportunities for effecting an object so desirable to Georgia, but from policy, or interest, or some such motive, she had neglected to do that which justice to the State required should be done. Georgia had paid to the General Government an immense consideration for it, which had made her poor; and, if the Government had neglected or refused to comply with its compact, it would show that she did not feel herself too closely pinched by the obligations which she entered into. Instead of withdrawing his amendment, he would prefer to change the whole phraseology of the bill, so as to place sufficient money in the hands of the President, to enable him to hold treaties, send out exploring parties, and adopt all other means in his power, consistent with right, to induce all the Indians to remove. He did not feel disposed to give his vote to remove any tribe or tribes of Indians, until the removal of those in Georgia were first provided for. Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, had nearly all their Indians removed; and, he believed, in the whole State of Ohio, there were not more than five hundred of that species of population; and yet these States had come into the Union long since the compact with Georgia had been entered into. What impression such proceedings made upon the minds of Senators, he would not pretend to say; but he could assure gentlemen they made a very deep impression on the minds of the people of Georgia.

Mr. BRANCH inquired if there were not agents already employed in conducting an exploring party for the Creeks?

Mr. KING said, he did not think it necessary at this time to enter into any examination of the rights of Georgia, as connected with the subject before them; but he agreed perfectly, with the gentleman from that State [Mr. COBB] that more might have been done towards effecting the object, than had been. However, he would not now discuss that motion. The object of the bill before them was merely to make a small appropriation for the purpose of enabling the chiefs of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, to explore a certain portion of country to which they might remove, if they were pleased with it. In reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BAILEY] he could state that an exploring party, under Col. Brearly, had gone out, and some of the Creeks had also gone; but they were such only as had been of the McIntosh party. The party opposed to McIntosh, that now wished to explore, would prefer examining for themselves, and he presumed had no disposition to settle in a place chosen by their enemies. So far as regarded the Cherokees, he doubted whether they were willing to go, and he disclaimed any wish to coerce any of them; but he felt sorry they had not before removed, as they would now have been in a comfortable situation, where the means of supplying their wants would have been abundant, while at present their situation was far from enviable, being obliged to subsist, in a great measure, upon roots. It had been urged as a reason why they should not remove, that in the woods they would lose their civilization, and become wild. He had seen sufficient to convince him, that the wild Indian of the woods had more nobleness of character than the half-civilized Indian, who, for the most part, contract the vices of the lower classes of whites, and became drunken and theivish, and were as unfit for the duties appertaining to civilized life, as they were for that courage and enterprize which distinguished the true Indian.

The amendment of Mr. COBB was adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, then moved further to amend the bill, by inserting after the word Cherokees, "and such other Indian tribes as may be disposed to remove west of the Mississippi." Which being agreed to—

Mr. KING moved to insert after the words United States, "and without the limits of the States or Territories;" which was agreed to. Several other amendments were proposed.

Mr. NOBLE addressed the Senate on this subject, and reflected pretty severely upon the agency system which had been pursued. He instanced the removal of the agency at Fort Wayne, which had been carried to a spot of land belonging to the agent, and spoke of abuses which he wished obviated. Sixteen members of the Legislature had signed a paper asking its removal, it was true, but that was but a small portion. He had in his possession letters on the subject; and he meant, in a few days, to offer a resolution, calling on the Department for the correspondence connected with this subject. He could not suffer matters of that kind to pass sub silentio. While he had a seat in the Senate, he should discharge his duty, and look to the rights of the whole people of his State, without sailing in the wake of any party, and neither for friend or foe would he shrink from fulfilling what he conceived due to right.

Mr. BENTON moved to fill the blank with the sum of $15,000; which being acceded to, the bill was reported as amended, and ordered to be engrossed.

THURSDAY, APRIL 17, 1828.

ARRANGEMENT OF SEATS.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved to take up a resolution offered by him a few days since, in relation to changing the seats of the Senate Chamber.

Mr. VAN BUREN suggested that the resolution had better be postponed to a later period of the session, as the alteration could not probably be made this year.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, did not accede to the suggestion, and the resolution was considered. On the question of agreeing to the resolution, Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, went into a detailed statement of the inconveniences of the present situation of the seats, and the impossibility of hearing the remarks of Senators. If it was not necessary to hear and be heard, the present plan might be retained; but if it was desirable to act understandingly on the business of the Senate, the former plan ought to be restored. In the few remarks made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSON] this morning, he, Mr. S., could hear but now and then a word.

Mr. BRANCH opposed the change.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that there might be inconvenience in the present arrangement, but the plan had not been adopted without good cause. He stated the inconveniences of the former arrangement, and suggested that the better course would be to appoint a committee to consider and report what change ought to be made in the seats.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed the change, remarking that his position under the present arrangement was far better than that which he had formerly occupied. If he voted for the proposition, he should give up his own convenience to oblige others. He thought it would be admitted that it was better for the President not to sit opposite the centre door, at which strangers were continually entering; and that he must have been inconvenienced by the talking of Senators in the lobby, behind his former seat, which could not but have interrupted business. He was willing to vote for referring this motion to a committee of three, who could report whether an alteration was expedient.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that the gentleman from New York seemed to think that there had not been sufficient experience of the present plan. He, Mr. S., recollected that, when the plan was changed, it was said that it could be tried, and, if it was not approved, it could be turned back. In the present position, neither the Chair or the Secretary could be heard by more than half the members. Senators had also now got a habit of turning round from the Chair to address those behind them, and if they did not do it, they could not be heard by those so situated. As to the passage which it had been said had caused so much inconvenience to the President, it could not be so annoying as to have the door slapping every moment close behind his chair. That passage had, since the change, become a thoroughfare, and seemed to be looked upon as a great national road, where persons were continually passing; and he thought there would not be a hundredth part of the confusion there, if the President's seat were restored, that there was at present.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that when he addressed the Chair, he could not be heard by those behind him. He had, however, found out the other day that there was a secret in this matter. He observed that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] turned round and addressed those in the rear; and he had imitated the example, but found it very awkward, and that he was obliged to turn to address the Chair occasionally. The arrangement was inconvenient, and it would be very desirable to change it.

Mr. BENTON said a few words, but in an uncommonly low tone. He was understood to say that he was in favor of the present arrangement, because the Chair was better accommodated by it.

The PRESIDENT said, that, as allusion had been made to the Chair, he desired that this question might be decided without regard to his convenience. It was true, that, as the seats were formerly arranged, the Chair had great difficulty in hearing the Senators whose seats were at the two extremities of the chamber; and that the talking in the passage, behind the Chair, caused some disturbance and interruption of the business.

Mr. CHANDLER supported the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, objected to the restoration of the former plan, although he admitted that there were inconveniences in the present arrangement. He hoped a committee would be appointed to consult upon, and report what change was requisite.

Mr. BENTON moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SMITH desired the question now to be put on agreeing to the resolution. A division being made, it was decided in the negative—ayes 20, noes 21.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to graduate the prices of public lands was taken up; the question being upon the amendment, offered yesterday, by Mr. TAZEWEILL.

Mr. MACON moved to amend the amendment by adding "when thirty days shall have elapsed," after the land shall have fallen to the graduation at which it may be at the time of entering the lands for actual settlement.

Mr. BRANCH spoke against the amendment; which was then agreed to.

Mr. MACON offered a proviso, that the patent should not be issued except to the actual settler or his heirs.

Mr. TAZEWEILL thought this principle was to be found in his amendment, and that there was no need of the proviso. He had no objection to it, however, if it was thought necessary by any gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, expressed himself in favor of the proviso; which was then adopted.

The question being put on striking out the 3d section, and inserting the amendment of Mr. TAZEWEILL, as amended; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, on motion of Mr. BRANCH, Mr. BARTON made a few remarks, when, on motion of Mr. MACON, the question was divided, so as to take the vote first on striking out.

Mr. HENDRICKS opposed the striking out, but observed, that, if the motion prevailed, he should vote for inserting. His reason was, that, although he was desirous of adopting the amendment, yet, if the present section were struck out, and the substitute not adopted, the entire provision would be lost. He had rather retain the section, if the amendment should not be agreed to.

Mr. KING hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would withdraw the motion, for the same reason given by Mr. HENDRICKS. He was in favor of the amendment, but had rather retain the present section, than run any risk of losing both.

Mr. MACON would withdraw it, if he were not in the same situation as the two gentlemen. He was in favor of the first section, but not of the other parts of the bill. His motion contemplated the striking out of the section altogether.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that the difficulty would be remedied by the gentleman from Virginia retaining part of the original section, and moving to amend the section.

Mr. TAZEWEILL said, that he was surprised at the objections offered by the gentlemen from Indiana and Alabama. If the Senate were disposed to reject the section altogether, it could be done, on a vote upon a motion to strike out, at any time. He did not perceive that there could be any such objection as that urged by those gentlemen.

Some further remarks were made on this subject, by Messrs. COBB, CHANDLER, and JOHNSTON, of Louisiana.

Mr. TAZEWEILL then modified his motion so as to retain part of the original section.

And the question being then put on striking out, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then occurred on inserting the amendment proposed by Mr. TAZEWEILL; which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the bill by adding a section, the purport of which was that no land should be brought into market in any State operated on by this bill, until further directed by Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER supported his amendment, on the supposition that too much land might be brought into market at a time.

Mr. BENTON said, he would barely remark that it was now in the discretion of the President of the United States to bring the land into market as he saw fit. He moved that the question be taken by yeas and nays; which was sustained.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, in case this amendment was adopted, it would operate so that no land would be brought into market in Indiana until all that in Ohio was disposed of, and so on. This would have an unjust operation.

The motion was further discussed by Messrs. CHANDLER, NOBLE, PARRIS, and BERRIEN; when the question being put on the amendment, it was negatived.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, on being called, said he had not heard the motion, and asked to be excused from voting; which was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON moved to amend by striking out two, and inserting five, so as to make the periods of graduation five years instead of two.

Mr. COBB suggested that the motion was out of order, the same point having been amended in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIR decided that it was out of order; the amendment might be offered in the Senate.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; and the amendments having been read, on the motion to change the periods of graduation from one to two years—

Mr. WEBSTER said, that there was one part of this subject which was of great magnitude, and ought to be carefully examined. He alluded to the terms of graduation. The bill proposed that all lands that shall have been in market two years, should be brought into market at one dollar the acre. There were somewhere about eighty millions of acres of land that had been in the market for many years. And this bill made no distinction between lands that have been in market twenty years, and those that have been offered for sale only two years. He thought the supply of land would be altogether too large. It was generally thought that, even now, the market was overstocked, and that for the last forty years there had been double the quantity on sale that was required. This, he thought, was proof enough that this bill proposed to go too largely into the matter. He thought there ought to be some limitation; and it occurred to him that, to fix it to all the lands that had been offered for sale for ten years, would be a more satisfactory provision. An amendment of that kind would exclude a great quantity of land from the operation of the bill, would still include sufficient, and suffer all the old land officers to wind up their accounts. He thought two years too short a period for the next reduction; but such a limitation would lessen his objections to it—and it would be far better than to have such a mass of land thrown at once into the market. It could not be doubted that land would come down to twenty-five cents much sooner than the population would require it. This, to Mr. W., was obvious, that the graduation of the prices would bring it down to twenty-five cents vastly sooner than the people would want it. He was in favor of the graduation system; but he thought the effect of it would be, if it went into operation as detailed in this bill, to throw the lands into the hands of people who will hold it, as the United States do now, for want of purchasers. He was in favor of making the system apply on lands that had been ten years in the market; but as it was not in order now to move an amendment to that effect, he would defer it until it should be proper.

Mr. BENTON replied to the Senator from Massachusetts on his right, [Mr. WEBSTER.] He said he would shew to the Senate, by a statement of dates, that the term of ten years, mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts, would give the benefits of the graduation bill to the new States and Territory north of Ohio, as soon as it passed, but would exclude all the other new States and Territories from its benefits. He would begin with Missouri. Her first land office was opened in 1818, and very little land was then sold: by consequence, a provision requiring the lands to have been ten years in market before this bill should operate upon them, would exclude all the lands in that State. Alabama would be in the same predicament. The body of that State was conquered from the Indians during the late war; the land offices opened there about the same time as in Missouri; and, consequently, she would be cut out of the benefits of the bill. The fate of Louisiana would be still worse; her first land office was opened in 1821. She would not have one acre to sell under the provision suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. The State of Mississippi would have but little to sell, as her principal land offices were opened about the year 1818. This statement of dates, said Mr. B., will shew that the four slaveholding States which I have mentioned, would be excluded entirely from the benefits of the bill. Now for its application to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois: The land offices in those three States were first opened in 1800 and 1804; by consequence, they would get the full benefit of the bill, even with the gentleman's ten years provision. With respect to the Territories, it would be still more to the prejudice of the Southern ones. Both Florida and Arkansas have had their land offices opened within the ten years, and would be shut out from the benefits of the bill; Michigan, on the contrary, has had offices opened since 1804, and would derive the full advantage of it. The effect of this upon the future destiny of these Territories was too palpable for comment. Mr. B. sat down with saying, that, so far as his vote or voice could go, he would sink this bill, or any bill, which either in words or in effect, should be unequal as to the slaveholding States and Territories of this Union.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that his motion would illustrate his desire to limit the large amount of land which would be brought at once into the market. He intended to make no distinction between the States. He repelled the idea. He was willing that all the States and Territories should participate in the effects of the bill, when their lands should have been in market ten years; as, whenever lands had been in market so long as to show that they were held too high, the graduation system ought to be applied to them. He saw great objections to bringing eighty millions of acres into the market at once. When it was in order, he should offer an amendment, in conformity to the suggestion he had made.

Mr. BENTON said, that he was conscious the gentleman from Massachusetts was out of order in making his speech.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was not out of order; the question was on altering the term of graduation from one year to two, and to that question he had spoken.

Mr. BARTON moved to amend the amendment so as to make the first term of graduation five years instead of two.

Mr. COBB opposed the motion, which was further discussed by Messrs. BARTON, M'KINLEY, and BRANCH, when, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill was laid upon the table.

The following message was then communicated from the President of the United States, by Mr. Daniel Brent,

Chief Clerk in the Department of State, acting as his private Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States;

WASHINGTON, 17th April, 1828.

In conformity with the practice of all my predecessors, I have, during my service in the office of President, transmitted to the two Houses of Congress, from time to time, by the same private Secretary, such messages as a proper discharge of my constitutional duty appeared to me to require. On Saturday last he was charged with the delivery of a message to each House. Having presented that which was intended for the House of Representatives, whilst he was passing within the Capitol, from their Hall to the Chamber of the Senate, for the purpose of delivering the other message, he was waylaid and assaulted in the Rotundo, by a person, in the presence of a member of the House, who interposed, and separated the parties. I have thought it my duty to communicate this occurrence to Congress, to whose wisdom it belongs, to consider whether it is of a nature requiring from them any animadversion; and, also, whether any further laws or regulations are necessary, to ensure security in the official intercourse between the President and Congress, and to prevent disorders within the Capitol itself. In the deliberations of Congress upon this subject, it is neither expected or desired by me, that any consequence should be attached to the private relation in which my Secretary stands to me.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

FRIDAY, APRIL 18, 1828.

Mr. RUGGLES offered a resolution to authorize the printing of a Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the culture of silk.

POLICE OF THE CAPITOL.

The following resolution, offered yesterday, by Mr. FOOT, in relation to the Police of the Capitol, was taken up:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire and report whether any further regulations are necessary for the police of the Capitol, to secure free and undisturbed communications between the two Houses of Congress, and the Executive and Legislative Departments; and whether there has been any breach of privilege of the Senate during the present session; and said Committee is hereby vested with power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. EATON said, he would be glad if the mover of this resolution would afford some satisfactory information why the resolution should be adopted, and especially, why it should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. As Chairman of that Committee, he was not disposed to take upon himself any unreasonable trouble, nor would he, on the contrary, shrink from the performance of any necessary and proper duty. If, as it purports, the resolution be intended to regulate the internal police of the Capitol, the Committee on the Judiciary he conceived to be the most appropriate one to which it should be referred; but he believed no reference of the subject was at all necessary. There were, he said, laws already in force in the District, ample and sufficient to protect the personal rights of every individual, if, indeed, the resolution have reference to any quarrels, or fight, if you please, which may have taken place. Mr. F. had another, and stronger reason, why he conceived it unnecessary for the Senate to adopt the resolution, which was, a decision of the Senate, unequivocally expressed, that they had no jurisdiction over matter of this character and description, happening within the Capitol. He alluded to a complaint, made some weeks ago to the Senate, by an individual, of an assault made upon him in one of the committee rooms of this building ; and the counter memorial presented by the gentleman complained of. On that occasion, the Senate, by refusing to consider the subject, had expressed a decided opinion that they had nothing to do with it—no control of the matter. As regarded the message of the President of the United States, presented last evening, he viewed it in a different light than in which it was presented by the resolution. He, for one, should always be disposed to pay every attention to a communication coming from the President, and to give it a proper direction when brought up to be considered. The message, said Mr. E. presents one aspect, the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut another and different one. The message of the President brings the subject for consideration from a proper source—the resolution presents it in a point of view in which the Senate, heretofore, in another case, refused to take jurisdiction. In conclusion, Mr. E. said, he hoped the resolution might not be adopted—at all events, the Committee on the District of Columbia was not the proper one to act on the subject. If any reference were deemed proper to be made, it should be to the Judiciary Committee, to whom rightfully belonged all judicial inquiry.

Mr. FOOT said, that it was in the knowledge of every member, that, since his resolution was offered yesterday, a communication had been made to the Senate, by the President of the United States, which might be considered as superseding the resolution. He could not agree with the gentleman from Tennessee as to the impropriety of referring this subject to the Committee on the District of Columbia. But, in consequence of the Message of the President, he was not desirous of pressing his proposition, and would move to lay it on the table.

Mr. TAZEVELL requested Mr. Foot to withdraw his motion, as he wished to speak upon the subject.

Mr. FOOT said he did not wish any discussion upon the subject, as the communication of the President had changed the aspect of the matter.

The resolution was then ordered to lie on the table.

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. HARRISON rose, and said, that he would again move to take up the bill repealing, in part, the duty on imported Salt, with the distinct understanding, that, if the motion were not agreed to, he should not move its consideration during this session. He did this, that the importers and manufacturers of salt might be informed as to the subject.

Mr. BRANCH spoke at length, and with zeal, in favor of the motion ; he conceived the bill one of deep importance to a very large portion of the people of his State, and as having a direct bearing on the agricultural interest of the country.

Mr. TYLER said, that he had voted for taking up the bill whenever, heretofore, a motion had been made to that effect ; and whenever he believed that any proposition to reduce the duty was likely to grow into a law, he should be in favor of it, provided it contemplated a reasonable reduction. He was, however, now thoroughly convinced that the bill before the Senate would not grow into a law, and that, from the agitation of the subject here, without any definitive action upon it, the country suffered by reason of the augmentation of price. The importation had become restricted and limited, and the price of the article had, of consequence, advanced in the market to a greater price than usual, and that, too, at a period of the year when the demand was greater than at any other—the fish-curing season. He should, therefore, vote against taking up the bill, so that the country may be put at rest, and the trade in the article resume its ordinary channels. He came to the conclusion, that, even if the bill passed the Senate, it would, nevertheless, not grow into a law, from the fact, known to him, in common with the country at large, that the other House had, without a division, rejected a resolution of inquiry into the expediency of repealing the duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT suggested that Mr. T. was not strictly in order, in alluding to proceedings in the other House.

Mr. TYLER expressed regret, if he had infringed, in the slightest degree, the rules of the Senate. He must, nevertheless, repeat his settled conviction, that no bill could be passed during the session.

Mr. BRANCH thought the gentleman from Virginia in error with respect to raising the price : for if the price fluctuated at all, it would have a tendency to lessen, rather than increase it. He thought it all-important that the bill should be acted on at once ; because the session was drawing to a close was no reason, in his opinion, why it should not be discussed. We shall soon have, said Mr. B. a bill before us for an increase of duty on imported articles, and could it be said, with any propriety, that we have not time to act on it ? He was aware that many gentlemen were opposed to the reduction of salt ; but he hoped the Senate would not give the subject the go-by ; but let the People know at once what Congress intended to do on the subject. Mr. B. spoke positively against the salt tax as an odious one.

Mr. TYLER said his faculties were very obtuse, if the consequence of the prospect of a diminution of duty on any article was not calculated to prevent importation to a considerable extent, and, of course, to augment the price. The merchant who imports at a high duty, must, upon a sudden diminution of duty, sustain a loss equivalent to the actual difference in the duty. The session was too far expended to anticipate any reduction of the duty on salt, and he should, therefore, and for the reasons already assigned, vote against taking up the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER thought the duty on salt ought to be reduced to some extent, but he was inclined to think that no bill that would pass the Senate to that effect could pass the House of Representatives this session.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. said, that, so long as this bill hung over the head of the merchant, he would be afraid to import to any extent, and that, consequently, the price, as the gentleman from Virginia had very justly observed, would be enhanced—the merchant did not know what to do. Last year, very large importations of molasses had been made, in expectation that the duty would be increased, which were now laying on the hands of the importers.

Mr. NOBLE said, that when this bill was before the Senate at the last session, he had voted against it. But then he learned from gentlemen that it acted as a grievous burthen to a portion ; he felt it his duty to investigate the subject so as to endeavor to do justice to all, and although he would give no pledge to vote for the bill, yet he would like to hear all the arguments pro and con, and he then would be enabled to make up his mind on the subject, as well with reference to the States as the General Government.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, it was well known that he was opposed to the present passage of the bill, and when an attempt had been made before to call it up, he had given his reasons why he did not think it should be acted on at this time. He then wished to take the sense of the Senate on the subject, without any discussion ; and gave, at length, the motives which influenced him. It was supposed, by some of his friends, that the bill had better be taken up, and an opportunity offered to discuss its merits, which opportunity had been offered, and it was then laid on the table. Two attempts had since been made to take it up for further consideration, which he had uniformly opposed, because he thought it would be a waste of time that might be more profitably employed.

SENATE.] Assault in the Capitol.—Graduation of the Public Lands.—Survivors of the Revolution. [APRIL 18, 1828.]

On the question of taking up the bill for consideration, Mr. COBB called for the Yeas and Nays, when there appeared, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Cobb, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, King, McKinley, Macon, Noble, Rowan, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South-Carolina, Tazewell, White, Williams, Woodbury.—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Chandler, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, Knight, McLane, Marks, Parria, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silabee, Thomas, Tyler, Van Buren, Webster, Willey.—25.

So the Senate refused to take up the bill.

ASSAULT IN THE CAPITOL.

On motion of Mr. ROWAN, the Message of the President of the United States, relative to the assault upon his Secretary, in the Rotundo of the Capitol, was taken up.

Mr. TAZEWELL rose and said, that when the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut was laid on the table, he had desired to say a few words as to the course proper to be pursued in treating this subject. He had not been so fortunate, in the discussion of that resolution, as to obtain a hearing, and he therefore availed himself of the present opportunity to express his views. It had been the practice of Congress, for a long series of years, that, whenever the same subject was before both Houses at the same time, one House delayed acting upon it until the other had brought it forward and decided upon it. Practice, it was known to every Senator, had vindicated this course in times past ; and it now recommended itself to Congress. The course was a proper one. Public convenience required it—courtesy required it. But if ever there was a subject to which this rule ought to be applied, it was this. The President of the United States has made a communication to both Houses, on the same subject, in the same form of words. The House of Representatives have taken up the subject—and being in the other House, is it fit that the Senate should proceed in its examination? There were two matters included in the message of the President : One was a violation of the privilege of this body—the other is a proposition, of some legislative enactment, to provide for the subject in futuro. Therefore, to legislate on the subject would be a mere loss of time. If the House of Representatives pass such a law, it would come before the Senate in proper time. If the House considered it inexpedient to pass such a bill, the Senate could then take it up, and do whatever they should judge necessary. This course was recommended by former practice, and was an act of courtesy. As to the other subject comprised in the message, if it should turn out as was stated by the President, no man would be disposed to go farther than he in investigating and punishing the act. But he thought it better not now to act upon it. The same subject had been referred to both Houses, as a contempt of each. It would be very difficult for both Houses to act upon the matter. If the House were to consider the act as a contempt, and fix a punishment—and the Senate, acting at the same time, were also to fix a punishment, would it be proper that two punishments should be inflicted for one offence? If the two Houses acted separately, there must be confusion and conflict in their decisions. There would be several questions to be decided. If both fix upon punishment, which House has the right to punish first, or which House has a right to punish most? One body might take a different view from that taken by the other. One body might think it proper to punish, while the other might think the reverse. All these things might occur ; and these were his reasons for having approved the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, to lay his resolution on the table ; and he should have made the same motion, had it not been made by that gentleman. And on these grounds, said Mr. T. I move that the communication from the President be laid on the table, with the understanding that, when the proper time arrives, it shall be taken up, and acted upon fully and promptly.

The VICE PRESIDENT said the message would lie on the table as a matter of course.

Mr. FOOT asked whether, as it had been taken up on motion, it would not be requisite to put the question on laying it on the table.

The CHAIR said that it was according to the strict parliamentary rule to put the question.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the yeas and nays were ordered on laying the message on the table.

The question being then put, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote :

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Hayne, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, McKinley, Macon, Parria, Ridgely, Rowan, Sanford, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Woodbury.—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Boulogny, Chase, Foot, Harrison, Hendricks, Knight, McLane, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silabee, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Thomas, Webster, Willey, Williams.—22.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to graduate the price of public lands was taken up, and the question being on the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole :

Mr. BENTON said, that, as from the great variety of amendments that had been adopted, it was difficult to understand the bill, he moved that it be postponed, and ordered to be printed, declaring that he had no design to delay the bill, but merely desired to enable members to act understandingly upon it.

At the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, the motion was withdrawn, and Mr. W. submitted two sections, which he intended at a proper time to offer as amendments to the bill. The question then being taken on printing the bill and amendments, it was agreed to.

SURVIVORS OF THE REVOLUTION.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY, the bill making appropriations for certain Surviving Officers and Soldiers of the Revolution was taken up, and the question being on an amendment offered by Mr. WOODBURY, Mr. W. explained its operation.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. said, he thought the subject had been despatched, as he had heard it said that, if a former proposition was not agreed to, the petitioners would not again present their claim. He wished the bill to be postponed until Monday, and made the motion.

Mr. BERRIEN opposed the motion. The bill now proposed to place these applicants upon the pension list in a manner acceptable to their feelings. He hoped the proposition would not be pressed.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., said, that, if the Senate was against the motion, they could reject it. He considered, and he believed others did, that the subject was formerly finally disposed of. He was against swelling out the pension list.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, explained an allusion which had been made by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, as to the original pension list. He thought the calculations made on this subject by the Chairman of the Committee, were probably correct.

Mr. WOODBURY said that he would accede to the motion to postpone until Monday, if it were not for the apprehension that some of the Senators who were now present, might then be absent. He thought, if the true sense of the Senate were to be taken on it, the question ought now to be taken.

Mr. MACON spoke against the bill, and in favor of the motion for postponement; which was then agreed to, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

ASSAULT IN THE CAPITOL.

The CHAIR stated that he had received a communication from Russell Jarvis.

Mr. BRANCH moved that it be laid upon the table; when

The CHAIR withdrew the communication for the moment; but shortly after again presented a letter from Mr. Russell Jarvis, stating that he supposed himself to be alluded to in the message of the President, presented yesterday, and giving the cause of his outrage upon the Secretary of the President, and the manner in which it was committed.

Mr. BRANCH suggested that a message ought to be sent to the other House, proposing to appoint a Joint Committee to examine the subject. He also moved to lay the paper on the table.

Mr. BERRIEN desired to have the paper read, before he acted upon it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said the Senate had decided this morning that they would do nothing upon the subject; and he objected to the reading of this letter.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said that he desired to hear the paper read.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, persisted in his objections to the reading, and the question being put, the reading was ordered. [The Secretary then read the communication.]

Mr. BRANCH made a few remarks in support of his previous suggestion.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that the leading feature of the message of the President, was the breach of privilege. There were other matters also included in the communication. Now, said Mr. V. B., we all agree as to the matter of the message; but we only disagree as to the manner in which it shall be acted on. He allowed he had been struck with the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, that the two punishments might be inflicted for one offence to both bodies. This seemed to point out that some concerted action ought to be had by both bodies upon the subject. The idea of the gentleman from North Carolina seemed proper, and to designate the proper course: because, if this act was an insult at all, it was an insult to both branches. But a remark which had been made to him by a venerable Senator, was certainly entitled to some weight. It was, that an offence to the House of Representatives was not necessarily an offence to the Senate, nor was an offence against the Senate necessarily so to the House of Representatives. The proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina ought, therefore, he conceived, not to be acted upon precipitately; and he hoped it would be deferred until Monday, that it might be acted upon with a full understanding of its effects. He should, therefore, prefer that the message and the letter just read should lay on the table.

Mr. MACON said, the question is: What law shall we refer to? The Supreme Court has established here the common law of England; but Congress has never adopted the parliamentary law of England, as was ably shewn by the gentleman from New York, in his remarks on inherent powers. The law makes the offence. He should doubt the power of both Houses to punish the same offence. As to a Joint Committee, they will not act entirely together. When they consider the matter they will decide for their own bodies. It is the case with all such Joint Committees. What will be its effects? I am entirely of opinion with the gentleman from N. York, that we had better take time to consider of it. If the bearer of message of the President wants a law passed for his protection, he ought to have it. Congress certainly ought to have power over the Capitol. It was formerly overrun by hucksters, and on the motion of a gentleman, not now a member, and not now in the world, every woman of the kind was placed under the power of the Presiding Officer. The President of the United States has sent us a message; and I, said Mr. M., have no doubt, looking narrowly at the manner in which it is worded, that he was aware of the difficulty there would be in acting upon it. It is a difficult matter, and I had rather not appoint a Joint Committee yet. Let us take a little time to consider it.

Mr. BRANCH made some further observations.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to lay the communication from Russell Jarvis on the table; which was agreed to.

MONDAY, APRIL 21, 1828.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to graduate the price of public lands was taken up, and the question being on an amendment to an amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole, offered by Mr. BARTON, to make the periods of graduation five years instead of two, was briefly opposed by Mr. BENTON, who stated that it would have the effect to destroy the bill.

Mr. BARTON defended the motion, and repeated that the period of two years was too short to be beneficial.

The question being then taken on Mr. BARTON'S motion, it was determined in the negative.

The amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole were then agreed to.

Mr. WEBSTER then rose, and proposed to amend the bill by the addition of two sections. The first, to take place of the first section in the original bill, providing that, on the first day of January next, all lands which had been in the market ten years, should be reduced to one dollar per acre. The other section related to actual settlement, and allowed actual settlers to enter lands at fifty cents per acre.

Mr. WEBSTER explained the objects of his amendment at considerable length.

Mr. BRANCH opposed the motion.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the limitation to lands that had been in market ten years, and extend the reduction of price to one dollar.

Mr. VAN BUREN expressed himself favorable to the motion of Mr. RUGGLES.

Mr. WEBSTER made some farther remarks, in which he declared himself favorable to the principles of graduation, and opposed to the motion of Mr. RUGGLES.

After a few remarks from Mr. VAN BUREN, Mr. BENTON spoke against the motion to amend, and discussed, at considerable length, the various propositions that had been made in relation to the public lands.

Further debate took place, in which Messrs. BARTON, WEBSTER, M'KINLEY, and MACON, took part; when the question, on the motion of Mr. RUGGLES, being taken, it was agreed to—yeas 22, nays 14.

The amendment of Mr. WEBSTER, as amended, then occurred, and the question having been divided, so as to take the vote first on striking out, it was determined in the negative.

The remainder of the amendment was then withdrawn by Mr. WEBSTER.

The question on engrossing the bill then occurred, on which the yeas and nays were ordered, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. VAN BUREN addressed the Senate at great length, in opposition to the bill, and in reply to the various arguments which had been urged in support of the bill and its various modifications.

SENATE.]

[APRIL 22, 1828.]

Mr. M'KINLEY, after some explanations between him and Mr. VAN BUREN, proceeded to reply to the speech of Mr. V. H., and spoke about half an hour, in defence of the opinions formerly advanced by him; when the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, APRIL 22, 1828.

On motion of Mr. NOBLE, the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland Road, through the State of Indiana, was taken up, and several amendments, reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals, having been agreed to,

Mr. NOBLE spoke at great length in support of the bill, and the claim of the State of Indiana to have the road extended through that State.

Mr. CHANDLER made a few remarks in opposition to the bill; and,

Mr. NOBLE explained.

Mr. HENDRICKS supported the bill in a short speech.

Some further explanatory conversation took place between Messrs. CHANDLER and HENDRICKS.

The question on engrossing the bill then occurring, the yeas and nays were ordered on the motion of Mr. COBB, and being taken, the question was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Benton, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Ken. Johnston, of Lou. Kane, Knight, McKinley, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md., Thomas, Webster, Williams.—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, Macon, Parris, Smith, of S. C. Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Woodbury.—15.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill for the graduation of the price of the Public Lands was again taken up; and, the question being on engrossing the bill,

Mr. ROWAN rose and replied at great length to the speech of Mr. VAN BUREN, delivered yesterday, and in support of the bill.

Mr. DICKERSON observed that he should consider himself unfaithful to his trust, if he did not, to the last, oppose the bill under consideration—which he considered as in a higher degree than any bill heretofore brought before Congress, to wrest from the old States their undoubted rights, to destroy the confidence that ought to subsist between the old and new States—and to sap the foundation of the compact by which they are held together.

He had stated a few days since, when this subject was under discussion, that he decidedly preferred the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] to this bill; but that, as we were not reduced to the necessity of adopting either the bill or amendment, he should vote against both. The amendment required nothing more of us than a cession of the public lands, amounting in value to many millions of dollars, to the States in which they lie, by which we should be immediately relieved from the expense of our land office system, as well as the expense of legislating upon the subject of these lands, while, by the operation of this bill, we are as effectually to loose these lands, without being relieved from any expense whatever.

By the bill, as amended, these lands which have been offered for sale, consisting of about eighty millions of acres, are to be sold from the first of November next, at one dollar per acre, for two years—thereafter, at seventy-five cents for two years—thereafter, at fifty cents for two years—and thereafter, at twenty-five cents. So that in six years these lands will be in the market at twenty-five cents per acre. And this system, we are very gravely told, is to replenish our Treasury. The manner in which our Treasury was thus to be replenished, was explained, but not understood. I, said Mr. D., consider it much worse than a relinquishment of the whole.

Will any man buy these lands until the price is reduced to the lowest minimum? Surely not. And there will be a suspension of sales until that period: not from any combination among those who would otherwise be purchasers, but because each one will find it his interest to wait for the lowest minimum. Will any one give one hundred and sixty dollars for a quarter section of land, which, in six years, he might have at forty dollars? If anxious to make an immediate purchase, he would buy of the large landholders in these States, who must bring their lands into the market as soon as possible: for this graduating system is to affect the price of their lands, precisely as it will affect the price of the public lands. A man holding a hundred thousand acres, or any other quantity, of land, in these States, purchased at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, will, in six years, find his price reduced to twenty-five cents per acre. He must, therefore, sell out, if possible, before that period. But, to do so, he must constantly offer his lands at a lower price than the minimums at which the public lands may be offered. He will be urged to these sales by the consideration that his lands are 'axed.' There will, therefore, be no sales of public lands till they shall be offered at the lowest minimum. It seems the price is to rest at twenty-five cents per acre: But, at that price, the lands are not worth holding by the United States. The money to be received at this price, for our public lands, would not indemnify the Government for the expense of our land law-system, and the time spent in Congress in legislating upon these lands.

The bill applies to eighty millions of acres: if they bring nothing into our Treasury, it will be folly to expect any thing from the residue of our public lands. These lands are the common stock of the United States. Those that have been ceded by certain States, have been ceded expressly as a common stock. Those that have been purchased, have been purchased out of the common fund. Our public lands have cost us more than thirty-three millions of dollars, besides probably an equal sum in protecting and defending them. And are we now about to relinquish the pecuniary advantages which were anticipated from those lands which we have acquired and protected at such immense expense? On the part of the State from which I have the honor to come, I can never assent to this arrangement.

New Jersey has a vested right to a share of those lands, from which she did hope to obtain some remuneration for her heavy losses and expenses in carrying on the Revolutionary war. New Jersey acquired no crown lands within her boundaries by the revolution. She never owned any part of her soil, except by purchase—never taxed the lands of the proprietors. But the gentleman from Indiana says there has been no moment when New Jersey could not tax these lands. She has the power to tax these lands, but it cannot be done with strict justice, inasmuch as there was an agreement some eighty or one hundred years ago, upon certain concessions as to the sale of these lands, that they should not be taxed. A sense of justice has prevented any attempt at taxation.

New Jersey has submitted to her condition without murmuring. She has asked but little, and received nothing. I did, by instruction, ask a donation of lands for an asylum of the deaf and dumb, established in that State. The boon was a small one, but it was refused. Since which, I have voted against donations of lands, and shall continue to do so till some equitable principle shall be adopted for the regulation of such donations.

We have extinguished the Indian title to nearly two hundred and sixty millions of acres, of which we have sold nineteen millions. The present bill applies to about eighty millions. The Senator from Missouri says it would take several thousand years to dispose of those lands, under the present system, and asks if the new States are forever to remain in a state of minority—a state of dependence upon the Union—if they are ever to remain deprived of the sovereignty enjoyed by the original States?

Ohio has waited twenty-five years under our land system, without murmuring: her population and wealth have increased under that system with a rapidity of which the history of the world affords no example. The State of Missouri has been not seven years in the Union—and the Senator from that State has been moving this bill four years. So that in less than three years, the State was impatient of its minority. Three years is but a small part of twenty-five years. It is somewhat singular that the greatest impatience should be expressed by the youngest State in the Union. The Senator from that State knows best the wishes and disposition of the People of that State, and he has exercised his power as he certainly has a right to do, to promote the interest of his constituents. By opposing this bill, I endeavor to protect the interest of mine.

But have these States a right to complain that their population is retarded by our land system? Ohio has added more than sixteen per cent. to her population, within the last four years: Alabama has nearly doubled hers in the last seven years. The other new States have increased somewhat less rapidly, but with a rapidity not known in the old States. New Jersey has increased fifty per cent. in thirty years. Several of the old States have been nearly stationary for twenty years past.

But Alabama, it seems, is not satisfied with her condition; but, as a Senator from that State [Mr. McKINLEY] informs us, will complain until she has all the rights of the other States—one of which is the ownership of all the soil within her boundary. He repeats the doctrine that the new States cannot be sovereign without this right—that it is theirs by the law of nations, which is the law of reason—that these States are as sovereign as the independent Kingdoms of Europe—that indeed there can be no greater sovereignty than that of the People.

The States, sir, are confederated—not independent sovereignties: a portion of sovereignty remains with each of the States—a portion has been yielded to the United States.

A sovereign independent State can make war and peace—can make treaties—lay imposts and duties. These and several other attributes of sovereignty have been yielded to the Union, without which, it could not exist. The Union is an independent sovereign State—but its parts cannot be distinct independent sovereign States. Their sovereignty is a modified one. When we speak of the sovereignty of the People, we mean the People of the United States, not the People of New York or Pennsylvania.

The cases cited from the law of nations, have no application to these States, except in their collective capacity as forming the Union.

The old States have looked upon these public lands as an inexhaustible fund of revenue to the Government. This delusion is passing away—they still hope, however, that they are not to be actual losers by acquiring these lands. For one, I do not wish to gain by them. But let the old States receive from the sale of these lands what they have cost us, before we cede them. I am willing to reduce the minimum to a dollar per acre, and the offer has been made in this body, but rejected. Why should we reduce these lands to a lower price? The low price will neither increase population nor capital. If the lands were reduced to five cents the acre, there would still be more land than purchasers.

At the price of one dollar per acre, the new States hold out the strongest inducements to emigration. The People do emigrate as fast as they can possibly dispose of their property at home; but some must be left to purchase of the emigrants. Who will not go, that can go, to these delightful regions, where the most fertile lands upon the globe can be purchased for one dollar per acre? A country, too, that may become an empire by itself. I will close my remarks with reading a passage from the speech of the Senator from Indiana, and which I read for no other purpose than to exhibit a glowing picture of the immense advantages which these regions possess over the old States: "Suppose," says the Senator from Indiana, "the Union to be dissolved—where would be the public lands? All controversy about them would cease—they would belong to the States in which they lie. Look at the great inducement to this state of things. Look at the character and extent of this country. How capable of self government and its own independence. Seven of the largest States of the Union—the finest country on the earth—the whole valley of the Mississippi—the noblest rivers on the globe—with three millions of inhabitants—a safe and sheltered seaboard, with a commanding position for a large participation in the commerce of the West Indies, South America, and Mexico. But the People of these States are devoted to the Union."

Can emigrants ask or desire more than the privilege of purchasing such lands, in such regions, for one dollar per acre?

Mr. TAZEWELL replied to the remarks of Mr. DICKERSON, in relation to the sovereignty of the States.

Mr. BERRIEN also replied to some of the observations of Mr. DICKERSON.

Mr. DICKERSON rose again, in explanation and reply.

The question being then taken on engrossing the bill, it was rejected, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Cobb, Eaton, Ellis, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Ken., Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, King, McKinley, Noble, Ridgely, Rowan, Ruggles, Tazewell, Thomas, White, Williams.—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Chase, Dickerson, Foot, Hayne, Knight, McLane, Macon, Marks, Parria, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S. C., Tyler, Van Buren, Webster, Willey, Woodbury.—25.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 23, 1828.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MACON said that he considered that the question was never taken on the first section of the bill to graduate the price of public lands, disconnected from the rest of the bill. He was in favor of the first section, and therefore moved to reconsider the vote on the bill, with the view of striking out all but the first section.

Mr. WEBSTER said, he thought a motion to reconsider, for any particular purpose, was rather novel.

The CHAIR said, that the motion for reconsideration ought to be distinct.

The motion was then laid on the table.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Md. the bill authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company to import iron for the construction of that work, was taken up, and an amendment offered by Mr. SMITH, of Md. extending the same privilege to all States and Rail Road Companies, for similar purposes, was agreed to.

SENATE.]

Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road.

[APRIL 23, 1828-

Mr. S. said a rail road was like a ship, both being constructed of the same materials—timber and iron—and made by the same description of mechanics, and bound alike by iron. The use of both were similar—to facilitate commerce between foreign countries.

Some gentlemen were disposed to think that this was a speculation, calculated to afford an opportunity to some speculators, when the duty was taken off iron, to sell out at a considerable profit. The persons interested in this project are not of that class. The object was the universal interest of the country, by uniting the trade of the different States. The persons who are termed speculators have sold out their shares after the first deposit, not considering it an advantage to hold them. The gentlemen who compose the Directors of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, are not likely to become speculators in objects of national utility. The Directors are: Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, William Patterson, Robert Oliver, Alexander Brown, Isaac M'Kim, William Lorman, George Hoffman, Philip E. Thomas, Thomas Ellicott, John B. Morris, Talbot Jones, and William Steuart. All gentlemen of large private fortunes, and nothing could induce them to part with their stock. Some of the subscribers have advanced from 20 to 150,000 dollars each. Baltimore subscribed half a million of dollars—certain gentlemen have subscribed 3000 dollars, not for individual advantage, but the general good of the country. The Committee are sworn to conduct the business conformably to the provisions of the charter.

It is provided by the bill, that previous to the importation of such iron and machinery, the President of any such rail road company shall file, with the Collector of the port into which the importation may be intended, a copy of the order for the same, signed by such President; which order shall be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause a copy of the same to be preserved, and return it to the Collector (with his signature) granting its importation. It also provides, that on taking out at the custom house, of any such iron or machinery, the President of any such incorporated company shall swear "that the entry subscribed with his name, and delivered by him to the Collector of the particular district, contains a just and true account of all the iron and machinery, imported for the sole use of the said rail road, and that the same will not be used for any other purpose whatever." The President and Directors have a right to increase their stock—they have done so, from a million and a half to three millions. The rail road is exempt from all taxes, on the part of the States. This road goes through the States of Virginia and Pennsylvania, and connects both States. It will be highly advantageous to the Western States.

The granting this boon involves no new principle.—[Here Mr. S. read a statement of the articles imported duty free for the advantage of manufactures.]

A variety of States in the Union are contemplating rail roads, and it would be unjust to deprive the country of their very beneficial advantages. England had failed in two attempts to establish rail roads, but were eventually successful. No disadvantage can result to the States from the free importation of iron for these useful purposes, as the insufficiency of that article requires importation. The ordinary consumption requires the annual quantity of 25 to 30,000 tons; and without importation the price would be very considerably enhanced. The importation of iron was first suggested by one of the oldest and most intelligent manufacturers in this country—an importer of iron.

The immense quantity required cannot be procured in this country. This road will be of very great advantage to the manufacturers of iron—the road will extend about two hundred miles through a country abounding in iron, and there will be a stimulus to the manufacturers of iron to stop the importation of iron duty free, by at least equalling the imported iron in quality and price. There are various rail roads to be made in Pennsylvania, New-York, New-Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Ohio, &c. If he thought it would be productive of injury to any of the institutions of his country, he would not vote in its favor.

Mr. DICKERSON observed, that if it should be thought expedient to remit the duties upon iron, to be used in the formation of rail roads, the present bill ought not to receive the sanction of the Senate. It had been referred to the Committee of Finance, whose special province it is to guard our revenue, and had received their approbation—yet it contained no provision calculated to protect the revenue from the grossest fraud. Iron of any kind or form, and to any extent that a rail road company may think necessary, and the President of the company may sincerely and truly affirm is for the sole use of the rail road of the said company, and that the same will not be used for any other purpose whatever. And what control has this President over this iron after it is out of his possession, even if he should continue in office. But he may take his oath to-day, and die, or resign, or be turned out of office to-morrow—in which case his oath would be of no importance. There is no bond—no security that the iron should be applied to the purposes of the rail road.

When a drawback is to be allowed on the exportation of imported goods, the utmost caution is used to prevent fraud upon the revenue; the goods must be exported within one year of the time they are imported; notice must be given of the quantity of goods, and time when to be exported; they must be in the same casks, boxes, packages, &c. in which they were imported; bonds must be given for the duties, to be discharged on certificate that the goods have absolutely been delivered in a foreign port. These, and many other provisions, are to be found upon our statute books, where drawback is allowed upon goods sent to a foreign country; and yet no precaution is used in this bill to prevent this iron, spread over the country, from one end of a rail road to the other, from being appropriated to other purposes, than those of the rail road.

The Baltimore Rail Road Company are no doubt very honorable men, who would not defraud the revenue; but this bill extends to all rail road companies, formed and to be formed; and to all individuals disposed to make public or private rail roads. It is a very unsafe legislation, to presume upon the honor and honesty of all mankind. Our revenue laws seem to be founded upon an opposite presumption.

But why, said Mr. D. is this privilege of importing iron confined to those making rail roads? In making canals, which are the rivals of rail roads, very large quantities of iron and steel are consumed. The proposed tunnel thro' the Alleghany mountains, of five or six miles, would consume as much iron in its excavation as would make plates for a hundred miles of rail road. Why not suffer Canal companies to import iron, as well as machinery, duty free?

But why is this remission of duty confined to iron and machinery? Large quantities of lead will be required for fixing the iron to the stone work upon rail roads—why not admit that duty free? There will be a great consumption of cordage in the different machines necessary for raising and removing rocks, making excavations and removing earth from such rail roads. Immense quantities of gunpowder will be consumed in their operations. Why not remit the duty upon these articles? Vast quantities of ardent spirit will be consumed by the laborers employed upon their rail roads, the expense of which must fall directly or indirectly upon the companies or individuals constructing these roads. Why not remit the duty upon this article? And indeed upon all others necessary for the construction of rail roads? But why is not like favor to be extended to every branch of industry and enterprise in this country—why not suffer the ship-builder to import his iron, cordage, and sails, duty free—why not suffer manufacturing and steamboat companies to import their steam engines, machinery, and iron, duty free? Why not suffer the farmer and planter to import the iron necessary for carrying on their business, duty free?

The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH] has informed us that there is no speculation in this case, as it respects the Baltimore rail road company—that their stock is subscribed for partly by the State of Maryland—partly by the city of Baltimore, and partly by individuals of fortune, who have subscribed with a view to accomplish this great object of Internal Improvement—a rail road from Baltimore to the Ohio—that they are every way competent to the completion of this object, and that they will complete it. Nothing, he says, would tempt them to part with their stock—that their charter is secure, their rates of toll fixed—that their subscription is full, and that their scrip is selling at sixteen dollars for each dollar paid in, and yet nothing would induce the rich stockholders to sell out, and because they will not sell out, we are to presume there is no speculation in the case. Perhaps they consider it a better speculation to keep their stock, than to sell it at the present rate of sixteen hundred per cent. advance, but if we pass the present bill, their scrip will probably command a price of twenty for one; in that case the stockholders might be induced to sell out, and make a profit upon their money, such as has never been heard of in this country.

But if this company shall have no views of speculation, other companies to be formed may have—indeed, if these companies are to be thus encouraged, we shall have bubbles enough—rail road companies will be formed for the sole purpose of importing iron and machinery, duty free. The companies will, many of them fail, their iron, to the amount of thousands of tons, will be sold in the country, and be consumed without paying duty.

But, says the gentleman from Maryland, this company do not ask for money, but merely for a remission of the duties upon the iron and machinery they may want; that is, they do not want us to give them two or three hundred thousand dollars, but to release them from the payment of so much, which, otherwise, they would be obliged to pay to the government. To the company it is precisely the same thing as giving them so much—to the government and to the country it is much worse.

The gentleman informs, that the iron is not produced in the country—that the company have advertised for iron and have received but two offers, and but for a small part of what they demand. The capacity of this country to produce iron is without limits; Pennsylvania and Maryland alone can produce iron enough for this rail road, in addition to what they now make. The whole quantity necessary for the rail road could be furnished in one year; but it will take several years to complete the rail road, and there will not be the least inconvenience in furnishing the iron as fast as wanted. This road is to be made through the very region of iron works, where the article can be supplied in the greatest abundance.

In a very short period, the United States could produce twice the quantity of iron now produced. The article can be produced far beyond the wants of the country, rail roads included.

It is said that this company has been offered iron fit for their purpose, at $75 per ton; but that they think that they can import it, if duty free, at $65 per ton, that is, if the government will remit them $18 per ton, on one kind of iron, or $30 on another, they will be gainers by importing, rather than buying here, by $10 on the ton.

The gentleman says, that the iron for rail roads must be made with the utmost accuracy, and that we have not the skill in this country for making it, and that it is not made here. It will not be made until it is wanted. But when wanted, it can be made with as much nicety and exactness as it can be made in England. Our rolling mills are already brought to the highest state of perfection. Besides, if it were necessary to employ more skill and more capital, than are now in the country, for making iron for the rail roads, it would be much better to hold out inducements to that skill and capital to come here, than encourage it abroad.

The gentleman says, that we already admit a variety of articles duty free, for the advantage of agriculture and manufactures, as plaster of paris, fur, millstones, dye-woods, &c.; but it must be observed, that in those cases, the condition of duty free extends to the whole of each article, and not to a part; a manufacturer may import plaster of paris, or a farmer may import dye woods; there can, therefore, be no fraud upon the revenue; to make the present case parallel with those, all iron should be imported duty free.

The present bill, if it should pass, will lead to enormous frauds, without any beneficial result to the public, for the rail road will be made whether the bill shall pass or not.

Mr. HAYNE spoke at considerable length, and with peculiar force and energy, in favor of the bill. He said, in whatever aspect it presents itself, he was disposed to view it in the most favorable light. He believed there was no modern improvement of greater value than the rail road; it had effected much in England, and he thought was destined to produce still greater results in this country. From all he had been able to glean from the most authentic works, as well as persons capable of judging of the subject, rail roads were decidedly superior to canals. Mr. H. then went into a long and minute calculation to shew the advantages. He alluded to the route contemplated to be taken by this road, as more direct than a canal route could be, and would, consequently, insure a very great saving of time in transporting goods and passengers, from one part of the country to the other. He maintained that it was less liable to injury than canals, and repaired at much less cost. We overcome any ascent by means of an inclined plane and stationary engine, while the expense necessary to be incurred in surmounting this difficulty, contrasted with that of locks for a like purpose, would only be one half. Another advantage was, that the speed of the rail road might be increased at pleasure, while on canals, it was limited, at most, to three or four miles per hour. Steam was adapted to rail roads, which had, in a measure, changed the aspect of things, and so far as interchange was concerned, had almost annihilated, as it were, time and space.

Mr. BARNARD spoke at length in opposition to the bill. Although Pennsylvania, he said, had authorized rail roads to be constructed to a very considerable extent, and although the provisions of this bill will enable her to obtain the iron, free of duty, for the purpose of making these roads, yet he felt it his duty, as one of her representatives, for what he conceived to be very substantial reasons, to oppose its passage.

This measure, said Mr. B. is founded on a memorial from the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, but the terms of the bill are general, and extends to all rail roads that are now contemplated and authorized, as well as all that may be projected and made at any time hereafter. Mr. B. said he admitted, to the fullest extent, the benefits to be derived from these roads, and he was decidedly friendly to the improvement of the country by this or any other proper means, but said he, the question now under discussion, is not in what degree these works will benefit and improve the country, and whether it will be politic and wise to have all the iron to be used in their construction, brought from foreign countries free of duty. Now, said he, is it necessary to enquire into the relative advantages of rail roads and canals? The advantages of both are admitted, nor would he pretend to say which will ensure the greatest facilities to commercial intercourse. Each are beneficial.

As a Pennsylvanian, he felt proud that his native State had embarked in the work of Internal Improvement, and he could not, therefore, but feel friendly to every undertaking having this for its object, and which promised national advantages, whether within the limits of the State or out of it. He was friendly to improvements generally.

The advocates of this bill, and the memorial to Congress from the Baltimore Company, asked for this exemption from the ordinary duties, on the ground, that iron of the kind required for the work could not be procured in the country, and because of the character and importance of the undertaking.

Now, Mr. B. said, he would endeavor to show that there can be no want of iron—that it can be furnished in any quantity, and to any extent for these improvements, without resorting to Europe for it. It is a well known fact, that our country abounds in iron ore—that the beds of it are inexhaustible. It is to be found in the States of Vermont, New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri, in the greatest abundance—in any quantity required.

Mr. B. here referred to the evidence taken before the Committee of Manufactures, in the House of Representatives, to prove the quantities in New-York, New-Jersey, and elsewhere.

The Baltimore and Ohio Company, he said, alleged that 15,000 tons will be necessary to accomplish that work, but as the greatest distance of the road is only 330 miles, and 36 tons per mile is what is demanded, the quantity by this estimate will be less than 12,000 tons of bar or rolled iron. Now, said he, the State of Pennsylvania, alone, manufactures 21,800 tons of bar iron, annually, and in proof of this assertion, he referred to the members of the Manufacturing Committee of the other House. (Here Mr. B. read from the printed testimony, shewing the quantity made in Pennsylvania.)

What, said he, will be the time required to make this road? It is not to be made in a day, a month, or a year. The ground is to be levelled and prepared, and much work to be done before the iron will be called for. This is a work of great extent, embracing a distance of upwards of 300 miles. How long was the New-York canal in progress, with a distance no greater, before it was completed?—how many years did it take to finish this great work, with all the resources and activity of a great and powerful State called into requisition?

Look at the Union Canal of Pennsylvania. How many years were required for its completion? Pennsylvania commenced her canal system two years ago, to unite the East and the West together, but the work is scarcely yet begun. This rail-road will then require years for its completion; at the lowest computation five years, but allow that it can be finished in three years, and this will allow upwards of 100 miles, and an expenditure of more than two millions per annum. When, said Mr. B., we consider this extent, and this large sum to be laid out, in connection with the difficulties necessarily attendant upon a new and untried experiment in this country, it must be allowed that three years is the shortest possible time in which the work can be finished. He said he should be agreeably disappointed if it was finished within that period.

Now, sir, said Mr. B., it has been shown that Pennsylvania alone manufactures 21,800 tons of that bar iron annually: and he wished to be permitted here to say, that she can, even with her present works, manufacture one-third more, if there is a demand for it, by adding to the workmen, and giving additional force to the iron establishments. The quantity then required for the Baltimore rail road, supposing it to take three years to complete it, will be about 4,000 tons annually. If Pennsylvania furnishes this quantity from the amount now made, there still will remain for ordinary consumption near 18,000 tons; the company can then be supplied without inconvenience or increase of price; and here he would observe, said Mr. B., the iron masters will gladly undertake to furnish this quantity annually, and of the best quality, too, for our iron ore is equal to any in the world. But, said Mr. B., they can very readily manufacture the present quantity, with all the increase that will be required by this company for its road.

Besides, said Mr. B., if a demand is made for this kind of iron, old works will be revived, and new ones put into operation, which, with those already in use, can supply to any extent wanted. It cannot be denied that our mountains are filled with the ore—the supply is inexhaustible. Timber is equally plenty; and water power and sites for iron works almost without limit. When the material, and the facilities for its manufacture, are so very great, can it be doubted that it can be supplied in any quantity required, and without the exorbitant price apprehended by the advocates of this bill?

But a supply is also necessary for the use of the rail-roads authorized by the Pennsylvania Legislature. The quantity will not be more than about 1000 tons annually. There cannot be the least difficulty in furnishing this additional quantity. Pennsylvania, if this bill passes, will, it is presumed, avail herself of its provisions, and obtain iron for her rail ways at the cheapest rate; but she does not ask for the bill; she does not think it necessary, and will never ask for any measure that will operate to the injury of her citizens, or be impolitic and injudicious in a national point of view.

The quantity of iron manufactured in this country will be in exact proportion to the demand for it. The materials lay in our soil to an immeasurable extent; it is only necessary to afford the necessary encouragement and create a market, and all that can possibly be required will be furnished; and that, too, as fast as these rail-roads can progress or stand in need of it.

Mr. B. said he had confined himself to the supply which Pennsylvania alone could furnish; but it must be borne in mind that Pennsylvania is only one of the many States of this confederacy which abound in this indispensable and highly useful article.

The ground, then, said Mr. B., that the country has not the capacity to furnish the iron necessary for the Baltimore rail-road, and which is one of the reasons urged for the passage of this bill, had, he conceived, entirely failed.

But, said Mr. B., is this work of such a character as to entitle it to this special privilege? He had already admitted that such works deserved every proper encouragement and aid not inconsistent with the interest and settled policy of the nation. What has been the policy of the Government from its first organization? Has it not been to produce within ourselves every article of necessity, which the country can afford in abundance, and not be dependent on foreign supply for our wants? Is not the tariff bill now before us, based on this principle? Its object is to give protection to our home productions.

But, said Mr. B., is not the bill now asked for, in direct opposition to this system of protection; and will it not establish a new, mischievous, and dangerous principle? It is alleged by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH] that the principle is not new, and he has cited many instances to show that articles have been and are imported free of duty; but the difference between the cases mentioned by him (and it is a very essential one) and the case presented by this bill, is, that the articles are admitted into the country free of duty to all who choose to import them; but here a special favor is contended for—it is asked to import iron for certain purposes, free of duty, for the benefit of a large and wealthy corporation, while all the rest of the community are compelled to pay this duty: it is a special exemption for the benefit of a few—it was granting exclusive privileges, and thereby establishing a precedent hitherto unknown in our revenue laws.

Will not the effect be, to do great injustice to all the citizens of the country who are not interested in these rail-road companies? Why this distinction?

It is perfectly well known, said Mr. B., that iron is an article used for all the purposes of life. The farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer—all require its use. Why, then, shall they be compelled to pay a higher price than than these associations? and yet such will be the inevitable effect if this bill passes. Will they not have a right to complain? Will they not complain of this inequality and unfairness? Will they not say, we contribute our full proportion to all the expenses of the Government, as much so as any member of a rail-road company, and yet they can get their iron, free of duty, to construct a work which will yield them a very extensive profit, while we cannot. To make a distinction amongst our citizens is at all times injudicious. Let every burthen be equal and alike upon all. Place all on the same footing, and you will hear no complaints. But favor the few and the wealthy, at the expense of the many, and you act in opposition to the true principles of our republican institutions.

And, said Mr. B., do these works entitle them to these special favors? We all admit that great credit is due to the patriotic and enterprising spirit of the citizens of Baltimore in starting this rail-road. They deserve the highest commendation; and, said Mr. B., I would be the last to withhold it from them.

But is not this work undertaken for motives of interest? It is admitted by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH] that the object is to secure the important and valuable trade of the West. This is all perfectly fair, but it shews that private gain is the moving principle. The intention is to benefit Baltimore and all its citizens, and none more so than the gentlemen composing the Baltimore and Ohio Rail-road Company. In addition to the benefit which which they will enjoy in common with all the rest of their fellow-citizens, will be the dividends arising from the tolls of the road; the stock has advanced to a very considerable sum above par already, and why? Because the trade is expected to be immense, and the profits in proportion; public good, then, is not the only object of this company; this will, undoubtedly, be the consequence, but the private profit and advantage to the individual members is not overlooked in this project.

Now, said Mr. B., why are iron works established? For precisely the same reason that rail-roads and all other monied associations are created, to profit the individuals, for ultimate gain. But do not iron establishments benefit the public and the nation? They produce from the bowels of the earth the ore which before was wholly valueless. The timber which covered the ground, and was an incumbrance to the soil and the owner, is felled and used. Thus, materials which in a state of nature were wholly useless, become of great value. The stock of national wealth is increased: it is true the proprietor reaps the advantage in the first instance, but it is a national gain in the end.

Are not the iron manufacturers, then, in a national point of view, on an equal footing with the members of a rail-road company? These last only furnish the means of transportation to a market what the former have converted into value and usefulness. Are not the iron works of our country, therefore, entitled to the fostering care of our Government? Pennsylvania alone has a capital of about $15,000,000 invested in iron establishments. Shall we neglect, nay, injure, and perhaps ruin, this extensive business, by granting the favored privileges asked for by this bill?

To allow, said Mr. B., of partial importations, free of duty, will operate as a check on our manufacturers of iron—it will depress their exertions, instead, as it ought to be done, of encouraging them. To allow of importations, free of duty, for all rail-roads now and hereafter (and such are the provisions of the bill) will be to affect very materially the whole iron establishments of the country. Importations for partial objects will have the same effect and operation as a general diminution in the duty. Will this be fair or just?

These works, said Mr. B., were erected in the full confidence that the existing duty on iron would not be lessened. Was there not an implied pledge on the part of the Government, that the duties should continue as at present established, and will not the passage of this bill be a violation of that pledge? The citizens of our country have a right to, and do expect, that when duties are established by Congress, they shall not be diminished, either by partial exemption, or otherwise, to the injury of the establishments created under the full persuasion that those duties will be continued. Can we, then, without doing manifest injustice, grant the special favors solicited by these rail-road companies? But there is another point of view, said Mr. B., in which this question presents itself. He had said before, it had always been the policy of this Government not to grant special favors for particular objects, but to deal to all alike in our public measures. Now, what has been the course of this Government with respect to articles necessary for national purposes? The iron used in the building of our ships of war; the artillery which floats on their decks; the anchors, and all other articles of iron, are the produce of our own country. Has the Government thought it proper or politic to obtain this iron cheaper, by importing it free of duty, although for strictly national purposes? Has it been thought wise or prudent to import, free of duty, the clothing necessary for our military force? Why, then, should we extend a privilege to local associations which we deny for general national purposes? Why break through a general established system, for a favored portion of our citizens, while the Government itself, and all the rest of our countrymen, are debarred from its benefits? That system cannot be right which deals unequally with those who are entitled to equal privileges.

Again, said Mr. B., by the provisions of this bill we send abroad about a million and a half of dollars, to obtain that which can be very readily and conveniently furnished at home. We establish our workshops in Europe, instead of keeping them in our own country. The sum required to purchase the iron for the Baltimore and Ohio Rail-road Company and the Pennsylvania rail-roads alone, would furnish employment and support to about 30,000 of our own citizens for one year, if the iron was obtained in the country—if brought from abroad we give so much to foreigners.

This large sum expended in the country would be sensibly felt. Besides the employment offered to the workmen who would be engaged in the manufacture of the iron, the farmer would be materially benefitted by having a new market for his grain, flour, and other provisions. The sum would be laid out among ourselves, and not sent to foreign countries to enrich their subjects, instead of our own people. But as the provisions of the bill are general, and extends to all rail-roads to be constructed, we cannot foresee the sums that will be sent to other countries to the great injury and impoverishment of ourselves, and this, too, to obtain a material that our country can furnish to an unlimited extent. We undertake a great domestic improvement, and we send for a foreign material to accomplish it, when the article is at our own door. I must confess, said Mr. B., I do not like the idea of having our roads made by foreign hands and foreign materials, and when the professed, and no doubt actual object is the general improvement of the country. These rail-roads were undertaken without any expectation, at least without any assurance, that they could procure from Congress an act of this kind. No special privilege could have been anticipated, so that there will be no injustice in denying it. If, said Mr. B., it is deemed expedient to assist these companies, it will be much better to do it by a direct donation from your Treasury, by subscription to the stock; and the Government will have the benefit of any profit that may accrue from dividends, besides favoring our own countrymen, by making it necessary to obtain the materials at home instead of in Europe. Begin, said Mr. B., the system of granting special privileges to these companies, and you cannot foresee the end and consequences of it. Application after application will be made to Congress for similar favors. This bill will be referred to as a precedent, and you may as well repeal your revenue laws at once, and withdraw all protection from our own domestic industry and manufactures, as to go on and abolish partially and in detail.

Mr. B. said, when this bill was first introduced, considering that, sir, our State had engaged to some extent in rail-roads, and that works of this kind would benefit the nation at large, he had thought favorably of it. But a little reflection had convinced him of the impolicy of the measure asked for, and he had determined to oppose it. Mr. B. concluded, by trusting that the Senate would negative the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERS briefly replied to the remarks of Mr. BARNARD. He considered that the manufacturers had no concern in the bill, as it was out of their power to supply the article. The question was, in his opinion, whether the United States would generously release the company from the duties, in order that this experiment, of great importance to the country, might be made as advantageously as possible.

Mr. DICKERSON replied to the observations of Mr. HAYNE.

Mr. TYLER spoke in favor of the bill. If the advocates of the encouragement of manufactures had hitherto acted upon a correct principle, and desired to enable the industry of our own citizens to supply the consumption of the country, they ought to support this measure, as any plan which should facilitate the construction of this work would have a tendency to open the resources of the country to a vast extent, as the rail-road would pass through one of the richest mineral regions of the country, and have the effect to increase the manufacture of iron beyond conception, and as it would enable the manufacturer to carry it to market at a trifling expense.

Mr. McLANE said, he did not rise with a view to enter into any discussion on the general merits of the bill, but simply to reply to some objections which had been urged by the opponents of the measure. He had no idea that the operation of the bill would be to diminish the revenue, as there was no guard in the drawback system which was not embraced in the subject before them. Mr. McL. went into an exhibit of the quantity of iron used in the country, the number of tons produced by our own manufactures, and the number annually imported, shewing how far the native production fell short of the absolute wants.

He did not think it possible to lay such a protecting duty on the iron manufacture of this country, as would bring the produce to the demand, unless he went further than he was disposed to go, or the Senate would sanction. Gentlemen seem to go on the supposition that if we refuse to adopt this measure the rail-road company will be obliged to purchase the iron necessary for this work from our own manufactures. But such, said Mr. McL., will not be the fact. Compel it to pay this duty, which it asks to be relieved from, it must necessarily seek for iron abroad, because it cannot be had here, and then the company will remunerate itself by an increase of tolls, so that gentlemen must at once see the burden will ultimately fall on the nation, and be paid from the pocket of the farmer, mechanic, and manufacturer.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, rose simply to make a brief reply to the observations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BARNARD.] He had been told, said Mr. S., that it will take three years to make this rail road, and in that time iron would be supplied from our own manufactories. He could tell gentlemen, if we had to depend on our own manufactories for that article, they would have to wait twenty years before they could accomplish it. The intelligent men at the head of the rail-road company knew the value of interest too well to wait for our own manufactories, and would immediately proceed to import.

Mr. S. said, the bill before them better provided against fraud upon the revenue than any drawback bill he ever knew. The gentleman has told us that Pennsylvania is a great iron country. True it is, sir, but yet she does not supply as much as is imported into the United States annually.

The quantity furnished by her is twenty-one thousand tons. The gentleman has assumed what is not warranted by the facts before us—'tis, that Pennsylvania can increase the quantity adequate to our wants. If such be the fact, Mr. President, why has she not done so? Surely there has been an ample demand for it.

Mr. SMITH here dwelt with peculiar energy on the advantages likely to be derived from the contemplated work to the nation at large, as well as the States in common, and he brought to the minds of gentlemen the towns of Manchester, Sheffield Birmingham, which from small villages had increased in a few years to be large towns, and chiefly, he believed, in consequence of the facilities afforded them in the transportation of heavy articles.

Mr. DICKERSON.—The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] informs us that this bill cannot injure the iron masters in this country, because whether it passes or not the iron for this company will be imported. It is not conceived that the iron masters will be injured by this bill; but if it were so, the revenue will be injured, as the amount of duties upon the imported iron will undoubtedly come into the Treasury if we do not pass this bill, and as certainly lost to it if we do. The gentleman says, that even if from the immense abundance of the material for making iron in this country, we have not the means of rolling it; that a rolling mill will cost from fifty to a hundred thousand dollars. If the gentleman had made himself acquainted with the subject, he would know that the rolling of the iron is the least difficulty in the case—that one rolling mill requiring one hundred thousand dollars capital, could roll all the iron that could be made in as many forges and furnaces as would require a capital of a million of dollars.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. McLANE] thinks that the iron cannot be produced in this country, which he says is evident from this fact, that we do not produce enough for the consumption of the country, notwithstanding the high duty laid in 1824 upon this article. The fact is that this country could in a few years produce twice as much as is wanted for our own consumption. It would be increased rapidly if demanded; but so far from that, it is crowded out of the market by foreign iron, notwithstanding the duties upon iron, the price is as low as it was ten years ago. There is no inducements to erect new iron works, but the old works have been repaired, and the manufacture of iron has been increasing, although slowly, for the last four years. If the duty on iron should be repealed, our market would be supplied almost exclusively by foreign iron. It would not follow from that, however, that the country has not the capacity of producing iron.

Tariff Bill.—Adjournment of Congress.

[SENATE.]

But the gentleman informs us that the bill is guarded with sufficient caution to protect the revenue; and that if the iron should be sold in the country for consumption, it would not affect the revenue—inasmuch as our iron masters do not produce the article, at least in sufficient quantities for the country. But if that is the case, this iron so sold would take the place of so much that would otherwise be imported and pay a duty to the Treasury. Frauds may be committed by such sales to an enormous amount, if we remit the duties, except upon iron absolutely laid and used in the constructing of the rail-road. The gentleman also thinks, that, if by this bill we relinquish to this company a large sum which would be received as duties upon their iron, we can well afford it, as our Treasury is full, and the object to be effected is important. The object will be effected without our aid; and a full Treasury affords no reason for making donations, especially as we have yet a national debt to pay.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] has shown to us by a great variety of facts and arguments the immense advantages which rail-roads possess over canals, and the small expense at which they can be made when compared with canals, but all that goes to show that it is unnecessary to give the aid to this company proposed by the bill. If the company were to make a free road, or to give any advantage to the public in consequence of this aid, it would alter the case; but this is not proposed, and will not be done. The privileges granted to this company already, have made their stock more valuable than any in the United States. By this bill we still make it more so, under the idea that we are giving aid to the making of the rail-road, when in fact we are doing no more than enriching the present stockholders, who may sell out at a great advance to those who will finish the work, without the least benefit from the aid given by this bill.

As yet we have not heard one word as to the kind of machinery that it is intended to import; whether of iron or of wood; whether to be driven by the force of steam or of man, or of horse; whether cranes, wheels, pulleys, or capstans; and yet we are called upon to vote for the bill without information on this important item.

The question being put on engrossing the bill—

Mr. MARKS moved an adjournment, but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. DICKERSON, who said there was a very important bill which had come from the other House this morning, and he hoped this bill would be laid on the table, that the bill to which he alluded might be read. Mr. D. then moved to lay the bill under consideration on the table; which was agreed to—20 to 17.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The bill imposing duties on imports was read; and, on the question of reading a second time, a division took place—and 26 being in favor, it was ordered to a second reading.

THURSDAY, APRIL 24, 1828.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The bill to levy duties on imports was read a second time, and Mr. DICKERSON moved its reference to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BRANCH opposed the motion.

The question being taken, it was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

A resolution of the other House in relation to the adjournment, having been read and agreed to, and on the question of appointing a committee,

Mr. McKINLEY moved to postpone the appointment until Monday.

Mr. BRANCH opposed the motion.

Mr. NOBLE said he disliked the resolution, coming, as it did, on the very heels of the Tariff. He thought the conclusion of the public would be, that the Senate intended to stifle the American System. He wished that the resolution might lay on the table, and allow the Chairman of the Manufacturing Committee to bring out his budget, and weigh the sectional question, and, if possible, do justice to all. He moved that it lay on the table, and let each man march up to the investigation of the subject. He did not wish to hurt the interests of the South or the North, but to deal fairly by all. If the Senate now displayed a desire to go home, when such a measure came before them, the People would mark it with reprobation.

Mr. McKINLEY said his objection was, that the resolution not only related to the adjournment, but to a selection of the business; and, on this point, the Senate ought not to act precipitately. The business of the other House had been interrupted by the discussion of the Tariff, and it would also be obstructed here by the same subject. He thought the matter of selecting business ought to be delayed. He moved to reconsider the vote on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that, when committees had been formerly appointed to fix upon the business to be acted upon, their recommendations had not been regarded. Each House had taken up the business as it thought fit. From this experience he was convinced that a selection of subjects by a committee would be of no benefit. The Senate was placed in a peculiar situation this year. They had completed nearly all their business, and had nothing left but to act upon subjects which would come from the House of Representatives. They had done but little as yet, and much was before them, which would require at least a month. It would be difficult to select those subjects which would be best entitled to be acted on. As to the Tariff Bill, he should be willing to give a silent vote upon it. He should think that thirty days would suffice for its discussion.

Mr. CHANDLER said he thought it better to delay acting upon the resolution.

Mr. KING said, that, hitherto, all business had been smothered in the other House by the Tariff Bill. On former occasions, when committees had fixed upon the business to be acted upon, instead of taking up those matters which had been matured in one House, they fixed upon new subjects, and, in consequence, bills which had already been acted upon by one body, were neglected. He himself had suffered from this course, last year, from the rejection, by the committee, of bills that had already passed the Senate. A great mass of business had been sent this session to the House, and he wished to see what course they took, before this resolution was concurred in, and, therefore, was desirous that it might be delayed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky., said, that, by a reference to the proceedings of Congress, in the year 1824, he found that the Tariff of that year came into the Senate on the 19th of April, and on the 21st, a resolution passed, fixing the adjournment on the 20th May. This resolution was not a decision to adjourn; but a preparatory step towards it. When he had offered a resolution on a former day, in relation to the same object, he had been met by a remonstrance against agitating any such proposition, until the House first made it; and that the Senate ought to wait and see what disposition the House made of the Tariff; and now he was told, that they must wait and see how the House got along with the other business. He hoped there would be no delay in deciding upon this resolution. He would add one word in relation to the Tariff. He presumed it would be fully discussed in the Senate, and that various propositions would be made to modify it; but he should vote against it if it should have been materially modified.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that sufficient for the day was the evil thereof; and he should, therefore, now confine himself to the resolution itself. He was in favor of the part of the resolution which provided for a concert of the two Houses, as to adjourning. But he should move to amend, so as to strike out that portion which related to the arrangement of the business; because experience had demonstrated its inexpediency. Each House, in regard to the business, would act for itself on the subject before it. And he was against mixing the business of the two Houses. It appeared to him to be a very strange proposition to appoint a Joint Committee to consider of the business necessary to be acted upon. The Senate sent a large number of bills to the House, and could not judge which of them they would be disposed to act upon. They have sent business to the Senate which has not yet been decided. And [said Mr. W.] shall we take upon ourselves to say to the House what bills they shall pass, and what reject? Or shall we authorize them to dictate to the Senate what business we shall act upon? Sir, I am against it—wholly and decidedly against it. I think we should neither take advice nor give it, as to what business shall be acted upon. If we approve of bills, we shall pass them—if they approve of them, they will pass them. He could imagine all the inconvenience alluded to by the gentleman from Alabama. If the examination were submitted to a committee, a contest would arise as to whose bill should come on, and whose bill come off. He should vote for the reconsideration, and should that motion prevail, he would move to amend the resolution, so as to strike out that part which relates to the selection of business. He saw no way in which the two Houses could agree upon this point. The Senate doubtless thought all the bills they had passed worthy of being acted upon; and the House probably thought the same of theirs.

Mr. BRANCH spoke in opposition to reconsidering.

Mr. BENTON said he had similar objections to the resolution as those expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts. He therefore hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail; and that it then might be put before the two Houses in its proper form. They could adjourn at any time. But a committee of the kind proposed, were not the best judges of what business ought to be done. Each House could better decide on the subjects as they came up. The opinion of a few individuals, at the close of the session, who would probably judge from their own feelings, could not well be relied on to settle this question. Mr. B. then moved a substitute for the resolution, in which the portion relative to a choice of business was omitted.

Mr. WEBSTER said that it appeared to him to be a novel question, and he doubted whether it was the practice to concur in a resolution of the other House, which was not a joint resolution.

The CHAIR said that it was a question of practice altogether, whether the Senate could reconsider, or whether it was the practice of concurring in a resolution of the House.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that it seemed questionable whether the Senate could amend a resolution passed by a vote merely of the other House. He moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. FOOT said there could not be a question as to the matter. It was not in the power of the Senate to amend a resolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING asked the nature of the difficulty, and whether the vote could be reconsidered?

The CHAIR stated that there was no need of reconsidering; because the concurrence would have been by appointing a committee.

Mr. KING asked whether the reconsideration was unnecessary because the concurrence was improper?

The CHAIR said it was so.

Mr. BRANCH inquired whether the motion to lay on the table was intended to delay the resolution, or to obtain information?

The CHAIR replied that it was to examine the record, and act upon the resolution according to former practice.

The resolution was then ordered to lie on the table.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to take up the bill authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company to import iron and machinery.

Mr. DICKERSON said he hoped the Senate would not take it up. It was one of great importance, and he considered it should not be hurried through. He wished some further time to examine the subject.

Mr. SEYMOUR wished there should be more time given for consideration before he was called on to give his vote. There was a bill lying on the table a long time, which was taken out of its regular course; it ought in justice to have the preference.

Mr. HAYNE said he was averse to the principle of taking up a subject, and then dropping it suddenly. If the bill should be postponed until next week, then the whole discussion must be commenced de novo. He hoped, for economy's sake, at this period of the session, the Senate would resume its consideration.

Mr. SILSBEE offered the following amendment, which he prefaced by some observations:

To add the following at the end of the last section: "And shall give bond for the amount of duties in the usual manner, subject to the condition, (to be expressed in the bond,) that, on satisfactory proof being given to the Secretary of the Treasury that such iron has been used in the construction of such rail-roads, such bond shall thereon be cancelled."

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. MARKS said he did not rise so much for the purpose of opposing the bill, as to explain the motives which would induce his vote. There was no certainty that the intended rail road would extend to Pittsburg: it would go entirely south to Pennsylvania. He would be the last man in the world to oppose a measure imparting so much general benefit. The Legislature of Pennsylvania, last session, directed a committee to make a rail-road, extending about ninety miles, from Philadelphia. Members are generally influenced by the votes of their constituents: they are the best judges of what is useful and necessary. They are composed of the manufacturing and agricultural portion of the community, and we should be entirely governed by their opinions. He had no doubt but Pennsylvania is as much entitled as Maryland or Ohio to the advantages of the privilege to make rail-roads. Although the roads are not at present so great in extent, yet Pennsylvania will be obliged shortly to make rail-roads as extensive as Baltimore or Ohio. Several rail-roads were authorized to be made in Pennsylvania. They were every where springing up. The capacity of the country for producing iron was commensurate with this increasing demand for it. Pennsylvania produced iron enough now for its own consumption, leaving a large surplus for the use of other States. If we remitted the duties on the iron and machinery imported for the use of this company, we should, of course, be obliged to do the same for all other companies, to the manifest disadvantage of the domestic production of iron. The corporation for whose benefit the remission was proposed to be made, was rich. They expected to profit largely by the enterprise, or they would not have invested their money in it. The Senator from Maryland had chosen to animadvert on the course which

Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road.

[SENATE.]

Pennsylvania has taken in regard to the metropolis of Maryland. During the time that he was a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, no hostility was discovered towards Baltimore. A rail road had been authorized from York Haven to Baltimore. This did not indicate hostility.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, explained. He perceived yesterday, he said, from the looks of the Senator, he was mistaken by him. There were obstructions in the river Susquehannah, which rendered its ascent or descent difficult. The Legislature of Maryland voted a sum for the improvement of the navigation of the river, but the State of Pennsylvania would not permit it to be applied.

Mr. MARKS resumed. This was no proof of the existence of any jealousy, on the part of Pennsylvania, of the prosperity of Baltimore. He well recollected the case to which the gentleman alluded. The offer of the State of Maryland was refused because the State of Pennsylvania was not consulted, and because it was thought a violation of her rights to have improvements made in her limits without her consent. But, subsequently, the two States had an understanding on the subject. Maryland gave $40,000 towards the improvement of the navigation of the Susquehannah, and Pennsylvania gave $60,000. Certainly this was no evidence on our part of a disposition unfriendly to Baltimore. Many of our principal turnpikes, too, terminate on the Maryland line. This was no evidence of the hostility with which the gentleman accused us. This much he had thought it necessary to say, to obviate the impression which the remarks made by the gentleman might have produced. I have been anxious to remove that impression, because I know it is unfounded. I do know that our people are friendly to the State and the metropolis of Maryland, and would rather promote than retard that prosperity.

Mr. M. concluded with some further remarks on the impolicy of the proposed measure.

Mr. HARRISON rose not to make a speech; for he said there was at this period of the session no time for speech making—but to say two words in favor of the bill. The internal improvement of the country, and its agricultural improvement, would be greatly promoted by the proposed rail-road. It was not his wish to throw into the hands of the company any facility for the execution of this work which the general interests of the nation did not require.

Mr. BARNARD was, he said, as fully persuaded of the utility and importance of rail-roads as was the Senator from Ohio. The measure proposed would introduce a new principle, a new and mischievous system into our policy; a distinction in the distribution of the favors of the Government between one and another class of men. Such distinctions, however meritorious the favored party might be, were fraught with evil to free institutions.

Whether we exonerated the company or not from the duty, the tolls which they would charge on the country would be the same. The great argument used by the gentlemen in favor of the bill was that we have not the capacity to produce iron for our own consumption. The amount of iron used in the country is 97,000 tons, say 100,000; of this quantity 30,000 tons are imported from abroad. We have ourselves inexhaustible quantities of iron ore. In the single State of Pennsylvania there was ore enough, fuel and labor enough, to supply the whole Union with iron, even were the present consumption increased tenfold. I therefore contend that the ground assumed is not tenable.

The gentleman from Maryland says the argument heretofore used against this application, to wit, that the Government does not remit the duty on iron used for its ships of war, is of no avail, because we use for those purposes American iron. The argument is rendered the stronger by that circumstance; for the fact shows our capacity for producing good iron. I contend that in the price which the Government pays for this American iron for their ships, is included the duty on imported iron; but it was not thought politic to make a distinction between the Government and individuals. We were, by this bill, appropriating money, not for specific objects, but to rail road companies of indefinite number. If this company had objects in view greatly beneficial to the nation, other companies might have objects of little or no public benefit in view. A road of a mile or two miles, for private purposes, would be just as much entitled to the bounty of the Government. Here Mr. B. proceeded to make further remarks on the observations of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. DICKERSON moved an amendment to the bill, not heard. The amendment, after some remarks from Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was lost.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

Mr. FOOT said, before he gave his vote, he wished to ascertain what would be the amount of the duties proposed to be remitted? By his own calculations they would amount to $450,000. Why should such duties be remitted to companies rather than to the United States? What was the situation of the stock? It was sold at a great advance on the scrip, when sold at all. Most of it was kept up, and withdrawn from market. He would like to have some reason for the donation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the amount of the sum remitted would not exceed $180,000.

Mr. DICKERSON asked whether this company was more meritorious than other companies? And whether rail-road companies were more worthy of the protection of the Government than other companies? Were not ships as important to the interests of the country as rail-roads? Why did we not then remit the duty on iron and hemp imported for the use of ships? Rail roads were about to become numerous in this country. We had the capacity to furnish the iron. The passage of the bill threw the whole property of the iron manufacturer into the hands of British iron masters. He protested against the policy of the bill, but he despaired of defeating it. He asked the ayes and noes on the question.

The call being sustained, the ayes and noes were ordered.

After some remarks from Messrs. FOOT and CHANDLER, Mr. MACON asked whether the remission of the duty would affect the toll of the rail-roads? It would be strange if the people, with the encouragement which the duty gave them, and having iron ore enough for the whole world, could not prepare iron enough for home consumption. He recollected that before the duty was imposed the iron business was very profitable. If the people were forced to get their iron here, the planting interest would be greatly benefitted. By planters, he meant all persons from Maine to Florida who cultivated their own lands with their own labor. He disapproved of the fashionable term "farmers," as applied to those who owned the soil which they cultivated. This bill gave a gratuity to the richest men in the country. If the bill did not lessen the toll of the rail-road, it was of no use to the community.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, was, he said, placed in a dilemma by this bill. He was forced to vote against his doctrines in regard to internal improvements, or to vote for the protection of domestic manufactures. If we did not remit the duty, we imposed on the company the necessity of waiting till iron foundries were established; and then of taking the iron at whatever price the iron master should choose to demand. This was a most gross violation of justice. There were, no doubt, gentlemen who had voted for grants of hundreds of thousands of dollars to national roads who would vote against this application. Placed in this dilemma, the safest course for me is, I think, to vote for the bill.

Mr. VAN BUREN spoke in reply to the question of the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator, said Mr. V. B., asks whether the remission of the duty on the iron imported will produce a corresponding diminution of the toll charged by the company? The company, he replied, were entitled by their charter to charge a certain sum as a toll. There was no reason to believe that they would lessen it. Their object was profit. It would hardly be expected of private individuals to become more careful of the interests of others than their own; and corporations, having no souls, could not be expected to be more liberal. The stock of this rail-road company was good stock, and it was owned by our richest capitalists. It was now worth sixteen for one. Private interest was the only motive which actuated men in undertaking these enterprises. They looked to the amount of the dividends they were to receive from the investment; or, in some instances, to the enhancement of the value of their lands. He would repeat, in reply to the Senator from North Carolina, that the remission of the duty would not lessen the tolls.

Mr. HAYNE spoke in reply to Mr. VAN BUREN.—There was a universal law of nature which applied to this case. Competition, or other causes, would bring down the tolls of this rail-road to a reasonable profit. The rail-roads would consume an additional quantity of iron to the extent of 20,000 tons yearly. If the duty were not remitted, the price of every article made from iron in the country would be greatly increased. The introduction of this manufacture would employ 300,000 hands; whereas the iron masters, if they furnished the iron, would employ but 30,000 hands. The manufacture of the iron wanted for rail-roads required particular nicety and skill. The reason why it could not be supplied by our iron masters, was, that they could not furnish iron prepared in the proper manner. The introduction of this principle into our legislation was not new. We had made a similar remission of duties on books imported, on philosophical apparatus, and on articles employed in manufactures, to the amount of eight millions of dollars. The company had advertised for a supply of the iron which they wanted, and but two offers were made, and those of very small quantities. It was considered that the iron could not be furnished in this country. The iron masters in Pennsylvania could not answer the orders which they already had. The rail roads were the most important improvement, excepting that of steam, which had been introduced in modern times. Whether this work should be undertaken by individuals, burdened by the laws of the country, was the question presented by the bill.

After some further remarks from Mr. VAN BUREN, in reply to Mr. HAYNE, the question was taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The bill making appropriations for internal improvements was returned from the House of Representatives; that House having disagreed to the amendments of the Senate, limiting the appropriations for surveys to such surveys as are already in progress.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee of Finance.

FRIDAY, APRIL 25, 1828.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky., submitted a resolution proposing to appoint a committee, to join that on the part of the House, to fix on a day on which this session of Congress should close.

Mr. J. requested the consideration of his resolution; which was not agreed to.

The CHAIR stated that, having directed the Secretary to examine the records, as to the practice in relation to resolutions of the other House, similar to that laid on the table yesterday, the CHAIR entertained no doubt that the concurrence of the Senate in such resolutions, by vote, was not sustained by former practice. The appointment of a committee would be the proper act of concurrence.

SURVIVORS OF THE REVOLUTION.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY, the bill providing for certain Surviving Officers of the Revolution was taken up. The following substitute for the original bill, reported by the committee on the subject, being before the Senate:

Strike out, after the enacting clause, and insert:

"Section 1. That each of the surviving officers of the Army of the Revolution, in the continental line, who was entitled to half pay by the resolve of October 21st, 1780, be authorized to receive, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the amount of his full pay in said line, to begin on the — day of —, and to continue during his natural life.

"Section 2. That, whenever any of said officers has received money of the United States as a pensioner, since the — day of — aforesaid, the sum so received shall be deducted from what said officer would otherwise be entitled to under the first section of this act, and any pension to which said officer is now entitled, shall cease after the passage of this act.

"Section 3. That every surviving soldier in said army, and non-commissioned officer, who enlisted therein for and during the war, and continued in the service until its termination, and thereby became entitled to receive a reward of $80 under the resolve of Congress, passed May 15, 1778, shall be entitled to receive his full monthly pay, in said service, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to begin on the — day of —, and to continue during his natural life.

"Section 4. That the pay allowed by this act, shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be paid to the officer or soldier entitled thereto, or to their authorized attorney, at such places and days as said Secretary may direct, and that no foreign officer shall be entitled to said pay, nor shall any officer or soldier receive the same, until he furnish to said Secretary satisfactory evidence that he is entitled to the same, in conformity to the provisions of this act; and the pay allowed by this act shall not, in any way, be transferable or liable to attachment, levy, or seizure, by any legal process whatever, but shall enure wholly to the personal benefit of the officer or soldier entitled to the same by this act.

"Section 5. That so much of said pay as accrued by the provisions of this act before the — day of —, shall be paid to the officers and soldiers entitled to the same, as soon as may be, in the manner, and under the provisions, before mentioned: and the pay which shall accrue after the — day of —, shall be paid semi-annually, in like manner, and under the same provisions."

Several amendments to the substitute proposed by the committee, were then proposed; and the question being on filling the blank with the "3d March, 1826,"

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that when, on a former occasion, the bill had been before the Senate, it had expressed, by three several votes, on different sums proposed, its disapprobation of the form in which the bill was then presented. He had understood, at that time, that, if the Senate did not grant the claim then advanced, they would retire and not urge their claim again. It was, however, now brought forward, and in a manner which rendered it far more objectionable than formerly. It was an accession to the pension system of the country, and he believed that the amount of money which it would eventually call for, would far exceed any computation that the committee had made. He also objected that some of the officers were men of wealth, and stated that he knew one who was worth $50,000.

Mr. BERRIEN considered the objections of the gentleman from South Carolina applied rather to the conduct of the friends of the bill, than to the claim itself. Mr. B. did not recollect that any pledge was given that the claim should not be further urged; but he did recollect, that one of the advocates of the bill declared that the officers would not consent to be placed on the pension list. He would repeat what he had said before: that he had arrived at a conviction that these officers had an equitable claim on the Government; and he, therefore, was disposed to acquiesce in any plan, by which they should receive it, in a form not revolting to their feelings. As to the objections of the gentleman from South Carolina, that these officers were men of wealth, he would ask if that was a good reason for not granting the claim? He stated that some of them had large fortunes. I should be happy, said Mr. B. to know that these men who have served their country so faithfully, were in the enjoyment of the blessings of competence. But it was not so general as to have any effect on the large mass of those for whom this bill provided. In reply to the objection that this bill would swell the pension list, he would remark, that, as it was a debt for the payment of which the faith of the Government was pledged, the manner in which it was discharged was not of the last importance. As to the supposition that the amount of pension would exceed the calculations of the committee, Mr. B. stated, that the number of officers was known, and the apprehensions of the gentleman from South Carolina would not be realized.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, replied, and repeated his opinion, that it was understood that the bill would not again be pressed.

Mr. HARRISON said, that whatever pledge others might have given that they would not farther press this claim, he did not subscribe to any such pledge. He considered this bill as treated with great unfairness, and objected to in a spirit which looked like illiberality.

Mr. WOODBURY said in reply to the objections offered by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, that, at a former period, a meeting had been called of the surviving officers of the Revolution, at Baltimore, at which a Committee of Correspondence was appointed, to correspond with individuals in every State in the Union. This correspondence had taken place, and, from the data obtained, the number of those officers had been found to be about two hundred and thirty five—thus, with the knowledge of the number of officers at the close of the Revolution, afforded satisfactory evidence that the number could not essentially vary from this estimate. There could be no large error in this computation. As to any pledge having been given, that this claim should not be urged again, after its rejection, in the form originally proposed, he knew nothing that could be so construed, with the exception of a remark made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN BUREN.] He had stated, that they would withdraw their memorial if the only grant that could be obtained was the insertion of their names on the pension roll. And, as stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, on the other side of the House, the pride of these claimants revolted at the idea of being placed on the list of pensioners as mere paupers, when they considered that they had a claim on the Government under a promise formerly made by Congress. Under these circumstances, a plan had been projected, on a further meeting of the Committee—still retaining the ground of the rights of these memorialists, by which they might be spared from the degrading necessity of taking an oath of their poverty—an act which would have wounded their feelings to no useful purpose; and the Senate could not, he thought, refuse this slight token of regard to the honorable pride of these veterans. The present arrangement would require a sum far less than would have been demanded had these officers been placed on the pension list from the commencement.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, observed, that the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH] seemed to fear that frauds would be committed under this act; and that unworthy objects would reap the benefits of the bill. But this was out of the question, as no individual could be embraced by this measure, who had not been on the commutation roll, and received the commutation. These individuals could easily be ascertained, so that there was no fear of the frauds the gentleman seemed to apprehend.

[Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina said, that he had only supposed that other persons would come in. He did not attribute fraud to any one.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, continued. It amounted to the same thing. No one could by possibility come in, but those for whom the provisions of the bill were intended. He thought the objection, that some of these officers were rich, had no application to the bill. There might be one or two instances of the kind; but what had they to do with the aggregate? As far as his knowledge extended, it was not the case. In Maryland he knew that the officers of the Continental line needed the pension. In that State the Cincinnati met every year, and at those meetings the death of every member was reported—this was the case in every State where there were Cincinnati. So that the numbers of the survivors could easily be ascertained. Where there were none other means could be used to obtain the information required. There could not, therefore, be any difficulty in ascertaining the individuals entitled to the benefits of the bill. He had stated before, that the computation of those who had been in the army three years, at the end of the war, had been correctly made, when the pension list was first agitated in Congress. There was no difficulty in making out the list—but the computation was destroyed afterwards, by introducing those who had served nine months.

Mr. CHANDLER inquired if those who received the commutation were the only class for whom this bill provided. He should like to know why those who served three years, should be preferred to those who served six years, and retired previous to the close of the war. The former lost, by the depreciation of the currency, no more than the latter.

Mr. WOODBURY, in reply, said, that the officers for whom this bill provided, not only lost, in common with all the other officers, the depreciation on their pay, but they also lost the reduction on their half pay. It was so with the soldiers. This bill applied to those only who, having been promised a bounty of eighty dollars, lost not only the depreciation upon their monthly pay, but the depreciation on their bounty.

Mr. VAN BUREN made some remarks, on rising, which the reporter could not hear. He thought there would be no end to the objections which this bill was doomed to meet. It seemed to be argued that there was an impropriety in pressing this claim in its present form. And, on this head, he would say a few words. These officers found their claim upon the commutation of the half pay for life which Congress had promised them. There are other considerations, which it is not now necessary to urge. He then detailed the circumstances under which the memorial of the officers had been brought forward, but in a tone of voice, which was not distinctly heard in the gallery. On proposing to the officers the acceptance of a place on the pension list, they said that all who had been driven by dire necessity to that resort, were there already. The present plan did not propose to give what they or their friends considered them entitled to; but, it afforded some relief to their necessities, and was an approach towards the payment of a debt formed under the most imposing circumstances, and to the payment of which, the memorialists were entitled by the highest and strongest considerations.

Mr. MACON said, that, at first, this claim had been put forth on legal grounds, which were maintained by the first lawyers in the Senate. Now, that ground appeared to have been abandoned, and he supposed the claim was founded on a debt of gratitude. Even granting that such a claim existed, and that, at any other time, it would be proper to grant it—this certainly was not the right period for making any such grants. There never was a time when the distresses of the People were greater. In his part of the country, it was greater than at any previous period, even than during the war. Money was never scarcer than now. He knew we could borrow; but we had not it in the Treasury to spare. Mr. M. also urged that there were other classes of People, who suffered from the ravages of war, and lost all their property. On these grounds he was opposed to this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER expressed himself dissatisfied with the reply which the gentleman from New Hampshire had given to his inquiry. When the officers who had served six years retired, they had lost on their pay. But here was another class, who, after having served a shorter period, and received five years' additional pay, with some depreciation, were to receive full pay for life. He thought it unjust and partial; and it could easily be perceived, that the officers and soldiers, who served six years, would complain. Therefore, while we are about it, why not provide for the whole?

Mr. HARRISON said, that the friends of this bill were assailed on all sides, and in the most contrary manner, by different opponents. Some gentlemen complain that the bill goes too far, while others, like my friend from Maine, reproach us that we do not go far enough. The provisions of this bill are not limited, because we do not think that there are other classes of officers to whom the country owes gratitude, who served a shorter period. But it was the peculiar nature of the claims of these officers which limited the bill to them. It seemed rather unfair, that the advocates of this measure should be assailed at once by complaints for doing too much, and for doing too little. The argument so often used by his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH] that the Government could not pay the whole amount of the depreciation on the pay of the army, was a sufficient reply to the opposite objection of the gentleman from Maine. It had been well said by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER] on a former day, that the Exchequer of the world would not supply the funds to defray the losses to which the gentleman from North Carolina has alluded. But, when that gentleman speaks of the losses of other classes, and the sacrifices of property which individuals suffered, would he compare the losses of these men who shed their blood, and risked their lives in the service, to losses of property? Would he compare the blood of an ox to the blood spilt by these devoted patriots? He hoped not. The bill provides for that class of men who suffered most, and who received a pledge which was never fulfilled.

Mr. WOODBURY replied to the questions put by Mr. MACON. There were none of the officers provided for by this bill who had not served three years. He was very frank to confess another fact, which was, that it had been ascertained that the officers who served the shortest period were those who now resided in the Southern States. If the discrimination was made, it would be in favor of those who resided in the Northern States. The committee had thought that all those who served to the close of the war ought to be provided for, without making distinctions in favor of those who served longer than others.

Mr. HARRISON called for the yeas and nays on the question of filling the blanks, which was sustained.

Mr. COBB said, that, if he understood the object of the present bill, it was to give the full pay of a captain for life, to these officers, and two years' pay as a previous gratuity. I, [said Mr. C.] shall vote against it; and I wish to explain why I shall do so. If this is a grant made upon the ground of a debt, there is no reason why it should not be extended to the legal representatives of those who have died, as well as to the survivors. I ask whether the present bill does not deal partially? Whatever may be said by the friends of the measure, I certainly did understand, that, when this question was settled a month since, by three several votes—the friends of the bill signified the determination of these officers not to accept of pensions. The gentleman from New York informed us, that they would not consent to be placed upon the pension list. Well, sir, it is now said, that they are to receive full pay for life—and will they say that this is not accepting of a pension? that this is not an extension of the pension system? They made the declaration, that these gentlemen were above accepting a pension. But now we find these high minded modest officers of the Revolution, discovering that the bill can pass in no other form, not averse to become pensioners. The features of this bill, [said Mr. C.] appear to me to be more offensive now than formerly: for, if any thing was to be given, it ought to have been given as a donation. The present plan extends the pension principle too far. And as he had been always against donations, viewing them as he did, as unconstitutional, he hoped the Senate would be inclined to consider this matter thoroughly, before they consented to carry the pension list of the country to such an enormous extent. He had perceived that the bill had been skilfully managed. Its advocates had watched the proper opportunity for calling it up; and had been peculiarly careful that the Senate should be full, when it came on for consideration. They had called it up, and laid it down again, as the Senate had been full or empty; and now it is pressed because all the members happen to be present. Still he hoped this measure would not be passed upon without deliberation. He thought that this subject had a farther scope than its mere intrinsic merits would indicate. He thought that the Presidential question was, to a great extent, made to depend on this bill. The friends of the administration advocate it, because the President recommended it in his message—and the members of the opposition are in favor of it, because, should they oppose it, their conduct would be the ground for reproach from their opponents, and would afford an argument against them. This bill was the most extravagant feature of this session, which was by far the most extravagant Senate in which he had ever served. They had given away immense tracts of land—they had given away vast sums of money; and they had enlarged all those powers which were considered by many, as dangerous and unconstitutional. In that part of Georgia in which he lived, but little more than half crops of cotton had been made in the last year, and he had seen a document from one of the commercial cities of the South, by which it would seem that the exports of cotton, of the crop of 1827, would be from 100,000 to 200,000 bales less than those of the year preceding. Is this the time then for extravagant expenditure? Is this the time for spending money? There was no fear that these applicants would come upon the poor list. They were not in so bad a condition as many thousands of those who fought with them, and performed equally meritorious services; but whose claims were forgotten. He felt bound to oppose this bill, as unjust, inexpedient, and a wanton expenditure of the money of the People.

Mr. FOOT merely rose to state the grounds on which he should oppose the filling of the blank as proposed.

Survivors of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

He was a member of the committee on Pensions—and many hard cases had come before them, in which it was proposed to go back in granting pensions—and in one instance only had the Committee consented to go back. And he would ask whether the Senate would adopt a principle which had never been acknowledged, in favor of these officers, which had been refused in many instances where individuals were poor and suffering?

Mr. HARRISON said, he rose to make but a single observation in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia. If there was a scramble upon the floor of the Senate, as that gentleman intimated—if the majority of the Senate were in favor of the bill, he thought it a fair inference that they acted from a knowledge of the wishes of their constituents; it was a fair conclusion, that the majority of the People were in favor of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, he had been induced to take the floor by the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Cobb.] With some of those remarks he had nothing to do, not exactly perceiving their application. If the cotton crops had failed in the South, he much regretted it; and the more so, as he had relatives, and very good friends, engaged in its cultivation; nor did he mean to defend the Senate from the charge of having been extravagant, wild, and wasteful; that duty must devolve on some member who had more agency in the introduction of the measures acted on, than himself. He did not admit that any vote he had given required him to plead guilty; he did not either intend to remark on the suggestion, that this was to be a question to affect the Presidential election, further than to say, that the honorable member from Georgia must allow him to find motives for his own conduct. What were the motives of that gentleman, or whether they had any connexion with the election of President, were subjects for his especial consideration—far be it from him to conjecture. But, for himself, he claimed the privilege to assign his own motive, and that motive was, "a deep conviction of the justice of this claim." He had declared, and still declared, his opinion, that the claim was founded in the established principles of law; and, if the party from whom it was due could be made amenable to the ordinary administration of the law, it would be recovered by its process. In this case, however, the claim is due from the Government who makes the law, administers the law, and decides the law.

The officers have approached you, and properly, with a manly and candid representation of the facts, and claiming what they allege is due to them. Having the sole power to decide, you have said their claim shall not be granted, as matter of right, and now, their friends on this floor have presented this bill, which proposes to give them a small sum in gross, and a small annuity, for the residue of their lives. How is this received? The honorable gentleman from Georgia impeaches their motive—tells you their authorized agents, on this floor, had avowed their intention to abandon all claim, except as founded on principles of law, and their determined unwillingness to occupy a place on the pension list. Sir, said Mr. C., the gentleman has certainly the privilege to clothe his ideas in what words it may best please him; but he could not but think some of the expressions of the honorable gentleman entirely uncalled for by the occasion. Is it not enough that these men have, for a life time, been denied justice? That many of them have been permitted to go off the stage of life neglected and penniless? That their survivors are now obliged to make their continued appeal to your generosity and your justice, in vain asking from you a pittance of your abundance? Must they, also, be made to hear harsh remarks and imputations of sinister and deceptive means to promote their object? Sir, these officers are above the reach of suggestions which would impeach their honor. They have done nothing, in relation to this matter, which is wrong, or which requires apology.

It has always been, and still is the opinion of the officers who are here as the representatives of their compatriots, that they would never consent to come upon your pension list, which they can only do by the humiliating process of swearing themselves unable to subsist without such pension. Is this the case made by the amendment now before you? Not at all. It requires no previous humiliating ceremony, or any preliminary whatever. It is the direct unqualified grant of a gross sum and a subsequent annuity. Less it is true, than the amount due to them—less than, by your own estimate of their claim, they have lost—less than in your adjustment of their accounts you have taken from them. The Government made the officers a proposal to commute their half pay for life for five years full pay, for which certificates were issued to them. These certificates, we all know, were not paid, but were funded at an amount much below their nominal value. All this operation was conducted by the Government. The officers were passive, and obliged to submit to whatever you were pleased to direct, and to receive whatever you were willing to give; and thus by your own acts, the result was a loss to them of the difference between the nominal amount of their certificates, and the actual sum at which they were refunded, and this sum came into your Treasury, and has been disbursed in your service. Now, give them this sum, with interest on it, and they will much prefer it to the advantages of this bill.

As to the suggestion that Senators had committed themselves to abandon the interest of these officers, on any contingency, he had only to say, he had never designed such abandonment, and, while he had breath to expend in their service, he should hold himself bound to raise his voice in advocating what he believed ought to be granted. If he could not get all, he would get as much as he could—now, hereafter, and at all times, and under all the varieties in which this question shall be agitated, he was the determined advocate of these injured and meritorious claimants. It had appeared to him somewhat remarkable, that the adversaries of this bill, although he believed (and he said this under correction) they were all opposed to any and every proposition to extend relief to these officers, have, nevertheless, placed their objections on the forms in which this relief is proposed. In any form, it would be objectionable to these gentlemen. One gentleman says, this is not the proper time. In that opinion he entirely concurred—the proper time had long since gone by—but the present was more proper than any future time, for the very reason, that it was less proper than any past time. Another gentleman had urged, that all who were engaged in the struggle had equal merit, and the representatives of such as were deceased ought to be provided for, as well as survivors. The object of this was apparent; you can't provide for all—your means are not adequate. An attempt to do so must be abortive. Shall you, therefore, refuse to do what you can? Again, it is objected that the ground of legal right is abandoned, and a pension substituted. The tone and temper in which this word pension was used, evidenced the manifest design to present the officers who may accept it, in an odious character—Names will not alter facts. There is nothing in this proposition, the acceptance of which can crimson with a blush the cheek of these veterans—save only the proof it may furnish of the contracted pitiful pretence of justice or liberality which it may boast for the Government. They may blush for us, not for themselves. The sensibilities of the honorable gentleman from Georgia are excited without cause. These officers are not now, at the close of a long life, full of honor and virtue, rich in the regards of their countrymen, and in the consciousness of their own integrity—however destitute of the means of comfortable subsistence—they are not now to be warned against an act which is to strip them of all they have left and make them bankrupt in reputation, as they are in purse. They feel themselves perfectly competent to determine their own course on this occasion; and, if they were to take counsel on the subject, they would probably still feel indisposed to place themselves under the guardianship of the honorable gentleman from Georgia.

Sir, there is nothing in the offer now proposed to them at which they can feel difficulty, except the limited amount granted. The bill assumes that they have great merit; that exact justice in a pecuniary settlement has not been extended to them; that they are poor. These are facts admitted by them, but they do not involve reproach. The sum, in gross, is but a pittance; but, small as it is, it may serve to give decent burial to many. They are daily dropping from the stage of life—some have not left the means of providing the most common necessities for the usual offices at the grave. Here and there one may linger out a few years more—and shall we turn these from our door, to drag along the little remnant of their decrepid old age in poverty and want, or shall we strew the short step, that must presently conduct them to a better world, with some of those comforts which our abundance can spare, and which will blunt the thorns, and smooth the roughness of the path which ends their earthly pilgrimage? Their toils, their blood, have furnished us plenty and happiness: it is but a small return to keep them from actual want. He hoped the proposition of the Committee would prevail.

Mr. COBB said, in reply: the gentleman from Maryland is of opinion that I imputed improper motives to those who are the claimants in this case. In forming such an opinion he is indebted to his own imagination, and not to my expressions. I only stated facts; I conveyed no censure. I repeat, again, that it was declared, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN BUREN] that these officers were not willing to be considered as pensioners, and that, if their claim was not granted, they would withdraw from further solicitations. Now, they are placed in the position of pensioners. If this is all true, it may, or it may not, convey an imputation of improper motives. It is as the gentleman pleases. I stated the facts; I did not impute motives; with the latter I have nothing to do, farther than they may be drawn from the former. The gentleman supposes I have assumed the guardianship of these officers: but I assume no such office. My opinions are these: I do not believe that, in strict equity, there is any thing due to these claimants. I think it is improper to extend the pension system beyond its present limits. I think and I have often so expressed myself, that the Government has no right to give away the public money, and that such donations are unconstitutional, and, consequently, dangerous.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, the honorable gentleman had mistaken him—he made no inferences for the honorable gentleman. He had assumed, that the words used by him, “modest and high-minded officers,” were used ironically, and intended to impute conduct to them the reverse of that which “modest and high-minded officers” should use. He believed the honorable gentleman would not deny the correctness of that assumption. In relation to the unwillingness of the officers to become pensioners, he had thought they ought not to agree to approach the Government in the attitude of mendicants, swearing to their poverty, and asking for the charity, which, by the existing law, is provided in such cases. But this bill proposes a grant to them, not as beggars, but as meritorious claimants on the generosity, if not the equitable justice of the Government.

Mr. WEBSTER then addressed the Senate as follows: It had not been my purpose to take any part in the discussion of this bill. My opinions, in regard to its general object, I hope, are well known, and I had intended to content myself with a steady and persevering vote in its favor. But, when the moment of final decision has come, and the decision is so likely to be nearly equal, I feel it to be a duty to put, not only my own vote, but my own earnest wishes, my fervent entreaties to others, into the doubtful scale.

It must be admitted, sir, that the persons for whose benefit this bill is designed, are, in some respects, peculiarly unfortunate. They are compelled to meet, not only objections to the principle, but, whichever way they turn themselves, embarrassing objections also to details. One friend hesitates at this provision, and another at that; while those who are not friends at all, of course, oppose every thing, and propose nothing. When it was contemplated, heretofore, to give the petitioners an outright sum, in satisfaction of their claim, then the argument was, among other things, that the Treasury could not bear so heavy a draught on its means, at the present moment.

The plan is, accordingly, changed—an annuity is proposed—and then the objection changes also—and it is now said, that this is but granting pensions, and that the pension system has already been carried too far. I confess, sir, I felt wounded—deeply hurt—at the observations of the gentleman from Georgia. So, then, said he, these modest and high-minded gentlemen take a pension at last! How is it possible, that a gentleman of his generosity of character, and general kindness of feeling can indulge in such a tone of triumphant irony towards a few old, grey-headed, poor, and broken warriors of the Revolution! There is, I know, something repulsive and opprobrious in the name of pension. But, God forbid that I should taunt them with it! With grief, heartfelt grief, do I behold the necessity which leads these veterans to accept the bounty of their country, in a manner not the most agreeable to their feelings. Worn out and decrepid, represented before us by those, their former brothers in arms, who totter along our lobbies, or stand leaning on their crutches, I, for one, would most gladly support a measure which would consult at once their services, their years, their necessities, and the delicacy of their sentiments. I would gladly give, with promptitude and grace, with gratitude and delicacy, that which merit has earned, and necessity demands.

Sir, what are the objections which are urged against this bill? Let us look at them, and see if they be real; let us weigh them, to know if they be solid. For, sir, we are not acting on a slight matter. Nor is what we do likely to pass unobserved now, or to be forgotten hereafter. I regard the occasion as one full of interest and full of responsibility. Those individuals, the little remnant of a gallant band, whose days of youth and manhood were spent for their country, in the toils and dangers of the field, are now before us, poor and old, intimating their wants with reluctant delicacy, and asking succour from their country, with decorous solicitude. How we shall treat them, it behooves us well to consider, not only for their sake, but for our own sake also, and for the sake of the honor of the country. Whatever we do, will not be done in a corner. Our constituents will see it—the people will see it—the world will see it.

Let us candidly examine, then, the objections which have been raised to this bill; with a disposition to yield to them, if, from necessity, we must; but to overcome them, if, in fairness, we can.

In the first place, it is said that we ought not to pass this bill, because it will involve us in a charge of unknown extent. We are reminded that, when the general pension law for Revolutionary soldiers passed, an expense was incurred, far beyond what had been contemplated; that the estimate of the number of surviving Revolution-any soldiers proved altogether fallacious; and that, for aught we know, the same mistake may be committed now.

Is this objection well founded? Let me say, in the first place, that, if one measure, right in itself, has gone farther than it was intended to be carried, for want of accurate provisions, and adequate guards, this may furnish a very good reason for supplying such guards and provisions, in another measure, but can afford no ground at all for rejecting such other measure altogether, if it be in itself just and necessary. We should avail ourselves of our experience, it seems to me, to correct what has been found amiss; and not draw from it an undistinguishing resolution to do nothing, merely because it has taught us, that, in something which we have already done, we have acted with too little care. In the next place, does the fact bear out this objection? Is there any difficulty in ascertaining the number of the officers who will be benefited by this bill, and estimating the expense, therefore, which it will create? I think there is none. The records in the Department of War and the Treasury furnish such evidence as that there is no danger of material mistake. The diligence of the Chairman of the Committee has enabled him to lay the facts connected with this part of the case, so fully and minutely before the Senate, that I think no one can feel serious doubt. Indeed, it is admitted by the adversaries of the bill, that this objection does not apply here, with the same force, as in the former pension law. It is admitted that there is a greater facility in this case than in that, in ascertaining the number and names of those who will be entitled to receive that bounty.

This objection, then, is not founded in true principle; and if it were, it is not sustained by the facts. I think we ought not to yield to it, unless, which I know is not the sentiment which pervades the Senate, feeling that the measure ought not to pass, we still prefer, not to place our opposition to it on a distinct and visible ground, but to veil it under vague and general objections.

In the second place, it has been objected, that the operation of the bill will be unequal, because all officers of the same rank will receive equal benefit from it, although they entered the army at different times, and were of different ages. Sir, is not this that sort of inequality which must always exist in every general provision? Is it possible that any law can descend into such particulars?

Would there be any reason why it should do so, if it could? The bill is intended for those, who, being in the army in October, 1780, then received a solemn promise of half pay for life, on condition that they would continue to serve through the war. The ground of merit is, that, whensoever they had joined the army, being thus solicited by their country to remain in it, they at once went for the whole; they fastened their fortunes to the standards which they bore, and resolved to continue their military service until it should terminate, either in their country's success, or their own deaths. This is their merit, and their ground of claim. How long they had been already in service, is immaterial and unimportant. They were then in service; the salvation of their country depended on their continuing in that service. Congress saw this imperative necessity, and earnestly solicited them to remain, and promised the compensation. They saw the necessity, also, and they yielded to it.

But, again, it is said, that the present time is not auspicious. The bill, it is urged, should not pass now. The venerable member from North Carolina says, as I understood him, that he would be almost as willing that the bill should pass, at some other session, as be discussed at this. He speaks of the distresses of the country, at the present moment, and of another bill, now in the Senate, having, as he thinks, the effect of laying new taxes upon the people. He is for postponement. But it appears to me, with entire respect for the Honorable Member, that this is one of the cases least of all fit for postponement.—It is not a measure, that, if omitted this year, may as well be done next. Before next year comes, those who need the relief may be beyond its reach. To postpone, for another year, an annuity to persons already so aged—an annuity, founded on the merit of services which were rendered half a century ago; to postpone, for another whole year, a bill for the relief of deserving men, proposing not aggrandizement, but support; not emolument, but bread—is a mode of disposing of it, in which I cannot concur.

But it is argued, in the next place, that the bill ought not to pass, because those who have spoken in its favor have placed it on different grounds. They have not agreed, it is said, whether it is to be regarded as a matter of right, or matter of gratuity, or bounty. Is there weight in this objection? If some think the grant ought to be made, as an exercise of judicious and well deserved bounty, does it weaken that ground that others think it founded in strict right, and that we cannot make it without manifest and palpable injustice? Or is it strange, that those who feel the legal justice of the claim should address to those who do not feel it, considerations of a different character, but fit to have weight, and which they hope may have weight? Nothing is more plain and natural than the course which this application has taken. The applicants themselves, have placed it on the ground of equity and law. They advert to the resolve of 1780, to the commutation of 1783, and to the mode of funding the certificates. They stand on their contract. This is perfectly natural. On that basis, they can wield the argument themselves. Of what is required by justice and equity, they may reason, even in their own case. But, when the application is placed on different grounds; when personal merit is to be urged, as the foundation of a just and economical bounty; when services are to be mentioned; privations recounted; pains enumerated; and wounds and scars counted; the discussion necessarily devolves to other hands. In all that we have seen from these officers, in the various papers presented by them, it cannot but be obvious to every one, how little is said of personal merit, and how exclusively they confine themselves to what they think their rights under the contract.

I must confess, sir, that principles of equity, which appear to me as plain as the sun, are urged by the memorialists themselves, with great caution and much qualification. They advance their claim of right without extravagance or overstraining; and they submit it to the unimpassioned sense of justice of the Senate.

For myself, I am free to say, that, if it were a case between individual and individual, I think the officers would be entitled to relief in a court of equity. I may be mistaken, but such is my opinion. My reasons are, that I do not think they had a fair option in regard to the commutation of half pay. I do not think it was fairly in their power to accept or reject that offer. The condition they were in, and the situation of the country, compelled them to submit to whatever was proposed. In the next place, it seems to me too evident to be denied, that the five years' full pay was never really and fully made to them. A formal compliance with the terms of the contract, not a real compliance, is, at most, all that was ever done. For these reasons, I think, in an individual case, law and equity would reform the settlement. The conscience of chancery would deal with this case as with other cases of hard bargains; of advantages obtained by means of inequality of situation; of acknowledged debts, compounded from necessity, or compromised without satisfaction. But although such would be my views of this claim, as between man and man, I do not place my vote for this bill on that ground. I see the consequence of admitting the claim, on the foundation of strict right. I see at once, that, on that ground, the heirs of the dead would claim, as well as the living; and that other public creditors, as well as these holders of commutation certificates, would also have wherewith to complain. I know it is altogether impossible to open the accounts of the Revolution, and to think of doing justice to every body. Much of suffering there necessarily was, that can never be paid for—much of loss that can never be repaired. I do not, therefore, for myself, rest my vote on grounds leading to any such consequences. I feel constrained to say, that we cannot do, and ought not to think of doing, every thing, in regard to Revolutionary debts, which might be strictly right, if the whole settlement were now to be gone over anew. The honorable member from New-York [Mr. VAN BUREN] has stated, what I think, the true ground of the bill. I regard it as an act of discreet and careful bounty, drawn forth by meritorious services, and by personal necessities. I cannot agree, in this case, with the technicality of my profession; and because I do not feel able to allow the claim, on the ground of mere right, I am not willing, for that reason, to nonsuit the petitioners, as not having made out their case. Suppose we admit, as I do, that, on the ground of mere right, it would not be safe to allow it; or suppose that to be admitted, for which others contend, that there is, in the case, no strict right, upon which, under any circumstances, the claim could stand; still, it does not follow that there is no reasonable and proper foundation for it, or that it ought not to be granted. If it be not founded on mere right, it is not to be regarded as being, for that reason alone, an undeserved gratuity, or the effusion of mere good will. If that which is granted be not always granted on the ground of mere right, it does not follow that it is granted from merely an arbitrary preference, or a capricious beneficence. In most cases of this sort, mixed considerations prevail, and ought to prevail. Some consideration is due to the claim of right; much to that of merit and service; and more to that of personal necessity. If I knew that all the persons to be benefited by this bill were in circumstances of comfort and competency, I should not support it. But this I know to be otherwise. I cannot dwell, with propriety, or delicacy, on this part of the case; but I feel its force, and I yield to it. A single instance of affluence, or a few cases where want does not tread close on those who are themselves treading close on the borders of the grave, does not affect the general propriety and necessity of the measure. I would not draw this reason for the bill into too much prominence. We all know it exists; and we may, I think, safely act upon it, without so discussing it as to wound, in old, but sensitive, and still throbbing bosoms, feelings which education inspired, the habits of military life cherished, and a just self-respect is still desirous to entertain. I confess I meet this claim, not only with a desire to do something in favor of these officers, but to do it in a manner indicative, not only of decorum, but of deep respect—that respect which years, age, public service, patriotism and broken fortune, command to spring up in every manly breast.

It is, then, sir, a mixed claim of faith and public gratitude; of justice and honorable bounty; of merit and benevolence. It stands on the same foundation as that grant, which no one regrets, of which all are proud, made to the illustrious foreigner who shewed himself so early, and has proved himself so constantly and zealously, a friend to our country.

But then, again, it is objected that the militia have a claim upon us; that they fought at the side of the regular soldiers, and ought to share in the country's remembrance. It is known to be impossible to carry the measure to such an extent as to embrace the militia; and it is plain, too, that the cases are different. This bill, as I have already said, confines itself to those who served, not occasionally, not temporarily, but permanently; who allowed themselves to be counted on as men who were to see the contest through, last as long as it might, and who have made the phrase of 'lasting during the war, a proverbial expression, signifying unalterable devotion to our cause, through good fortune and ill fortune, till it reaches its close. This is a plain distinction; and although, perhaps, I might wish to do more, I see good ground to stop here, for the present, if we must any where. The militia who fought at Concord, at Lexington, and at Bunker's Hill, have been alluded to, in the course of this debate, in terms of well deserved praise. Be assured, sir, there could with difficulty be found a man who drew his sword, or carried his musket, at Concord, at Lexington, or Bunker's Hill, who would wish you to reject this bill. They might ask you to do more, but never to refrain from doing this. Would to God they were assembled here, and had the fate of this bill in their own hands! Would to God the question of its passage was to be put to them! They would affirm it with a unity of acclamation, that would rend the roof of the Capitol.

I support the measure, then, Mr. President, because I think it a proper and judicious exercise of well merited national bounty. I think, too, the general sentiment of my own constituents, and of the country, is in favor of it. I believe the member from North Carolina himself, admitted, that an increasing desire that something should be done for the Revolutionary officers manifested itself in the community. The bill will make no immediate or great draught on the Treasury. It will not derange the finances. If I had supposed that the state of the Treasury would have been urged against the passage of this bill, I should not have voted for the Delaware Breakwater, because that might have been commenced next year; nor for the whole of the sums which have been granted for fortifications; for their advancement, with a little more, or a little less, of rapidity, is not of the first necessity. But the present case is urgent. What we do should be done quickly.

Mr. President, allow me to repeat, that neither the subject, nor the occasion, is an ordinary one. Our own fellow citizens do not so consider it; the world will not so regard it. A few deserving soldiers are before us, who served their country faithfully through a seven years' war. That war was a civil war. It was commented on principle, and sustained by every sacrifice on the great ground of civil liberty. They fought bravely, and bled freely. The cause succeeded, and the country triumphed. But the condition of things did not allow that country, sensible as it was to their services and merits, to do them the full justice which it deserved. It could not entirely fulfil its engagements. The Army was to be disbanded; but it was unpaid. It was to lay down its own power; but there was no government with adequate power to perform what had been promised to it. In this critical moment, what is its conduct? Does it disgrace its high character? Is temptation able to seduce it? Does it speak of righting itself? Does it undertake to redress its own wrongs, by its own sword? Does it lose its patriotism in its deep sense of injury and injustice? Does military ambition cause its integrity to swerve? Far, far otherwise.

It had faithfully served, and saved the country, and to that country it now referred, with unhesitating confidence, its claim and its complaints. It laid down its arms with alacrity; it mingled itself with the mass of the community; and it waited till, in better times, and under a new Government, its services might be rewarded, and the promises made to it fulfilled. Sir, this example is worth more, far more, to the cause of civil liberty, than this bill will cost us. We can hardly recur to it too often, or dwell on it too much, for the honor of our country, and of its defenders. Allow me to say again, that meritorious service in civil war is worthy of peculiar consideration; not only because there is in such war usually less power to restrain irregularities, but because, also, they expose all prominent actors in them to different kinds of danger. It is rebellion, as well as war. Those who engage in it must look not only to the dangers of the field, but to confiscation, also, and attainer, and ignominious death. With no efficient and settled Government, either to sustain or control them, and with every sort of danger before them, it is great merit to have conducted with fidelity to the country, under every discouragement on the one hand, and with unconquerable bravery towards the common enemy, on the other. So, sir, the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army did conduct.

I would not, and do not, underrate the services or the sufferings of others. I know well that, in the Revolutionary contest, all made sacrifices, and all endured sufferings; as well those who paid for service, as those who performed it. I know that in the records of all the little municipalities of New England, abundant proof exists of the zeal with which the cause was espoused, and the sacrifices with which it was cheerfully maintained. I have often there read, with absolute astonishment, the taxes, the contributions, the heavy subscriptions, often provided for by disposing of the absolute necessities of life, by which enlistments were procured, and food and clothing furnished. It would be, sir, to these same municipalities, to these same little patriotic councils of Revolutionary times, that I should now look with most assured confidence for a hearty support of what this bill proposes. There the scale of Revolutionary merit stands high. There are still those living who speak of the 19th of April, and the 17th of June, without thinking it necessary to add the year. These men, one and all, would rejoice to find that those who stood by the country bravely, through the doubtful and perilous struggle which conducted it to independence and glory, had not been forgotten in the decline and close of life.

The objects, then, sir, of the proposed bounty are most worthy and deserving objects. The services which they rendered were in the highest degree useful and important. The country to which they rendered them is great and prosperous. They have lived to see it glorious; let them not live to see it unkind. For me, I can give them but my vote, and my prayers; and I give them both with my whole heart.

Mr. FOOT observed, that this bill, from the commencement of its discussion at an early period of the session, until the present moment, had been before the Senate, under peculiar circumstances; and, to him, extremely embarrassing; held fast by the Chairman of the committee, and strongly fortified against amendments, by motions merely to fill the blanks. The original bill embraced a certain portion of the officers only, to whom half pay for life had been promised; but, on their own application, this half pay had been commuted for full pay for five years; and it was contended that the United States were under a legal obligation to make further provision for these officers. Mr. F. said, he had voted against filling the blank in the original bill, with every sum which had been proposed; and should have voted against even the smallest sum, for the exclusive benefit of these officers. He never could consent to degrade the soldiers of the Revolutionary Army, by elevating the officers: They were not mere mercenary hirelings, like the soldiers of ordinary standing armies. Many of these soldiers were of the best blood of the country—equal to the officers—and fighting side by side for their dearest rights. It was a common cause—and one spirit pervaded the whole. The officer was most fortunate: he had a commission, and could at any time resign and leave the army. And, sir, we all know the origin of the half pay, and the commutation for five years' full pay. The soldier could not resign; he could not compel Congress to increase his pay, by threats to resign and disband the army. These officers were as well paid on their first contract for service as the soldier—which indeed was poor enough. But the soldier was compelled to serve out his enlistment upon the terms of his contract. How is the case with the officer? Was not half pay offered for life, to prevent resignation? And this commuted, at their request, for five years' full pay, amounting to twice the original sum contracted for their services? And does this form a ground for this claim for additional compensation? Mr. F. declared that he never should vote for any additional compensation to the officers alone, but would assure the Chairman he was ready to go with him in making any suitable provisions for these Revolutionary heroes, which would do equal justice to the soldier as well as the officer.

The bill has now assumed a new shape, but is still held upon a motion to fill a blank. The Chairman informed us some time since, "that at a proper time the bill would be open for amendments." This time, it appears, has not yet arrived. But we are told by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. HARRISON,] we may now amend the bill; and the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who has just taken his seat, has cast some imputations upon those who have opposed this bill, to which they are not justly liable. He says, "we have opposed, but have not proposed, any amendments." Sir, the gentleman must certainly be aware that no opportunity has been offered for a single amendment. If the time shall ever arrive when we can offer amendments, the Senators will find us not so had hearted, ungrateful, and unkind. Mr. F. did not believe there was a Senator on this floor, nor a single individual in the country, who would be unwilling to make full compensation to all the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army, if it was in the power of Government to do equal justice to all. But, for one, he never would consent to give additional compensation to those only who had already received more pay, more credit, and more favors than those equally meritorious. If they were really poor, the present pension law provides for their support. He never believed in the legality of the claims of these officers, and this seemed now to be abandoned by the committee.

The Senator from Massachusetts has very justly said, if it be a legal claim, it will extend to the legal representatives of deceased officers. The amendment now offered as a substitute for the original bill, embraces a certain portion of the soldiers; and, with some amendments which will be offered to this amendment, embracing officers and soldiers with legal claims, Mr. F. said he would cheerfully vote for the bill, but not in the present shape, confined to those officers and soldiers only who had already received additional compensation, and more pay than those who, in the darkest period, had fought the battles which led to the successful termination of the contest. It must embrace all, and do equal justice to all, before it would receive his support.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, replied to some of the remarks of Mr. WEBSTER. He considered that these claims could not be established in a court of equity, and remarked, that the panegyric bestowed by the gentleman from Massachusetts on the conduct of the officers at the close of the war, was not entirely deserved, as there had been, to a certain extent, a revolt among them, which nothing but the presence and influence of Washington had overcome. Besides, he maintained that the officers could not better themselves by any course of violence. There was nothing left of which they could possess themselves, the country having been ravaged, and the property of the citizens having been destroyed. He repeated what he had said in relation to an individual among the claimants who was worth a large fortune.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that there were but twelve of these officers who were residents in Maryland, yet, were he to vote against this bill, he might be certain of never being returned to Congress again. His constituents were in favor of it. They were desirous that something should be done to smooth the way to the grave of these veteran servants of the country. There might be one gentleman in South Carolina who was possessed of a fortune, but this was no reason why the other claimants should be neglected, nor did it alter the justice of the claim. There was not one of these officers who resided in Maryland that was possessed of property. There was, formerly, one rich officer in Maryland, who had lately died. But he would not have received this annuity had he been living. I say this annuity, because it is not, as it has been denominated, a pension.

Mr. WHITE said, that if this was solely an equitable claim, the legal representatives of deceased officers had an equal right to claim the provision, as the surviving officers. For this reason he had not voted against the bill in its former shape. It was now placed in a position in which he could conscientiously record his vote in its favor. He should, therefore, state, as concisely as possible, the grounds on which his vote would be given. He considered this was a gratuity to the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, in consideration, that a promise made to them by the Government had not been complied with as far as was intended. If this was intended as a gratuity, it did not extend to the legal representatives of the deceased. But, sir, said Mr. W., I see in existence the men who have rendered these services to their country. I see them in want, and I cannot refuse to succor them. They have conferred benefits upon the country, upon which we cannot place too high an estimate. Those services have not been compensated according to a former promise of the Government. This compact has been fulfilled in form, but not in substance. Others may have served the country with equal fidelity and zeal, but not having the promise which these men had, their claims are placed on other and weaker grounds. They cannot have an equal claim with these officers. I have always considered, said Mr. W., that the victories achieved by these men over the enemy, were not their greatest victories. The greatest of their triumphs was that which they achieved over themselves, their wants, and interests, when, at the close of the war, they delivered up their arms, and retired to the private walks of life, trusting in the justice of their countrymen, and fully believing, that, when the time arrived, they would receive the compensation pledged to them by the Government. That time has arrived. We are now able to render this tribute of justice. And if it were the last dollar in the Treasury, I would give it for this purpose. This opinion is, I think, founded on principle. It may be said that I am actuated by feeling; but, if so, it is a feeling which I think I ought to entertain. As to any other motives, I do not entertain them. I came here dressed in no man's livery; but as the Representative of a sovereign State, to act according to my conscience and the will of my constituents alone. Any imputation to the contrary I cannot admit, as I should feel myself degraded by allowing myself to act on other grounds; and I should think it beneath me, to look upon the decisions of Senators as arising from any other views.

Mr. BRANCH then explained his reasons for opposing the bill.

Some further conversation took place between Messrs. BRANCH, SMITH, of S. C., and SMITH, of Md.

Mr. MACON made a few remarks, as was understood, in reply to Messrs. CHANDLER and WEBSTER.

Mr. BELL moved to fill the blanks in the bill with "3d March, 1828," and spoke briefly in opposition to carrying the pensions of the claimants back.

The CHAIR stated that the question must be first taken on the motion to fill the blanks with "3d March, 1826."

Mr. MACON spoke in reply to the remarks of Mr. WEBSTER; when, the question being put on filling the blanks with "3d March, 1826," it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the 3d section, so as to confine the operation of this bill to soldiers and non-commissioned officers who had served three years, or during the war, and had been honorably discharged.

Mr. MACON moved to lay the bill upon the table, which was negatived, 22 to 20.

Mr. CHANDLER explained the object of his motion, and asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. WOODBURY made a few remarks, when the question being put, Mr. CHANDLER's amendment was adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER then moved to amend the bill by adding a proviso, that no officer or soldier on the Pension List shall be entitled to the benefits of this bill. Adopted.

Mr. WOODBURY offered a proviso to the third section, that no officer, under this bill, shall be entitled to receive a larger sum than full pay of a Captain of the Line. Adopted.

Several other amendments were adopted.

Mr. BELL then moved to amend, by striking out the words "full pay," and inserting instead, "half pay;" on which, the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken, and decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the bill was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed as amended.

On motion of Mr. BARNARD, it was ordered, that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to Monday next.

MONDAY, APRIL 28, 1828.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS..

The resolution submitted on Friday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, authorizing the appointment of a committee to meet a committee on the part of the House to fix upon a period at which Congress shall adjourn, was taken up.

Mr. McKINLEY moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was negatived—22 to 13.

The question being on agreeing to the resolution, it was supported by Messrs. FOOT and JOHNSON, of Ky.

Mr. NOBLE then moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. MACON moved to appoint a Committee to meet the Committee appointed by the House under the resolution of the House to fix the period of adjournment, and to select the business to be acted on; which was agreed to—20 to 17.

SURVIVORS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The bill for the relief of certain Revolutionary officers and soldiers was again taken up; and, having been further amended, on motion of Mr. WOODBURY, the question occurred on striking out, and inserting the amendment offered by the committee, as amended; which was agreed to without a division.

The bill having been reported to the Senate, Mr. WOODBURY moved to strike out the amendment of Mr. CHANDLER, inserting the words, "for three years, or during the war," and to restore the words of the original bill.

Mr. WOODBURY explained his views in offering the motion. The bill was confined to those officers who served to the close of the war—and ought to be confined to the same class of soldiers. A bill had been introduced in the other House which provided for the class of men pointed out by the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CHANDLER said he now perceived what he had not perceived before, that this bill was to be carried through on the principle which was rejected by the Senate formerly, that there was a debt due to these soldiers. He thought the distinction an unfair one between these and other classes of soldiers.

Mr. WOODBURY said; that this distinction was made by the Congress of 1784, which this bill was merely following up.

Mr. BERRIEN made a few remarks in support of Mr. WOODBURY's motion: urging the claim of the officers and soldiers included in the original bill, as founded on a contract which the Government was bound to fulfil.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the yeas and nays were ordered upon the motion.

Mr. CHAMBERS stated the grounds on which he should vote for the proposition to amend.

Mr. CHANDLER replied to some remarks of Mr. CHAMBERS—and after a few observations from Mr. HARRISON, the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. COBB offered to amend the bill, by an additional section, providing for the payment of a sum equal to four years' full pay of a Captain to the representatives of each of the deceased officers. The motion was briefly explained by Mr. C., and, after having been opposed by Messrs. WOODBURY, CHANDLER, and BERRIEN, and supported by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, the yeas and nays being ordered, on motion of Mr. COBB, the question was taken, and decided in the negative.

Mr. COBB then moved to amend the bill, by the insertion of a section providing for the payment of a sum not exceeding four years' full pay of a Captain to the legal representatives of such of the officers of the Revolution, entitled to half-pay under the resolution of 1784, as have died since the year 1810.

This motion was briefly supported by Messrs. COBB and BERRIEN, and opposed by Mr. WOODBURY, when the question being taken by yeas and nays, it was negative.

The question then occurred on striking out the original bill, and inserting the substitute agreed to in Committee of the whole, as amended.

Mr. CHANDLER moved the division of the question, which, having been agreed to, the motion to strike out was agreed to; and on inserting, the yeas and nays being ordered on motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Bateman, Berrien, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Harrison, Hayne, Johnson, of Ken. Johnston, of Lou. Kane, King, Marks, Parria, Robbins, Rowan, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md. Thomas, Van Buren, Webster, White, Willey, Woodbury.—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Ellis, Foot, Hendricks, McKinley, Macon, Ridgely, Ruggles, Smith, of S. C. Tazewell, Tyler, Williams.—17.

The question on engrossing being then put; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Bateman, Bell, Berrien, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Harrison, Hayne, Johnson, of Ken. Johnston, of Lou. Kane, King, Knight, Marks, Parria, Robbins, Rowan, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md. Thomas, Van Buren, Webster, White, Willey, Woodbury.—30.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Ellis, Foot, Hendricks, McKinley, Macon, Noble, Ridgely, Ruggles, Smith, of S. C. Tazewell, Tyler, Williams.—17.

TUESDAY, APRIL 29, 1828.

[Nearly the whole of this day's sitting was occupied in the discussion of the Indian appropriation bill, and the bill for the relief of T. L. Winthrop and others, Directors of the Mississippi Land Company; the former of which was ordered to a third reading.]

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1828.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the committee appointed to join a committee from the other House for the purpose of fixing upon a time for the adjournment of the two Houses, reported the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses on Monday, the 26th May next.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee of Manufactures, to which was referred the bill in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports, reported the same, with sundry amendments.

Mr. DICKERSON also laid on the table a comparative statement of the duties under the bill altering the several acts imposing duties on imports, and the present rate of duties.

The amendments and statement were then ordered to be printed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. MARKS, the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road (to erect turnpike gates on the road) was taken up, and the amendments reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals having been agreed to, it was explained by Mr. MARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, supported the bill, and read a letter from the Postmaster General, enclosing a letter from a mail contractor, detailing the bad state of repair of some sections of the road.

Mr. MARKS further supported the bill, and argued that the road would be ruined if suffered long to remain in its present condition. It would be little better than to allow the road to return to its wilderness state, to neglect repairing it through another Winter like the last. There were three courses that might be taken. The United States could make appropriations for the repair of the road; they could erect toll gates; or to turn over the whole matter to the States in which the road lies. If the latter course were pursued, there was no certainty that the States would undertake to keep the road in repair, as they looked upon the road, having been made by the General Government, as a work of a national character, and Congress as bound to provide for its repairs. The question before the Senate was, whether Congress should allow a work which had cost two millions of dollars, to fall into decay for want of repair, or would take measures to perpetuate the benefits of the road. It was true, that the work done last year was becoming dilapidated, and going to ruin, while they were going on with the other parts of the work. There was no gentleman present, he believed, who would not be convinced of the necessity of doing something to prevent the road from going to destruction. He knew that it had been argued that Congress had not the power to do this; but, he considered, that, as it had been decided by repeated votes, that Congress had the right to make the road, it could hardly be maintained that Congress had not the right to repair it.

Mr. BRANCH objected that the Senate had no power to originate a bill for the levying of taxes.

Mr. MARKS replied, that it was not the design of the bill to bring any thing into the public coffers, as all the money collected from tolls would be expended in repairs upon the road.

[MAY 1, 1828.]

Mr. BENTON objected to the late period at which this bill had been taken up. He said he held in his hand a set of resolutions, which he thought would meet the views of the friends of the bill. He, therefore, moved to lay the bill upon the table until to-morrow, when his resolutions would come up for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON objected to the resolutions, and considered that the tendency of their introduction would be to retard the bill, and probably to postpone it until next session.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he wished this bill tried on its merits; because, if it was rejected, the Senate would virtually say that they would vote money for the repair of the road. He had no choice as to the manner in which the object was effected. One way or another the road would doubtless be repaired, as it could not be supposed that they would allow all the expense which the road had cost to be lost for want of repair.

Mr. MACON thought the Senate was going rather too fast. He rose to ask the President whether it was competent to the Senate to frame and act upon a bill of this kind; whether it was not a bill which ought to originate in the other House?

The CHAIR observed that it was a question of great magnitude; he should be desirous of referring the decision of the question to the Senate. Whether the Senate had the power to frame such a bill, under the Constitution, was a point of some doubt and much importance.

Mr. KING said he doubted whether the President was competent to decide the question, as it was a constitutional point, and not a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT said he was by no means covetous of the duty of deciding.

Mr. HENDRICKS expressed a wish that the bill might not be postponed, and that it might be disposed of without a constitutional argument. The constitutional question had often been decided by the Senate, and he thought its agitation would be useless now.

The PRESIDENT said he would be governed by the Senate. The reason why the Chair had supposed that the question came under the rules of order, was, that those rules regulated the practice of the body. The article of the Constitution to which it referred, established that certain bills could not be framed in the Senate, and hence the Chair was of opinion, that a question as to the power given in this respect, would come under the regulation of the business of the Senate. He might be in error, but such was his impression.

Mr. BRANCH moved to lay the bill upon the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. HARRISON who made a few remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT again rose, and stated that the question presented a new point of order. It appeared to him that the decision would not turn upon the constitutionality of the bill, but upon the practice of the Senate. He wished the Senators to consider the question.

The motion being renewed by Mr. BRANCH, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT then gave notice, that, when the bill should come up, as it presented a new point, and as the constitutional question was one of great magnitude, he would submit to the Senate whether or not it came within the rules of order.

THURSDAY, MAY 1, 1828.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The resolution reported yesterday by Mr. BERRIEN, from a committee appointed to join a committee from the other House, for the purpose of fixing upon a time for the adjournment of the two Houses, (recommending the 26th May,) was taken up.

Mr. BERRIEN stated, that it was believed by the committee that all the business before the two Houses might be transacted previous to the 26th May. It was also the opinion that the business would be more promptly acted upon, if the time were fixed at which the session should be brought to a close.

Mr. RUGGLES opposed the resolution. There were many important bills in both Houses yet to be acted upon, which would probably be passed over, if the time for adjournment were now fixed upon. He had formerly seen the bad effect of fixing a day for adjournment. Bills were generally passed upon in a hurried manner, or were deferred to the next session. He was as anxious to adjourn early as any gentleman could be; and should be willing to do it as soon as the business of the session was closed. Before that time he did not believe the People were desirous that Congress should close their labors. He moved to postpone the resolution until Wednesday next.

Mr. BRANCH opposed the motion, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. NOBLE said, he believed there was a bill now before the Senate which would take up nearly all the time between this and the 26th of May. Gentlemen must speak upon it; and they would go on from day to day, and from week to week. Well, he had no objection to it. When the question was taken, he would vote upon the bill, and he would do it openly and above board. He should not endeavor to conceal his opinions. He was astonished that his friend from North Carolina should oppose the delay, when his Ocracock project, which had been a long time before the Senate, was not yet decided, which was to let the People of North Carolina out to the ocean. They say they are ground to the dust, and are in a suffering condition, and yet Congress was to adjourn before they were relieved, and their Ocracock channel cut out. What, he would ask, was to become of the Muscle Shoals? He presumed they were to hang upon the willows. And what was to become of his [Mr. N.'s] road in Indiana, if a sudden adjournment took place? He, for one, did not wish to be exposed to the editorial remarks, and the newspaper paragraphs, which this resolution, if passed, would give rise to. It would be said, that the moment this Tariff bill came up from the other House, this resolution for an adjournment was presented; and that it was done to prevent the passage of the bill, while some long winded member spun out the session to its close.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky., called Mr. NOBLE to order. He thought the gentleman's language indecorous. I will not, said Mr. J., sit in my seat, and hear the gentleman from Indiana speak of Senators as long winded. It is not fit language to be used here. I, for myself, will not be denounced as speaking to delay the business of the Senate.

Mr. NOBLE requested the gentleman to reduce the words to writing at which he had taken offence.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, then sent to the President, who stated the expressions objected to by the Senator from Kentucky, were, "denouncing Senators as long winded, endeavoring to prevent the business of the Senate, and attempting to speak down the Tariff and other bills."

The CHAIR said, he would decide on the question of order, unless the gentleman from Indiana objected to the correctness of the words.

Mr. NOBLE said, he did object to the correctness of the words. If he was allowed to speak, he would state, that he had spoken only of the effects of passing the resolution, and the manner in which it would go forth to the People through the newspapers. He had referred to no Senator, and had accused no one of making long winded speeches, but had only supposed what would be said in relation to the measure.

Cumberland Road.

[SENATE.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, he would withdraw his motion to call to order, and was happy that he had misunderstood the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIR said, that he did not understand the Senator from Indiana in the sense in which his remarks were taken by the Senator from Kentucky. He understood those remarks as applying to the effect of the resolution, and not as directed to Senators.

Mr. NOBLE further explained. He supposed that the editors and political parties might make use of the defeat of the Tariff bill, should it not pass, to say that the long winded speeches had put down the Tariff.

Mr. BRANCH made a few remarks.

Mr. DICKERSON expressed a belief that the business could be transacted before the 26th of May. He did not think, however, that the resolution need be acted upon for a few days.

The question was then taken on postponing to Wednesday next, and was decided in the affirmative.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The following resolutions, submitted yesterday by Mr. BENTON, were considered :

"Resolved, That no right of soil or of jurisdiction over the ground on which the Cumberland Road runs, was acquired by the United States, by the acts of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, granting their consent to the making of said road.

"Resolved, That it is not expedient for the United States to exercise a permanent superintending care over the repair and preservation of the roads made by it within the limits of the different States.

"Resolved, That the repair and preservation of the Cumberland Road, and of all other roads made, or to be made, under the authority of the United States, be left to the States through which the same may pass."

The resolutions having been read :

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, suggested to the mover (Mr. BAXTON) that the resolutions being of an abstract character, and not likely to lead to any practical results, and the session being now far advanced, it was better to postpone their consideration, and proceed with the bill for erecting toll gates on the road to which the resolutions referred.

Mr. BENTON answered, that the resolutions were not of an abstract character; that they were intended to settle great questions—questions which had agitated Congress for seven years, and were again to agitate it in the discussion of the bill, to which the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] had called his attention. These questions ought to be settled, and no vote which Congress could give upon the bill would settle them. The experience of seven years proved the truth of this assertion. At the same time it was due to the States through which the road passes, it was due to the United States, it was due to the Congress itself, to settle the questions which his resolutions presented. The end and object of them was to fix upon the authority which was to be charged with the care, repair, and preservation of this road. This was a very different question from the question of making the road, and the sooner it was known whose business it was to take care of the road, the better for all parties concerned; for while the States were waiting for Congress to do it, and Congress was waiting for the States, or the people of the vicinage to do it, the road itself was going to ruin; and injuries upon which a few days work timely applied, or a few dollars timely expended, would have checked and prevented, afterwards required, as our statute book would prove, some thirty thousand dollars to repair. He could not, therefore, consistently with his sense of duty to the public, yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] plausible as that suggestion seemed to be, respectable as the source was from which it came, and anxious as he was to give renewed evidences of his respect for the gentleman who made it, by publicly deferring to his wishes.

Mr. B. then went into an argument of great length and research in support of his resolutions, the intrinsic interest of which might deserve an ample report, but of which nothing but the general outline and essential substance, can here be attempted.

He sat out with giving something like his creed on the road, making power of the Federal Government. He was in favor of the exercise of the power—with some qualifications which he would mention, but he could not give that proof of his adhesion to the cause which the ultras of the party seemed to demand, namely, a blind and fanatical support of every bill, no matter how got up, or how got in, which had the word "road" or "canal" in it. He was in favor of the federal power to make roads and canals of national importance, such as where designated by Mr. Gallatin in his report of 1807, and such as he (Mr. B.) himself had specified in a proposed amendment to the survey bill of 1824, and which did not exceed eight or ten in number, and were so eminently national as to preclude all dispute, or difference of opinion, upon the point. He was in favor of the construction of such roads and canals by the Federal Government; provided the States through which they would pass, assented to it, as Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, assented to the construction of the Cumberland road within their limits, by legislative acts in the years 1806—7; not that he entertained any opinion that the assent of a State could confer a power upon Congress, not derived from the Constitution; but because it was decent and becoming to consult the wishes of the State in all such cases, because its assent would do away all that class of objections to the exercise of this power, which were founded upon a real or supposed violation of State sovereignty, and a real or supposed violation of State territory.

Having finished what he called his creed, Mr. B. gave a history of his first acquaintance with the gate bill, which was now again before the Senate, and of his first vote upon it. This acquaintance was made in the session of 1821—2, being the first session of his service in the Senate. The bill came up from the House of Representatives, and went through the Senate with little or no discussion. All, or almost all, seemed to be for it. Neither constitutional barriers, nor objections of inconvenience or inexpediency, rose up to impede or arrest its progress. Many such barriers and objections rose up in his (Mr. B's) mind; but he recollected that he was the youngest Senator from the youngest State in the Union; that he had just got in after a hard struggle to keep him out; and he considered it neither decent nor becoming in him, thus fresh from the prairies of Missouri, to harangue the conscript fathers of the republic upon constitutional law. So he said nothing. Others said but little. The bill was put to the vote. The vote was taken by yeas and nays. He found himself to be the first to say nay, and among the few to say nay; for when the result was announced, only seven votes were found in the negative; but that seven comprehended the voices of MACON, of North Carolina, SMITH and GAILLARD, of South Carolina, and WALKER, of Alabama; a gentleman, unhappily too short a time a member of this body, too short a time a tenant of this life, to permit his moral and intellectual worth to be known to the world as they were known to his intimate acquaintances and affectionate friends.* The bill floated through the Senate, as it had done through the House of Representatives, upon the swelling tide of an overwhelming majority, and went up to the President, Mr. Monroe, to receive the final touch in the impress of his approbation. But here it was destined to receive its first check, and, as it turned out, its death blow. Instead of the President's approval, it received his veto—was returned to the House in which it had originated with his objections annexed; and, on reconsideration, fell to the ground; receiving, on this second trial not even a simple majority of the votes, instead of the majority of two thirds, which the emergency required. So much, said Mr. B. for my first acquaintance with this Gate bill, and first vote upon it; a piece of history rather personal for the occasion, but excusable in times when every man that failed to vote for every bill that had the word "road" or "canal" in it was denounced for "an unprincipled and factious opposition to the present administration."

Mr. B. then adverted to the early period at which the Gate bill, now before the Senate, had been brought in, the long time it had lain on the table, and the suddenness of its resurrection in the forenoon of yesterday. It had been brought in at the very commencement of the session, had lain on the table an hundred days—about as long as Napoleon reigned the second time in France, and called up at a time when he was looking for a different subject. While it was reading he had to consider and determine in what form to oppose it; and the result of his deliberations was, the submission of the resolutions now on the table. It seemed to him, that to reject the bill would settle nothing; to pass it would settle nothing; either vote would be the decision of an individual case, depending upon its own circumstances, and any number of bills could be brought in afterwards, depending upon new circumstances, and not coming within all the facts and reasons of the prior decision. A set of declaratory resolutions, covering the whole ground of such bills, seemed to him to present the only means of obtaining such a decision as the occasion required; he had accordingly drawn up the resolutions now under consideration, and made a motion strictly parliamentary though it seemed to be heard with surprise in some parts of the chamber—a motion to postpone the consideration of the bill for one day, in order to consider and decide upon the resolutions. The resolutions were not abstract, as they had been called; but were as practical as the bill itself, and more so, for they would have more general and more decisive results; they were not intended to defeat the bill by postponement, nor could they have that effect; for the debate on the resolutions would be the debate on the bill, and the decision of the resolutions would be the decision of the bill. He could not be blamed for bringing them in at a late period of the session, for he had brought them in the first day that the Gate bill, the passage of which they were intended to prevent, had been taken up for discussion.

Mr. B. then took up his resolutions, and examined and supported them, one by one.

The first resolution asserted,

"That no right of soil or jurisdiction over the ground on which the Cumberland road runs, was acquired by the United States, by the acts of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, granting their consent to the making of said road."

The decision of this resolution in the affirmative would cut up the Gate bill by the roots; for these gates could not be erected without a right to the soil on which they were to be placed; and laws could not be made for their protection, and for the collection of toll, without a right of jurisdiction over the soil as well as a right to the soil itself. On the other hand, the decision of this resolution in the negative would admit the right of the federal government, as owning the soil and jurisdiction, to erect the gates, to appoint keepers, to enact a code of civil and criminal law for the collection of tolls, and punishment of offenders, or to provide for the preservation of the road in any way they pleased, by ordering the neighbors to work upon it, or levying a county tax for keeping it in order.

At this part of his speech, Mr. B. went into an argument of constitutional law, of which the heads and main points were as follows:

1. That a right of soil within the limits of the State, would only be acquired by the United States by cession from the State, and then for the limited purpose of erecting forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, other needful buildings, and for the permanent seat of government for the Union, as specified in the federal constitution.

2. That no right of jurisdiction could be acquired even over ground ceded for such purposes, except by an express act of the State Legislature.

3. That the acts of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland, granting their assent to the construction of the Cumberland road, were limited to the expression of that assent, and did not in point of fact, and could not in point of constitutional power, confer any right of soil or of jurisdiction upon the government of the United States. They only waived the trespass, real or supposed, which might be committed in making the road without such assent.

4. That the act of making the road conferred no such rights. It was made upon contract, by the United States, and for hire, and for the use of the new States in the North West. These new States stipulated for it in their compacts, and paid a most unconscionable price for it, in a partial surrender of their sovereignty, and in their agreement not to tax the lands of the United States, nor to interfere with their primary disposition. The road when made was no more the property of the United States, than a pair of boots made to order, paid for, and delivered, is the property of the maker. Title to another's property cannot be acquired by making an improvement upon it. Lawyers know this from their books; men of common sense know it from their reason; and if it were not so, the Federal Government might take all the soil and jurisdiction of the States; and the rich might take all the lands of the poor. If there is consent to the improvement, the consent is limited to its object, and cannot be extended by construction to a fee simple conveyance of the land itself.

5. The entire soil and jurisdiction of a State might be usurped by the Federal Government under the power to make roads without its consent, and afterwards to take to itself the right of soil and jurisdiction over the road so made. It had only to multiply the number of its roads, and to increase their breadth, in order to cover the entire superficies of the State, and reduce it to the political condition of the District of Columbia.

6. The jurisdiction claimed for the United States over the roads made by it, must be either concurrent with that of the State or exclusive. To be concurrent, would be to subject the people to a double set of contradictory laws and penalties; and to be exclusive, would be to oust the State of all right to take cognizance of any offence arising upon the road.

7. The negative of this resolution, and the passage of the Gate Bill, would be to subject every individual who could be involved in any quarrel, or supposed offence about the gates, any affray with the gate keepers, or charged with any violation or evasion of the gate regulations, or non-payment of toll, to be seized by the Federal Marshal, conducted to the Federal District Court, and thence have his case sent, by way of appeal, to the Supreme Court at Washington City, to abide the decision of the Federal Judges upon his property, life, and liberty. Further, it would subject any citizen that chanced to get into an affray with a drunken gate-keeper, to be hung up, like a dog, for high treason against the United States. As thus: The federal constitution makes it high treason to levy war against the United States; the judges who administer the constitution, say that to resist a statute of Congress is to levy war against the United States within the meaning of the constitution; that the quantum of force employed in the resistance neither diminishes nor increases the crime; and that any forcible opposition to such a statute, constitutes the offence. (Decision of the Federal Judges in the cases of the Western insurrection. 2 Dallas, 4 Cranch's reports. Ingersoll's abridgment of the laws of the United States, title, Penal laws, note.) The people have no conception of this. They think that, to levy war requires an army—"an army with banners," terrible to behold, dreadful to encounter, arrayed against the sovereign power of a country, and able to overturn that power, or to shake it to its foundations. But under the decision of the federal Judges a citizen who should chastise with his fist a drunken federal gate keeper for his insolence in the collection of toll, might be convicted of levying war against the United States within the meaning of the constitution, and hung as a traitor, unless public sentiment forced the President to pardon him, as it did to pardon the citizens condemned by the federal Judges about thirty years ago.

Passing from the constitutional and legal questions, Mr. B. next examined the practical effect of these toll gates upon the commerce of a State; and he here indulged for a while in a favorite topic, namely, the difference between mere book learning, and a knowledge of the people and their affairs. He considered it much more necessary for a lawyer to be acquainted with the living people of his own country, and their daily affairs, than to know the names and histories of the old Greeks and Romans, who had been dead two thousand years. This brought him to the declaration that he had learnt more from a wagoner at Hagerstown, about the expediency of setting up these gates, than all the bookworms in or out of Congress could teach him in their lives. What he had learnt from the wagoner was this: that it took sixteen dollars to pay the tolls upon a six horse wagon, going and returning upon that part of this road which is now subject to toll—the part between Baltimore and old Fort Cumberland—about one-third of the distance to Zanesville, where the road now terminates. This was the information. The use he made of it was this: that as the tolls of one-third of the road was sixteen dollars, so the tolls for the whole distance would be forty-eight dollars; and when this sum came to be added to the other inevitable expenses of horse-feed and horse-shoeing, ferrriages, diet, lodging and drink for the wagoner, there would be nothing left out of the sale of a load of flour, and not much left out of a load of whiskey, pork, or tobacco, for the farmer or merchant who sent it to market. The fact was, the commerce of the country could not stand the payment of the tolls contemplated in this bill, moderate and reasonable as they were intended to be. But there was another point of view in which to look at this subject; it was the abuse to which it was liable, and the ruin which might be inflicted upon the commerce of a State, within its limits, by the exercise of this toll-gathering power. Remember that the advocates of it claim the right to make as many roads and canals as they please within the limits of any State, without the consent or approbation of such State, and that the present administration has already traced about seventy routes for such roads and canals, and are calling furiously for fresh brigades of topographical engineers, and a new appropriation of $30,000, to enable them to trace as many more. This being the case, all the lines of communication by land and water, all the avenues which lead from the interior of a State to its market towns, may be seized upon by the Federal Government, officers stationed over them, tolls imposed to any amount, and the transportation of the produce of the country checked and stopped under the weight of this new burthen. The Constitution of the United States wisely provides that Congress shall lay no tax or duty on the exports of any State; but this same Congress which cannot impose a farthing on a cargo of cotton, tobacco, or flour, after it has arrived at the point of departure from the limits of a State, may tax it to death in the shape of tolls and duties, before it gets to that point! And this may be done by members not coming from that State, having no interest in its welfare, peradventure, having a real or supposed interest in destroying its commerce, and not responsible, by elections, to the people thus taxed, oppressed, and ruined. Mr. B. warned the Senate to reflect upon the rock upon which so many confederacies had split—the oppression of the minority by the majority; and he earnestly begged them to pause in a career which might add the only remaining confederacy to the list.

Mr. B. then took up the second of his resolutions, to wit: That it was not expedient for the United States to exercise a permanent superintending care over the repair and preservation of the roads made by it within the limits of the different States.

He said that road-mending was a very different business from road-making. The construction of a road really national, such as those designated by Mr. Gallatin in his report of 1806; such as those specified by himself in 1824; and such as come under the character described by you, sir, [addressing himself to the Vice President, Mr. CALHOUN] when you were Secretary of War, and had to give a practical construction to the act of 1824. The construction of such a road is a great object, worthy to engage the time and the deliberations of the national legislature, and to draw upon the revenues of the Union to defray the expense of making it; but the mending of the same road, after it is once made, is a small business, demanding the presence of the local authority to watch the turning up of a stone, the breaking down of a side-wall, the washing away of some gravel or earth; and in which the prudent maxim emphatically applies, that a stitch in time saves nine. Congress cannot do this. It cannot watch these little matters. It is not until the injury has become excessive, that its attention can be roused, and then twenty, thirty, and even forty thousand dollars is demanded, and has been granted to repair injuries which a few dollars or a few day's work from the neighbors could have prevented in the beginning, if the State or the county had charge of these repairs, instead of the national legislature. It was only on the 2d day of March, 1827, that we appropriated thirty thousand dollars for repairing this road, and we are now called on again!

Mr. B. called on the friends of internal improvement, and besought them not to destroy the system under an accumulation of abuses. The present administration was doing that fast enough for the grief of its real friends and the joy of its enemies. They were destroying the system under the prostitution of it to the acquisition of a momentary popularity, in making a profusion of surveys never to be executed, in exciting universal hopes never to be realized, in creating a vast delusion which must soon be dispelled, and in the disappointment, disgust, and reaction which must follow the detection of all these impositions. The system could not, in addition to all this weight, carry the burthen of the gates, or the expense of annual appropriations of money out of the public treasury to repair all these roads. The gates would be odious to a great part of the community for their unconstitutionality: they would be deemed odious to all for the expense they would impose upon commerce and upon travellers. The annual appropriations out of the public purse to mend roads in a few favored States, would be seen with indignation by the people of other States who mended their own roads out of their pockets, or with their own hands. They would not see, without rising against the whole system, many more appropriations of $30,000 at a time, for objects so unfit for federal legislation, and so exclusively belonging to the police of the county or of a State. Mr. B. had twice or thrice voted for these appropriations, but he did it with a notice at the last time that he should do it no more.

The third resolution, Mr. B. said, was a mere consequence of the other two. It asserted that the repair and preservation of all the roads made by Congress, ought to be left to the States through which they pass. He had used the words, "left to the States," in preference to any words implying a cession, surrender, or relinquishment of any right of soil or jurisdiction, because he held that the United States had nothing in these roads to cede, surrender, or relinquish, and all that the emergency required, was a declaratory resolution, which should let the States see that Congress would have nothing to do with the repairs of a road after it was once made, and that the State or county, through which it runs, must take charge of that business, and attend to it itself. Surely this would be no unreasonable burthen thrown upon the State. Surely the receiver of a great gift might be at the expense and trouble of taking care of it.

Mr. B. concluded with declaring that he submitted the resolutions in a friendly spirit to the road-making power; that he considered their adoption as necessary to the further success of the system; that the system could not carry the load of odium which the setting up of gates, or the further appropriation of great sums to the mere repair of these roads, would bring upon it; that a direct vote upon his resolutions was necessary to decide a question which was suffering for decision, to wit: whether the individual States or the Federal Government should be charged with the business of repairing and preserving these roads; and that he should consider any attempt to avoid the decision, by moving to lay the resolutions upon the table, or to postpone them, as an unfortunate attempt to avoid a serious question which must be met, sooner or later, and the sooner the better.

Mr. KANE replied to Mr. BENTON, and moved to lay the resolutions on the table; on which question, the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the bill making appropriations for public buildings was taken up.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to strike out that portion of the bill which provided for the construction of a door in the western front of the Capitol, on a level with the terrace.

Mr. DICKERSON supported his motion with a few remarks, tending to show that no necessity existed for such an entrance, and that the appearance of the building would be injured by it.

Mr. RIDGELY said a few words in opposition to the motion.

Mr. BENTON spoke at length against the motion, and assigned many reasons why the alteration ought to be made. He had last year opposed the project, on the supposition that the wall of the building would be injured by it; but he had since formed a different opinion, and was convinced that the improvement might be safely made, and would be altogether eligible.

Messrs. DICKERSON and MACON further advocated the motion.

Mr. CHAMBERS observed that he had opposed this plan last year, but had since been convinced of its utility. He believed that the improvement would at some period be made, and that it would be economy to provide for its completion at the present time.

The motion was then rejected.

Mr. BELL moved to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with a view to the consideration of the provision giving to the Commissioner of the Public Buildings certain powers and duties in regard to the police of the Capitol.

This motion was sustained by Messrs. BELL, WEBSTER, and FOOT, and opposed by Messrs. EATON and CHAMBERS, and was rejected.

Mr. BARNARD moved to strike out from the second section, the words "when required by the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, or the Commissioner of Public Buildings," so as to make the operation of the criminal laws of the District, generally, operative on offences committed within the Capitol Square, instead of restricting its operation to cases where its interposition was required in the manner stated in the words proposed to be stricken out.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. CHAMBERS, DICKERSON, and EATON, and defended by Messrs. BARNARD and WEBSTER, when it was negatived.

The question being then put on ordering the bill to a third reading, it was agreed to on a division—18 to 15.

Mr. EATON stated that the bill was already engrossed, and, as it was essential that it should pass forthwith, he moved that the bill now have its third reading; which being agreed to by unanimous consent, the bill was read a third time.

On the question, Shall this bill pass? the yeas and nays were ordered, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Bateman, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, King, McKinley, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Rowan, Rugles, Sanford, Silabee, Smith, of Maryland, Van Buren, Webster, White, Williams.—27.

FRIDAY, MAY 2, 1828.

Mr. DICKERSON gave notice that, on Monday next, he would ask for the consideration of the Tariff bill.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. from the committee on Finance, reported the bill making appropriations for Internal Improvements, (which had been returned from the other House, the amendments made by the Senate not having been agreed to) and moved that the Senate recede.

The question being put on receding from the first and second (amendments of minor import) it was agreed to.

On the motion to recede from the third amendment, to limit the surveys under the appropriation of 30,000 dollars, to those already commenced, a long and interesting debate took place, in which Messrs. JOHNSTON of Lou. WEBSTER, McLANE, BRANCH, SMITH, of S. C. CHAMBERS, MACON, HARRISON, FOOT, and BENTON, participated.

The question being then taken on receding from the third amendment, it was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston, of Ken. Johnston, of Lou., Kane, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Rugles, Seymour, Silabee, Smith, of Md. Thomas, Webster, Willey.—23.

Mr. HARRISON moved to lay the bill upon the table, which was negatived.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou. moved to recede from the other amendments; which was lost.

On motion of Mr. M'LANE the amendments were insisted on.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of S. C. it was ordered that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to Monday next.

THE TARIFF BILL.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the bill to increase the duties on certain imported articles was taken up, and the first amendment reported by the Committee on Manufactures, as follows:

Sec. 1, line 11. At the end thereof, insert—"Provided that all Manufactures of iron, the duties upon an equal quantity of rolled iron, in bars and bolts, shall be rated as rolled iron in bars, and pay a duty accordingly; and all iron in slates, blooms, loops, or other form not particularly specified, shall be rated as rolled iron in bars or bolts, and shall pay a duty accordingly," being under consideration—

Mr. DICKERSON spoke briefly in its support, and read several letters and documents to enforce his arguments.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, replied to Mr. DICKERSON, and read the letters of Mr. Ellicott and Mr. McKim in corroboration of his statement, that the iron sought to be taxed by the proviso could not be obtained in this country. He moved to amend the amendment, by excepting "iron and machinery for Rail Roads."

Mr. DICKERSON replied, and further urged the propriety of the duty proposed by the proviso.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. then modified his amendment so as to omit "machinery."

The question being taken, the motion to amend was agreed to by yeas and nays—23 to 22.

The question being then taken on the amendment as amended, it was lost, on a division—18 to 24.

The second amendment being "Sec. 1, line 33. At the end thereof, insert, 'currying knives, tanner's fleshers, hatchets, and hammers,'" was rejected, on a division, 20 to 25.

The following amendment having been explained at some length by Mr. DICKERSON: "Sec. 2, line 21, Strike out the following words: 'Provided, that, on all manufactures of wool, except flannels and baizes, the actual value of which at the place whence imported shall not exceed 33½ cents the square yard, shall pay 14 cents the square yard,'" the question was then put, and the motion was rejected.

The following amendment, "Sec. 2, line 19. After 'yard' strike out the words 'there shall be levied, collected, and paid, 20 cents on every square yard,' and insert 'shall be deemed to have cost 50 cents the square yard, and be charged thereon with a duty of 40 per centum ad valorem, until the 30th June, 1829; and from that time, a duty of 45 per centum ad valorem,'" was adopted.

The following amendments were then considered:

"Sec. 2, lines 29 and 30. After 'yard,' strike out the words 'there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of 40 cents on every square yard,' and insert, 'shall be deemed to have cost one dollar the square yard, and be charged thereon with a duty of 40 per centum ad valorem, until the 30th of June, 1829; and from that time, a duty of 45 per centum ad valorem.'"

Sec. 2, line 35. After "yard," strike out the words "there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of one dollar on every square yard," and insert "shall be deemed to have cost $2 50 the square yard, and be charged with a duty thereon of 40 per cent. ad valorem, until the 30th June, 1829; and from that time, a duty of 45 per centum ad valorem."

Sec. 2, line 44. At the end thereof, insert, "until the 30th of June, 1829; and from that time, a duty of 45 per centum ad valorem."

Sec. 2, line 49. At the end thereof, insert, "until the 30th of June, 1829; and from that time, a duty of 50 per centum ad valorem."

And agreed to, by yeas and nays.

The following amendment was then considered:

Sec. 2, line 50, At the end thereof, insert—"and on woollen blankets, after the 30th of June, 1829, 40 per centum ad valorem."

Mr. DICKERSON having briefly explained the proposition, the yeas and nays were ordered on motion of Mr. SEYMOUR, and the question being taken, it was decided as follows: Yeas, 23, Nays, 23.

The vote being equal, the CHAIR voted in the negative. The amendment to fix a duty of 50 per centum ad valorem on ready made clothing, was agreed to.

The following amendments were agreed to without a division:

Sec. 2, line 57. After "patent," insert "printed or painted," so as to read, "on all patent, printed, or painted floor cloth carpeting, 50 cents per square yard."

Sec. 2, line 58. Strike out the word "carpeting," so as to read, "on oil-cloth, other than that usually denominated patent floor cloth, 25 cents per square yard."

The amendment to come in at the end of the 19th line of the 3d section, in these words: "And, in addition thereto, one half cent yearly, until the same shall amount to twelve and a half cents per square yard; and on all other manufactures of flax and hemp, 10 per centum ad valorem, in addition to the present duties on the same," was briefly explained by Mr. DICKERSON, who asked the yeas and nays; and, after a few remarks from Mr. SMITH, of Md. it was rejected.

The following amendment was then considered; and, on motion of Mr. PARRIS, the question was divided, so as to decide first on striking out—

Sec. 3, line 20. Strike out the words "ten cents," and insert "seven cents and a half," so as to read, "on molasses seven cents and a half per gallon."

Mr. ROBBINS spoke at considerable length against the duty upon molasses, as unnecessary, inexpedient, and oppressive, an odious tax upon a necessary article.

Mr. DICKERSON defended the imposition of the duty, and argued that it would lead to the production of the article in the country.

Mr. BENTON advocated the duty on molasses as an indirect encouragement to the landed, or farming interest. It would enable the distillers of the Western country, who used pains to compete with those in the Eastern States, who distilled from molasses. Among other remarks, Mr. B. said that whiskey was the healthiest liquor that was drank, as men were known who had been drunk upon it for forty or fifty years, while rum finished its victims in eight or ten.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that he understood the gentleman from Missouri that a man might be drunk on whiskey for forty years. This was the reason why he would vote against the duty, as he was in favour of that liquor which should soberest despatch the drunkard.

Mr. PARRIS expressed himself averse to the duty on molasses, which he looked upon as far more injurious to Maine, than it could be beneficial to Missouri. Mr. P. then gave some details in relation to the trade carried on by the State of Maine with the West India Islands, and contended that this duty would act as a death blow to that trade.

SENATE.]

Deported Slaves.—Tariff Bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, defended the measure, as extending to the West its share of the protection. He did not consider that the State of Maine would suffer, as her tonnage would be employed in carrying the molasses of Louisiana, instead of that of the West Indies. If the bill was amended and sent back to the other House, and should there be lost, he wished to know who would assume the responsibility.

Mr. PARRIS replied briefly to Mr. JOHNSON. He felt no anxiety as to the responsibility for having caused the bill to be lost. His constituents would be severely injured by it. Indeed, had a measure been framed for the express purpose of bearing down the interest of the State of Maine, it would not have been more successful. As to a responsibility of any other kind to which the gentleman might allude, he felt no anxiety. He maintained that Louisiana could not supply the West India trade in the article of molasses, or yield a market for the productions of Maine.

Mr. BENTON made some further remarks in favour of the provision.

The question being then put on striking out, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on motion of Mr. DICKERSON, it was decided in the negative.

The amendment at the 22d line of the 3d section, to insert "on vermicelli 50 per centum," being next—

Mr. DICKERSON explained this proposition. The article was not as unimportant as by some it might be supposed. He mentioned the fact of a manufacturer in the State of New Jersey, who exported large quantities.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, the gentleman from New Jersey will not even let us have our soup in peace. That too, must be taxed. He will think of taxing the air we breathe next. This article was to be taxed, because there was a manufacturer in New Jersey, who appeared to be doing very well, as the gentleman said that he exported large quantities.

Mr. BENTON said he would detain the Senate but a minute and a half; and he intended to tell a story instead of making a speech. When the tariff of 1824 was under discussion in the other House, a gentleman, whom he did not then know, but whom he afterwards learned was a member of Congress, came to him in his seat, and asked whether there were not caves in Missouri in which Epsom salts were found. He, [Mr. B.] answered doubtfully—and the gentleman said he had at home, a small manufactory of the article, and he argued that the caves in Missouri and his manufactory entitled the article to be protected. When the gentleman from New Jersey proposed this duty, because there happened to be a manufactory of vermicelli in New Jersey, his [Mr. B.'s] mind recurred to this circumstance, and he could not but ask whether there was any member of Congress interested in the business?

Mr. DICKERSON assured Mr. BENTON that no member of Congress had any concern in the manufactory of which he had spoken,

The amendment was rejected, 18 to 24.

TUESDAY, MAY 6, 1828.

DEPORTED SLAVES.

A message was received from the other House, communicating an amendment to the bill to provide for the settlement of claims under the 1st Article of the Treaty of Ghent, providing that the commission for the settlement of those claims should not continue after the 1st of September next.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou. moved to recommend the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TYLER opposed the reference. He stated that the Commission had suspended its operations, awaiting the decision of Congress; and he hoped there would be no delay in acting upon the bill; and although he had no objection to laying the bill on the table to allow the gentleman from Louisiana to examine it, he hoped it would not be recommitted, as such a course would essentially delay the bill.

Mr. EATON said that the Commissioners had stated that they would close their labors in August, and he presumed this amendment was made conformable to that declaration.

Mr. VAN BUREN said a few words and moved to lay the bill on the table; which was agreed to.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The bill increasing the duties on certain imported articles was then taken up, together with the amendment offered by Mr. KANE, to lay a duty on lead in pigs, bars, or sheets, three cents per pound; on leaden shot, four cents per pound; on red or white lead, dry or ground in oil, five cents per pound; on litharge, and lead manufactured into pipes, five cents per pound.

Mr. KANE briefly explained the object of the amendment.

Mr. PARRIS opposed it, and made some statements relative to the amount of the importations of the articles named in the amendment.

Mr. BENTON spoke in favor of its adoption. He said he was a member of the Senate in 1824, when the existing tariff was enacted, and was in favor of a higher duty upon lead and its manufactures at that time, but was prevented from making any motion to that effect by the admonition, often repeated, that the whole bill might be lost if alterations were attempted. That tariff had been in operation four years, and except for the duty on lead, it had proved itself to be of no advantage to the State of Missouri. Being again under revision, and heavy duties proposed on many articles consumed, but not manufactured in Missouri, he considered it due to that State, and to the State of Illinois, to endeavor to obtain further protection for one of their principal staples, the article of lead; and the amendment now under consideration, having been well considered by himself, and the Senator from Illinois, (Mr. KANE,) he could say that the duty on the crude article, and all its manufactures, was adjusted upon a full view of their relative connexion and dependence on each other, and were believed to be fair and equal. The amendment had a further recommendation in including litharge, and several manufactures of lead, which were omitted in the tariff of 1824, and left open a door to various evasions of the act.

Mr. B. considered lead as one of the articles of domestic production on which the system of protecting duties might legitimately be carried to the prohibitory point against its foreign rival. It was an article of prime necessity in time of war, absolutely indispensable to our security and independence as a nation, and susceptible of being produced at home to the full extent of any possible demand. He would not repeat what every body knew about the variety, the extent, and the richness of the lead mines in the State of Missouri and on the upper Mississippi. It was sufficient to say that past discoveries authorized the belief that innumerable fresh discoveries may be made; that the supply of the article will increase in full proportion to the demand for it; and that the ultimate product may be set down as boundless and inexhaustible. This being the fact, there could be no valid objection to the absolute exclusion of the foreign article. The amendment, however, does not go that length, but probably may operate as a prohibitory duty in the lapse of some years.

Mr. B. said, that the reasons for granting this increased duty on lead, were, first, to secure to the United States an ample, certain, and regular supply of an article, indispensable in time of war; and next, to enable the States of Missouri and Illinois, in which this article abounded, to meet the additional burthens which this new tariff, if it became a law, would impose upon them. Lead furnishes the main part of these means. It will serve for remittances in payment of these woollen and cotton goods, which we are hereafter to receive at an augmented price from New England, and of course we should have augmented means of paying for them. Our ordinary productions of corn, wheat, pork, beef, whiskey and tobacco, would be in no demand there, even if they could bear the expense of transportation, as the present complaint of New England against old England is, that she takes no provisions from her, of course New England will take none of these articles from us, and we must either pay for her woollens in gold or silver, which we must get from the South, or in such articles as will bear transportation. Lead and shot are among the few articles produced in Missouri and Illinois, which will bear transportation to New England, or which will command the money which will have to be carried there; and as these States are to buy their woollen goods from her at a greatly augmented price, it is but distributive justice that they should have augmented means of paying for them. With this view, and to obtain something like the monopoly of the American market in furnishing it with lead, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. KANE) and himself had agreed upon the terms of the amendment now under consideration. It specified a higher duty on lead and shot, than had been offered and rejected in the House of Representatives. That duty was only 50 per cent. on the existing duty; the present amendment proposed 100 per cent. It might be thought high; but he could say that it was not too high for the benefit of Missouri and Illinois; and if rejected, there would be nothing in the bill to induce him to vote for it.

Tariff Bill.

Mr. B. said, that he would avail himself of this occasion, when lead was the subject of debate, to rectify an erroneous inference, which had lately been drawn from one of his speeches, by a Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. JOHNSTON,) a speech in which he, Mr. B. had suggested that the public debt might be paid off in five years, and an extensive abolition of duties be made at that time. That Senator inferred, that the duty on lead, might be included in the list of abolition, and that he, (Mr. B.) might do a great injury to his own State. Mr. B. said, it was kind in that Senator to undertake to defend the State of Missouri from the improvidence of her immediate representative; but a slight attention to the rule he had laid down, would shew that there was no room for the exercise of his super-serviceable benevolence; the inference which he drew, being not only without premises, but against them, as would be seen by looking at the rule. The rule was this: "I am for abolishing duties in toto, as soon as the public debt is paid off, upon all articles of prime necessity, or ordinary comfort, which are not made at home at all, or not made in sufficient quantity to merit national protection; and I am for continuing them on articles of taste and luxury, and upon such rival productions of foreign countries as our security in time of war, and our general independence as a nation, require to be made at home." This is the rule, and the Senator's error arose from his omission to quote the last half of it. His quotation stopped in the middle of the rule, and therefore left him unacquainted with the fact that duties were to be continued upon a certain description of articles; that this description included those which were necessary to our safety in time of war; of which lead is certainly one; and therefore an article on which the duty was to be continued.

Mr. B. concluded with saying, that the mineral district in Missouri was at present in a languishing state. The government had lately reserved about 500,000 acres of land there, from sale, making a desert in the heart of the country; the old French and Spanish claims were yet unsettled; that the upper strata of mineral was much exhausted, and the lower could not be got at without much expense, and considerable skill in mineralogy; that many of the miners had gone off to the new mines on the upper Mississippi, and that the increased protection which the amendment contemplated was essential to the extensive revival of mining in Missouri, and the restoration of a large district to its former prosperity. If this amendment should be adopted, and if a bill for the sale of the reserved lead mines which he had introduced, and passed through the Senate in the fore part of the session, should succeed in getting through the House of Representatives, then might the mineral region in Missouri become the centre of an immense attraction, the theatre of vast enterprise, the seat of unnumbered manufactories, the focus of incredible wealth, a market for a prodigious consumption of merchandise and provisions; and the whole country be made to rejoice in the profusion of benefits which it would disburse around.

Mr. DICKERSON considered that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, replied to Mr. BENTON, and explained his former remarks; and said he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. BENTON replied to Mr. JOHNSTON.

Mr. ROWAN said that he should vote against the proposed duty upon lead, and as it was a western product, and we might be supposed on that account, to be inclined to support it, he felt it his duty to give some of the reasons, which would induce him to vote against it.

He begged leave, however, to premise, that he was individually opposed to the whole system. He was opposed to the tariff, as a system of bounties, for the encouragement of certain classes of industry. He considered the protection, which it extended to one class of industry, as a correspondent depression upon other classes. Its professed object was to tax one part of the community for the benefit of another. Its operation is to impoverish one class of laborers, for the purpose of enriching another—or rather to tax the laboring, and more especially the agricultural portion of the community, to enrich the capitalists—to increase the poverty of those already poor, to enhance the wealth of those already rich—as a system, calculated to accelerate that state of wealth, in the hands of the few, which is incompatible with the happiness and liberty of the many—as a system, the tendency of which, is to inflict upon the people of this country the poverty, wretchedness, and vassalage, which characterize the people in governments less favorable to liberty than ours.

He was not, he said, opposed to the tariff as a system of revenue, honestly devoted to the objects and purposes of revenue—on the contrary, he was friendly to a tariff of that character; but when perverted by the ambition of political aspirants, and the secret influence of inordinate cupidity, to purposes of individual, and sectional ascendancy, he could not be seduced by the captivation of names, or terms, however attractive, to lend it his individual support.

It is in vain, Mr. President, said he, that it is called the American System—names do not alter things. There is but one American System, and that is delineated in the State and Federal Constitutions. It is the system of equal rights and privileges secured by the representative principle—a system, which, instead of subjecting the proceeds of the labor of some to taxation, in the view to enrich others, secures to all the proceeds of their labor—exempts all from taxation, except for the support of the protecting power of the government. As a tax necessary to the support of the government, he would support it—call it by what name you please—as a tax for any other purpose, and especially for the purposes to which he had alluded—it had his individual reprobation, under whatever name it might assume.

SENATE.]

Tariff Bill.

It might, he observed, be inferred from what he had said, that he would vote against the bill. He did not wish any doubts to be entertained as to the vote he should give upon this measure, or the reasons which would influence him to give it. He was not at liberty, he said, to substitute his individual opinion for that of his State. He was, he said, one of the organs here, of a State, that had, by the tariff of 1824, been chained to the car of the Eastern Manufacturers—a State that had been from that time, and was now groaning under the pressure of that unequal and unjust measure—a measure, from the pressure of which, owing to the prevailing illusion throughout the United States, she saw no hope of escape, by a speedy return to correct principles—and seeing no hope of escaping from the ills of the system, she is constrained, on principles of self defence, to avail herself of the mitigation which this bill presents, in the duties which it imposes upon foreign hemp, spirits, iron, and molasses. The hemp, iron, and distilled spirits of the West, will, like the woollens of the Eastern States, be encouraged to the extent of the tax indirectly imposed by this bill, upon those who shall buy and consume them. Those who may need, and buy those articles, must pay to the grower, or manufacturer of them, an increased price to the amount of the duties imposed upon the like articles of foreign growth or fabric. To this tax upon the labor of the consumer, his individual opinion was opposed. But, as the organ of the State of Kentucky, he felt himself bound to surrender his individual opinion, and express the opinion of his State.

If upon this, or any other subject, he should substitute his own, for the well known will of his State, he should feel that he had been faithless to her interests, and unfriendly to the principles of our republican institutions. He had no doubt but the people of the State which he had the honor to represent, were, like him, opposed to taxation for any individual or partial purpose—for any purpose but the support of the government. They would submit to and pay any tax cheerfully, for the protection of all, but not to enrich a few. But they are reduced by the operation of this American System, as it is falsely called, to the condition of the planter whose farm, fences, and houses, are endangered by fire from the forest. They, like him, must fire against the encroaching fire. The exercise of will is not left them—they are under the influence of a dire necessity. He must, therefore, as their humble organ, vote for this bill; and would, on the same principle, vote for this duty on lead, if he could do it without disparaging his government. The mines of lead, with the exception of a few Spanish grants, which he had been told were nearly exhausted, belonged to the United States. To suppose that the government to whose strength we all look for protection, so weak as to need protection against foreign competition in the manufacture and sale of this vulgar metal, was not he thought very respectful to the government. He might be told that the government leases its mines, and that the lessees, and not the government, would be benefitted by this duty. His reply was, that when you raise the price of lead, you raise rents. This would be inevitable. The competition between the lessees would necessarily produce this result; and thus, while the consumers of this necessary and useful article would be taxed, the manufacturer of it would not be benefitted. The tax would go to the government, and not to them. The western section of our country would not be benefitted. It would be unjust; for the tax thus levied upon the consumers of that article, would be drawn from that region into the Treasury, and like all the very large sums, which under the tariff of 1824, and under the sales of the public lands have been drawn from that quarter, would be laid out upon the seaboard. Not intending, he said, to take any part in the discussion of this bill, he had taken this occasion to intimate the course he should pursue upon this measure, and to express, very briefly, some of the reasons by which he was influenced. He had forbore to go into detail. He had not attempted to depict the evils which had been inflicted upon the Southern and Western States by this new system—a system peculiar to aristocrats and to monarchists—kinds of government to which it naturally led, and to the support of which, it was as natural and necessary, as it was alien from and abhorred by republics. He repeated it as his opinion, that his State was driven to the acceptance of this bill, not as a good, which she approved, but as the softener of an evil, from which she cannot escape, and which, without the mitigation which it tenders, she is unable to bear.

Mr. BRANCH moved to amend the amendment by inserting, "and on gold dust 37½ per centum ad valorem."

Mr. DICKERSON made a few remarks in answer to Mr. Rowan. He was understood to contend that the objections of that gentleman to a duty on lead were not valid ones. As to gold, he did not think it possible to keep it out of the country. It would be as easy to attempt to "keep out the tide with a pitchfork." If the protection could be made effectual, he would go with the gentleman with all his heart. But he thought it an improper measure.

Mr. BRANCH maintained the claims of the manufacturers of gold, over those of the workers in iron, copper, or lead. Either of the latter was more profitable than gold.

Mr. ROWAN replied to Mr. DICKERSON. He did not wish to strengthen the arm of the General Government, and for this reason should vote against the duty on lead.

Mr. MACON made a few remarks, as was understood, in opposition to the motion of Mr. BRANCH.

Mr. BRANCH withdrew his motion.

After a few remarks from Mr. DICKERSON, on whose motion the yeas and nays were ordered, the question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the bill, by inserting a provision fixing the duty upon imported salt at 15 cents on the bushel, one year after the passage of the bill, and at 10 cents at the end of two years.

Mr. HARRISON opposed the amendment. It was well known that he had introduced a bill at an early period of this session for the reduction of the duty on imported salt; and that he had given notice in his place, and through the newspapers, that it would not be taken up again this year. This being generally understood by the manufacturers of the article, he did not think it proper again to agitate the question. He should therefore vote against the amendment.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the question being taken on the five first amendments adopted yesterday in the Committee of the Whole, (levying duties on woollen cloths.)

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then occurring on the duty of 50 per cent. on clothing ready made, and the yeas and nays being ordered, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Md., it was decided in the affirmative.

The amendments on carpeting, &c. and on lead, were then agreed to.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by a provision laying a duty of 33½ per centum, ad valorem, on furs.

Mr. DICKERSON opposed the motion.

Mr. BENTON entered into a detail of the extent and value of the Northwestern fur trade, and the necessity under which the fur traders labored for protection from British competition.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the amendment by substituting 45 per cent. instead of 33½.

Internal Improvements.—Adjournment of Congress.

[SENATE.]

Mr. BENTON accepted the modification.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the amendment, by inserting 50 per cent. ad valorem, on foreign manufactured fur hats. He observed, that, at present, furs were admitted duty free, and there was a duty of 30 per cent. on imported hats. If a duty were laid on furs, and the duty on hats remained the same, the manufacturer must give up making them.

Mr. BENTON asked whether there was not, at present, a prohibitory duty on foreign hats?

Mr. DICKERSON said that great numbers were still imported. The motion was then rejected on a division, 15 to 24.

On Mr. BENTON'S amendment, the yeas and nays having been ordered on his motion, the question was then taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON, in proposing an amendment, said, that he had formerly stated that there were two methods of evading the duties on iron. The one was by manufacturing it a little above bar iron, and calling it manufactured iron; the other was by calling it slabs, blooms, loops, etc. The only difference was, that the bars were shorter and broader. He had yesterday read a letter, which stated that this process for defrauding the revenue, was now going on; and he could not sit still without making one further effort to prevent the success of these attempts to rob the Government of a portion of the revenue. He had, therefore, now moved to amend the bill by a portion of the amendment offered yesterday, leaving out iron in bars and bolts—and providing that "all iron in slabs, blooms, and loops, shall be rated as rolled iron, and shall pay duty accordingly."

Mr. EATON signified his intention to vote for the amendment. He had voted against it yesterday, because he thought that the friends of the bill would be content to pass it as it came from the other House. He therefore was averse to obstruct it by voting for any amendment which should send it back to the other House, and run the risk of its being lost. But finding that other amendments had been made, and that it must go back, he no longer refrained from assisting to amend it, and should vote for the present motion.

Mr. PARRIS opposed the motion, and went at length into the history of the duty on iron; its rapid progress; and its effects upon the community. He also argued, from the continual increase of the duty, that no point could be foreseen at which it would stop; that the duty was at present sufficient protection to the manufacturer; and that its increase would strike materially at the commercial interest of the country. He was, therefore, totally opposed to an increase of duty on iron, in whatever form, whether it were in pigs, or bolts, or blooms, or loops.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that the amendment was not to increase the duty, but to prevent frauds on the revenue. According to the letter from Baltimore, to which he had already alluded, the manufacturer was defrauded of the provisions in his favor, by the form in which the iron was imported. It was made two feet instead of eight, in length, very broad and flat, and was called a slab, when it was effectually a bar. The only object of the amendment was to prevent these frauds.

Mr. BARNARD advocated the amendment. It was to ensure to the manufacturer the protection which the law designed he should enjoy, and, without such a provision, it was useless to levy a duty on the foreign article.

The question being then taken, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, on motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICKERSON renewed the motion to amend, (rejected in the Committee of the Whole,) levying a duty on blankets, of 40 per centum, ad valorem.

Mr. BARNARD moved a substitute for the amendment, by providing for a duty of 2½ per centum per annum, until it shall amount to 40 per centum; but, Mr. DICKERSON not consenting to the modification, it was withdrawn by the mover.

The question being then taken on Mr. DICKERSON'S motion, by yeas and nays, it was decided as follows: Yeas 23—nays 23.

The vote being equal, the CHAIR voted in the negative.

Mr. BARNARD moved to insert in the 1st section, line 32, "tanner's knives"—on which he asked the yeas and nays, and the question being put, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON further moved to amend the bill, by inserting, at the end of the 19th line of 1st section, "on sail-duck, one-half cent per square yard, per annum until it shall amount to 12½ cents."

Mr. SILSBEE moved to amend the amendment, by inserting after the words "sail-duck," the words, "except ravens duck." If so amended, Mr. S. said, he would vote for the amendment, otherwise he could not.

The CHAIR decided that the motion of Mr. SILSBEE was not in order.

The question being then taken on Mr. DICKERSON'S motion, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SANFORD moved to amend by striking out the last clause of the 4th section, allowing a drawback on cordage manufactured from foreign hemp.

This motion, having been slightly discussed by Messrs. SANFORD, WEBSTER, and DICKERSON, was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. PARRIS moved to strike out that portion of the 4th section which provides that "no drawback shall hereafter be allowed on spirituous liquors manufactured from molasses."

On this motion a long and animated discussion took place, in which Messrs. PARRIS, SMITH, of Maryland, WEBSTER, SILSBEE, SANFORD, EATON, FOOT, ROWAN, HARRISON, and BENTON, participated.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1828.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

A message from the other House was taken up, relative to a Committee of Conference on the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for Internal Improvement.

Mr. M'LANE moved to concur, and to appoint managers on the part of the Senate. He observed that he thought an arrangement might be made, satisfactory to all parties.

The Senate having agreed to the appointment of a Committee of Conference on their part, a ballot was then taken, and Messrs. M'LANE, TAZEWELL and SANFORD were appointed the Committee.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The resolution of the Committee on the Adjournment was taken up.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to lay it on the table; which was lost—19 to 20.

Mr. NOBLE opposed the present consideration of the resolution. He was as anxious to go home as any other member; but he wished that the business which ought to be done should first be disposed of.

Mr. KING moved to lay the resolution on the table, but withdrew his motion on the suggestion of Mr. BERRIEN.

A message was received from the other House, informing the Senate that they had passed a resolution fixing the time of the adjournment at the 26th May, and asking the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATE.]

Deported Slaves.—Tariff Bill.

Mr. BERRIEN said, he presumed the Senator from Alabama would see the propriety of not pressing his motion. He wished the resolution to be acted upon, and expressed an opinion that all the essential business of the Senate could be transacted previous to the 26th May.

Mr. KING observed, that the Senator from Georgia misconceived him. The resolution now before the Senate was a joint one, and must go to the other House for concurrence, and if acted on, would pass the other on its way. He wished that it might be laid on the table, so that the message just received from the other House might be taken up.

Mr. K. then renewed the motion to lay on the table, which was agreed to.

The message from the other House was then taken up.

Mr. NOBLE moved to lay it on the table; on which the yeas and nays were ordered, and the question was decided in the affirmative.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The bill making alterations in the several acts levying duties on imported articles, was then taken up as the unfinished business, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PARRIS, to retain the drawback on spirits distilled in this country from articles brought from abroad. On this question, Messrs. MARKS, MACON, VAN BUREN, WEBSTER, BRANCH, BARNARD, WOODBURY, SMITH, of Md. and ROWAN, took part. The question being then taken, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. ROBBINS moved to amend the bill by striking out the duty of 10 cents per gallon.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. ROBBINS, and decided in the negative.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. moved to strike out the 1st of June, and insert 1st day of September.

Considerable discussion took place, in which Messrs. DICKERSON, SMITH, of Md. and HARRISON, took part, when the motion was rejected.

TUESDAY, MAY 8TH, 1828.

DEPORTED SLAVES.

On motion of Mr. TYLER, the bill to settle the claims of individuals to slaves, provided for by the first article of the treaty of Ghent, was taken up.

Mr. TYLER explained the bill, and moved that the Senate concur in the amendments adopted by the House. He observed, that the bill had been passed in the Senate without any consultation of the Commissioners, and the time had been fixed for the conclusion of the commission at the 30th November. The bill had grown out of the desire of certain claimants, who had received three-fourths of their claims, to be allowed to take farther testimony against other claimants, (known as the Chesapeake claimants.) In the other House, a letter had been addressed to the Commissioners, and their answer, (which Mr. T. read) gave the opinion that the labors of the commission could be concluded by the middle of August. The 1st of September was therefore fixed on. He hoped the Senate would assent to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou. said, that he would propose an amendment to the amendment, in the shape of a proviso, which he hoped the Senator from Virginia would be disposed to accept. The Georgia and Louisiana claimants, although desiring a longer period, would assent to fixing the termination of the Commission at the 1st of September, if this proviso were granted. He then offered a proviso, authorising the filing of the deposition of any person which may be handed in before the 1st of June.

The motion was opposed by Mr. TYLER, who said, that, if this amendment were adopted, the Board would proceed in the decision of no case until after the 1st of July. If it were not adopted, they would proceed immediately to decide upon such cases as were before them.

Mr. JOHNSTON, spoke at length in support of his motion.

Mr. TAZEVELL opposed the motion, on the ground that it would operate as a dictation to the Commission, a form of receiving testimony which it was not the province of Congress to make, and would overrule the judgment of the Commissioners.

Mr. COBB spoke at length in support of the proviso.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. asked whether the Chesapeake claimants were on the definitive list?

Mr. BERRIEN replied that they were.

Mr. BERRIEN then went into a detailed argument in favor of the proviso, and maintained the justice of granting to the Georgia and Louisiana claimants. He disagreed with Mr. TAZEVELL in the idea that this proviso would dictate to the Commission any form of taking evidence. It would only direct them to take further evidence until July, in the same form as had been established by the Commissioners themselves. The bill, as it was passed by the Senate, would have enabled the claimants to seek evidence beyond the Atlantic. This would only allow them to obtain such testimony as could be obtained in this country. But if the bill was to pass with an understanding that no further evidence was to be heard, it would operate as an exclusion to the Georgia and Louisiana claimants. This would be an act of injustice to them, which he could not consent to.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the bill was then laid on the table.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The bill for the alteration of the several acts levying duties on imported goods was taken up; and an amendment, offered yesterday, by Mr. SMITH, of Md. to lay a duty of two cents per pound on sheathing copper, being under consideration.

Mr. SMITH asked for the reading of a memorial of the merchants of Baltimore on this subject; which was read. Its purport was to ask a duty on sheathing copper, as the crude copper of South-America could be manufactured into sheathing copper advantageously in this country.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. said, that brazier's copper paid now a duty of four cents per pound. When he was formerly in the other House, sheathing copper was declared free of duty. It was duty free at present, yet it could be made advantageously here. On receiving this memorial, he wrote to the manufacturers, inquiring as to the effect of the duty asked for, and they replied they were not peculiarly anxious upon the subject. We export large quantities of cotton goods and Windsor chairs to Lima, and our only returns are in silver and crude copper, and by far the largest amount is in the latter. When they bring it to this country, they get only the trade of the brazier. If they could supply also the sheathing copper, it would be advantageous to our commerce, as it would extend the trade. The American copper was the best; there being a portion of iron in the English copper, which caused little holes in the sheathing, and injured the bottoms of vessels. He was, therefore, desirous that this duty should be imposed.

Mr. PARRIS said that he could not feel that he had discharged his duty to his constituents, without making one more effort, however fruitless it might prove, to rid the bill of some of its most objectionable features. The great interests of the State in which he resided were at stake—interests which cannot be touched without affecting in some degree the whole of that community which cannot bear the heavy hand of Government, to the extent now proposed, without serious and irreparable injury. He, therefore, again asked the indulgence of the Senate while he would consider the extent, the nature, and magnitude of those interests—the manner in which their operations are carried on, their importance to the country, and the hazard to which they would be subjected, if the measure should succeed in its present form.

My intention is, said Mr. P., to state facts, incontrovertible facts, with the hope that a consideration of the great and manifest inequality of this measure will induce to some modification more consonant to just principles and the interests of the country.

When the additional duty on molasses was under consideration the other day, I spoke at some length of the West India trade—of its vast importance to the country, to the consumer, to the lumberman, to the manufacturer of lumber, to the fisherman, and to those who barter the productions of our own soil for this article of foreign growth. I estimated the number of persons, and the amount of capital employed in carrying on this trade, and I then asserted, and now repeat, that if we go on imposing restrictions as we have done, and are now doing, ere long we shall not be able to spread a sail in the West India seas.

We have already lost the direct trade to the British Islands. I impute no blame to the Government for that loss—but we have lost it—it is gone, and there is no prospect of its being regained. The operation has been to throw the trade, which before was carried on with the British islands, into our markets in the other islands, and they have thereby been glutted. This is the natural effect of the measure; it was foreseen, it was expected, and the consequence is a diminution of the value of our exports in the foreign market. So say our merchants; such unquestionably is the fact. I say no more upon this diversion of trade, except that in connexion with the obstructions about to be thrown upon the trade with the Spanish islands, by the increased duty on molasses, it must fall with severity upon our navigating interest. If this bill answer the expectations of its friends, its operation upon navigation will be injurious in another direction.

The whole trade of this country, or nearly so, except with China, is founded upon barter; the exchange of our own produce, the growth of our soil, or the result of our labor for the production of other countries. In proportion as this trade of barter and exchange shall be diminished, our vessels will necessarily be thrown out of employment, and our sailors be turned from their accustomed pursuits, or compelled to follow those pursuits elsewhere. There are various items in this bill calculated to produce these effects. Such is the increased duty on molasses, bearing on the West India trade. Such is the increased duty upon iron and hemp, bearing on the trade in the Baltic. I lay it down as a postulatam, that if we would sell, we must buy—if we would export, we must import—and that, if by increased duties, or in any other manner, either direct or indirect, we diminish imports, we thereby diminish our exports. No nation will find trade advantageous with us, unless we take their products. We cannot carry on trade to advantage with other nations, unless they will take ours. Now, sir, the effect of the increased duty on molasses will be materially to diminish the importation of that article. It cannot be introduced with any profit under the proposed tariff. The avowed object is to diminish it, and to make way for the molasses of the Southern, and the whiskey of the Middle and Western States. What then must be the effect?—Who will purchase our lumber and our fish? Who will purchase all the various commodities which we now exchange for that article? The Islanders will not, unless we take their molasses in payment. Will our neighbors of the South and West become the purchasers? Certainly not: they will have no market for an additional supply of our produce. They cannot send it to the islands so advantageously as we can; they cannot consume it at home. The effect, the necessary and inevitable effect, so far as it bears upon navigation, will be to diminish both our exports and our imports. Our lumber must remain in the forests, and our fishermen be withdrawn from the banks.

I will now call the attention of the Senate to some facts showing the importance of this trade to the tonnage interest of the country. The annual importation of molasses into the United States does not materially vary from fourteen millions of gallons; more than half of which is from Cuba. As our trade is greater with that than with either of the other West India Islands, I will exhibit in as few words as possible, the quantity and value of some of our principal exports to, and imports from that island, together with the amount of tonnage employed. During the last year of which we have any returns, we imported from Cuba 7,383,000 gallons of molasses, valued at that island at $1,343,000. We imported from the same island, during the same period, 18,232,000 pounds of coffee, valued there at $1,837,000, and also 44,392,000 pounds of sugar, valued there at $2,857,000. The aggregate value of these three articles, imported in one year, as estimated at the place of shipment, exceeds three millions of dollars. How did we pay for them? Partly in the productions of our own country, and partly in the produce of other countries purchased with the productions of our own. During the same period we shipped to Cuba our own produce, our lumber, fish, oil, naval stores, beef, pork, flour, rice, &c. to the value of upwards of three millions seven hundred thousand dollars. We also supplied them with articles, the growth and production of England, France, Russia, South America, and other places, received in exchange for our produce, valued here at the time of exportation, at upwards of two millions three hundred and eighty-two thousand dollars. This trade with the island of Cuba is carried on wholly by ourselves. We furnish the ships and the seamen to navigate them. We are their carriers, not only of our own produce, but that of Europe and other parts of the world. The amount of American tonnage employed in this trade exceeds 122,000 tons. I have been thus particular, for the purpose of showing the magnitude of this branch of business with one island only; a business which will be most injuriously affected by the operation of the bill under discussion. Is it wise to embarrass a trade that gives so much employment to our people, so much revenue to the Treasury?

These proposed duties are to encourage labor, say gentlemen. The molasses of Louisiana and the whiskey of Kentucky are the products of our soil and of our labor, and therefore must be encouraged. This, sir, is the doctrine on which the bill rests; and this, to be sure, sounds well. But how stands the fact? Is not the molasses of the West Indies the product of our labor? Who cuts the timber in the forest? who manufactures the lumber at the mills? who transports it to the foreign market? who draws the fish from the ocean? who cures them on the flakes? This is done by our own labor, and by the operation of barter; the molasses, the coffee, and the sugar received in return, becomes the product of our labor. In all this process the advantage is on our side, inasmuch as we are carriers both ways. We supply the Islanders with our produce, carried to them by our vessels, and of course charged with the freight, and we supply ourselves with their produce, on which they obtain no freight. What becomes of this coffee and sugar, and molasses, the product of our labor? A part goes into the consumption of the country, but no inconsiderable proportion is withdrawn from our market, and exported with other articles forming assorted cargoes, calculated for the trade of the country to which they are sent; thus giving further employment to our people and our ships. Pursue this trade still further, and you find the product of our labor returning to the American market in the form of hemp, duck, and iron. Yes, sir, the very commodities that are taken in payment for the produce of our soil and our fisheries, form the basis of another branch of trade, and, I regret to say, one that is to be most severely taxed by this tariff. Our imports from the Baltic are purchased almost wholly by barter. We import from Russia to the amount of $2,600,000 annually, as valued at her ports, principally in iron and hemp, and the manufactures of hemp and flax. How do we pay for these? We export no specie to Russia, or very little. Some years none; last year only $9,000. We pay in the coffee, the sugar, and the commodities which we import from the West Indies, either by direct shipment to Russia, or through an intermediate trade, the product of which is carried to Russia. We pay in various articles derived through commerce from other nations in exchange for the productions of our country; so that the iron, the hemp, and the duck, which we import from Russia, is the ultimate product of the labor of our lumbermen, our fishermen, and our sailors.

Sir, we are also the carriers for Russia. Not a cargo of our imports to, or exports from that country, the last year, was borne by foreign tonnage. Now, what are we about doing? We are about to depart from the principles upon which this Government was first administered. In a time of peace, when revenue is abundant, when the public debt is fast disappearing, when our finances do not call for an additional dollar of revenue, we are adding one hundred per cent. to the existing duties on molasses, almost the like per cent. upon hemp, and an addition of four dollars and fifty cents per ton upon iron. The first article upon which we lay our hands, enters into the consumption of every family in the country, as food; the others enter into the construction of our ships, and constitute nearly one third of their expense. In one view, indeed, we do act consistently; for while, by heavy duties, we discourage ship-building, by the same duties we so shackle trade as to render ships unnecessary.

I will now show how we have departed from the original policy of the Government. Sir, the first Congress that was elected under this Constitution found the country involved with the debt of the Revolutionary war. With no money in the Treasury, with a heavy debt to be discharged, and the current expenses of the Government to be provided for, that Congress undertook to devise the ways and means; and the second act that was passed under this Constitution, was a tariff of duties on imports; and the third was an act imposing duties on tonnage. From these acts, and others that were passed soon after, the Senate will perceive that those who first legislated for us, were disposed to encourage and cherish trade, rather than destroy it. At that period, July, 1789, we had but few vessels employed in our merchant service—less than 124,000 tons. Trade was in other hands. The war had swept ours, what little we had, from the ocean. Its importance was seen—was felt—and the earliest and most efficient measures were taken to enable us to engage successfully in the competition. Ship-building was encouraged. Discriminating duties were imposed on foreign tonnage, and even a discrimination between foreign vessels built within the United States and foreign-built vessels. American vessels, on entry, paid six cents per ton, while foreign vessels, built within the States, paid thirty cents, and all other foreign vessels paid fifty cents per ton. A discriminating duty of ten per cent. was also imposed on all dutiable articles imported in foreign vessels. These acts may be considered as the life-giving power to the navigation of this country. They afford incontestible evidence that those who then directed the national concerns, foresaw the high importance of commerce to the prosperity of this people. Public sentiment went with them, and seconded their views. Our tonnage increased, and we became our carriers exclusively. In 1792 our own shipping employed in foreign trade had increased to upwards of 411,000 tons. By this increase, we were not only enabled to monopolize our own trade, but prepared to participate in the profits of the carrying trade of Europe, thrown into our hands by the belligerent situation of the commercial powers of that quarter of the world. Sir, we engaged successfully in this business—our vessels being neutral, could carry for lower freight than those of the belligerent powers, and they consequently engrossed a large proportion of this profitable employment.

I mention these facts to shew what was the policy of those who first administered this Government, and how we have departed from that policy—to shew that they gave existence to our navigation—that they protected it, instead of loading it with burthens.

We all know what followed. By French decrees, British Orders in Council, non-intercourse, embargo, and war, our navigation suffered severely. Much of it was either captured or decayed at our wharves.

In this state of depression, at the restoration of peace, what of encouragement or protection did it receive from the Government? Did we adopt the course pursued under like circumstances after the Revolutionary war? Directly the reverse. By the law of March 3, 1815, all discriminating duties on foreign tonnage, and goods imported in foreign vessels, were provisionally repealed. All nations were thus invited to bring their produce to our market, and to take our produce to their market, upon the same terms as were imposed upon our own vessels—in other words, all nations were invited to become our carriers. The invitation has been accepted, and British, French, Dutch, Hanseatic, and Swedish, and other foreign vessels with their cargoes, now enter our ports upon the payment of the same duties of tonnage and impost as are chargeable on vessels owned by citizens of the United States. We have not stopped here. We have not merely departed from the early policy of the Government, by taking from our tonnage the benefit resulting from discriminating duties, but we have actually loaded it with burthens. I have shown how we have discouraged, and are still discouraging trade, by the imposition of heavy duties on various articles of import taken in exchange, either directly or circuitously, for our own productions. I will now show to what degree we are, by the same process, discouraging ship-building.

Sir, two of the most expensive articles that enter into the construction of a ship, are hemp and iron. It is estimated by those who are well acquainted with the business, that of the whole cost, one-third, at least, is in hemp, iron, and duck. It was the early policy of the Government, having in view the encouragement of the commerce of the country, to keep down the duties on these essential articles. The permanent duty on hemp never exceeded twenty dollars per ton, and that on iron never came up to nine dollars per ton, until since the late war with Great Britain. During all our commercial prosperity, when we were not only our own exclusive carriers, but almost the only neutral nation that could carry for Europe; when our flag claimed respect from every belligerent, and commanded a ready and profitable freight on every sea, those who administered this Government, still following the policy that gave life to our navigation, never even agitated the question of increasing the duties on these articles so important to that interest. No, sir, it was not until after that war that the hand of the Government was laid on the tonnage interest of the country. The first act was to abolish all discriminating duties; the next to form a new tariff. Against the first our merchants did not remonstrate. Conscious that American enterprise, if left free, could engage successfully in competition with that of any other nation, they yielded to the views of the Government, in this particular, without remonstrance or complaint. In the other measure they did not acquiesce with so much readiness. They saw, or thought they saw, the germ of a new principle, which in its growth and progress might so change our national policy as to embarrass an interest which had heretofore contributed more than any other to the wealth of the country.

The tariff of 1816 was, however, unlike the present in its origin, its provisions, and its objects. Its origin was in Congress: its provisions were equal; its object was revenue. We had just emerged from an expensive war; our national debt had been greatly increased; the double duties, the excise, and the direct taxes, were about expiring, when Congress, of its own mere motion, unsolicited from any quarter, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and report an entire new tariff of duties. Those of us who were in either House at that time, cannot have forgotten the masterly manner in which that duty was performed. Facts bearing upon the subject were collected from all parts of the country; from the seaboard, and the interior; from the merchant, the agriculturist, and the manufacturer. The whole were submitted to Congress, and resulted in the act of 1816. This was what the Senator from Missouri might well call a "whole tariff." It looked to the Treasury and the interests of the whole country. We have had no equal and general tariff since. The work has been that of patching and deforming, rather than improving the act of 1816.

Take iron, for instance: The duty on that article in 1816 was nine dollars per ton; in 1818 it was increased to fifteen dollars; in 1824 further increased to eighteen dollars per ton; and now the struggle is to get it up to twenty-two dollars and fifty cents per ton. An article which, in addition to its great use in ship building, enters into the construction of almost every implement of husbandry—of almost every kind of machinery—now paying an increased duty of one hundred per cent, on that laid in 1816, is about to be subjected to still higher imposition. So of hemp: This article, in 1816, paid a duty of thirty dollars per ton; in 1824 it was raised to thirty-five; and now it is proposed to carry it up to sixty dollars per ton—precisely one hundred per cent upon the duty of 1816.

There is no nation on earth that has gone on as we have for the last twelve years, in heaping embarrassment on our navigation. There is no interest that can stand against such heavy and increasing pressure. Do the ship owners deserve this from the Government? What would have been the situation of the Treasury, but for the streams which have supplied it through the instrumentality of navigation? What would have been the situation of the navy, but for the recruits it had drawn from the merchant service?

Sir, this bill will bear with unexampled, I may say, almost insupportable, severity upon the shipping interest of the State with which I am officially connected. That State owns 174,768 tons of shipping. By calculations furnished me from experienced riggers and ship builders, every hundred tons of vessel require four tons of hemp, and something exceeding that quantity of iron. To construct the amount of tonnage owned in Maine would therefore require upwards of 6,988 tons of hemp, and the like or a greater quantity of iron. The bare duties, as contemplated by this bill, that must be paid into the Treasury, upon this quantity of hemp, would amount to $419,280, and upon iron to $157,230.

Now, sir, I will proceed and show what will be the annual expense to the shipping interest of that State. It is estimated that of the whole tonnage of the country, from one-eighth to one-tenth, is annually lost or rendered unfit for employment, either by decay or marine casualties. To keep the original quantity good, there must be annually built a new supply, equal at least to one-tenth of the whole. To construct this new supply requires seven hundred tons of iron, the duties on which, by this bill, would be $15,750. It is also estimated that all the manufactures of hemp that are put upon a ship, must be replaced once in four years, in consequence of decay. Taking also into the account the losses at sea, this is not probably an extravagant calculation. To do this, to keep this tonnage properly rigged and found, requires the annual application of 1,747 tons of hemp, the duties on which, as contemplated to be increased by this bill, will amount to $104,820, making an aggregate of $120,570 tax on the ship owners of Maine, annually, in the form of duties, merely, on the articles of hemp and iron used in the construction of vessels—a sum much exceeding the whole civil expenditure of that State.

We have been told this is to be an equal, a "whole tariff;" that it is a great system for the benefit of the whole; and whatever of burthen may be involved in it, must be borne equally by all. I assent most fully to the principle of equality of burthens; but I deny pre-emptorily that there is any thing of equality in the bill under discussion. It has been asserted in the course of this debate, by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MARKS,] that the country is to be benefitted to the amount of four millions of dollars—and that his State would derive a larger share of this benefit than any other. Sir, I have no doubt of the fact. I admit that portions of this community are to be benefitted; but it will be to the serious injury, if not the ruin, of great and important interests in other sections of the country.

Let us bring this "equal tariff" to the test: What proportion of the four millions of which the Senator speaks is to fall to the share of Maine? And what particular branch of her industry is to be benefitted? Is it her lumber trade? Is it her fisheries? Is it her tonnage interest? No, sir; all these are to be taxed—severely taxed—while Pennsylvania, with a few other States, is to derive the benefit. Within the State of Maine are twelve collection districts, the aggregate of whose tonnage is upwards of 174,000 tons. It has been shown to what extent this is to be embarrassed and taxed. The whole tonnage of Pennsylvania is but 73,000 tons, less than that of Maine by more than 100,000 tons. This, then, is to be the operation of the "equal tariff": Pennsylvania is to derive benefit, and Maine to pay for it.

In the course of the discussion much has been said about the origin of this great system. It has been repeatedly charged upon the Eastern or New England States; and it has as often been asserted, that, as New England projected the measure, as she got up the excitement, she must pay for it; that the bill must be so modified as to bear adversely upon her interests, and be carried at her expense.

Now, sir, I deny both the assertion and the inference. I deny that the New England States, generally, and especially that Maine had any exclusive agency in originating or promoting the measure. I deny that we are answerable, either directly or indirectly, for its origin or its progress. When this doctrine of protection was first advanced, in no part of this Union did it find more zealous advocates than in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Were a State now to be named that has done more than any other to bring this subject before Congress and the American People, that State would be found west of the Hudson. I call the attention of the Senate, particularly the Senators from Pennsylvania, to what has been done in that State. Who originated the Convention at Harrisburg, to which this measure is to be directly traced, and which, in the course of this debate, has been eulogized as "the most enlightened and intelligent body that were ever assembled in this country?" Was it either of the New England States? No, sir; it was the "Pennsylvania Society for the promotion of Manufactures and Mechanic Arts." I will not mention names, but will merely point the attention of gentlemen to a single individual in Philadelphia who has been laboring with ability on this subject for years, and who has done more with his pen to promote what is called the "American System," than has been done by any individual or association, in either or all of the six Eastern States. Proceeding further south, to Maryland, and what has been done there? The pen and the press in the hands of an able and distinguished editor in the city of Baltimore, have probably accomplished more than in all the other cities in the Union. I speak with high respect of these individuals. Far be it from me to doubt the purity of their motives, or the sincerity of their opinions. They are high minded men, who, when we were involved in war, came forward manfully and advocated the cause of the country. One of them did much by the influence of a work which he published in those doubtful times, to confirm the minds of the People and uphold their true interests. These men may well be called the fathers of the system.

Having thus shown, I think, that whatever of excitement may have been raging through the country, is not chargeable to New England—I will now speak of Maine. That State had no representation in the Harrisburg Convention. She has not petitioned for, but has remonstrated against, any change in the existing tariff. Her memorials are now on our tables. She has not been excitable on this subject. As a further evidence of her feeling, I refer to the vote of her Representatives in the last Congress, on the "woollen bill." Sir, of all the New England votes that were given against that bill in the House at the last session, four-fifths were from Maine. Her course still remains unchanged, and against this bill she has given an unanimous vote. Now, sir, I ask gentlemen who avow their intention of passing this bill in a shape to bear severely on the Eastern States, and such avowal has been made and reiterated, to consider what they are about to do. Will its operations be equal, even there? A stronger illustration cannot be given than by a statement of facts. It has been shown that its pressure will be most severe upon the commercial interest in connexion with lumber and the fisheries. What is the comparative tonnage of the Eastern States? Maine has 174,000 tons; New Hampshire only 24,000; Rhode Island 37,000; Connecticut 48,000; Vermont none. I invite the attention of the Senate to these facts, furnishing proof unanswerable, of the unequal and severe operation of this "system," even among neighboring and contiguous States.

Mr. President: The continual scramble that is excited among the States for the public lands—for extravagant appropriations from the Treasury for Internal Improvements, followed by this attempt to increase the revenue at the expense of some of the most important branches of industry, has almost made me a convert to a new opinion—I do not say to a new doctrine—for it is by no means certain, but it is the doctrine upon which this Government was founded and first administered. I allude to an idea advanced the other day by a Senator from Missouri, that it may become expedient to bring back the revenue of the Government to a sum barely sufficient for its support. In doing this, we should get rid of the almost innumerable applications upon which we are now called to legislate, highly calculated to produce sectional feelings, and sectional votes too. We should then remove even the suspicion that any portion of the revenue drawn from the pockets of the People, in one section of the Union, would be expended for the exclusive benefit of another.

It is by no means certain but that, by a recurrence on our part to the principles upon which and the objects for which this association of States was formed, this Government might again proceed as harmoniously as it did under its first administration. And how is this to be accomplished? Not by any unnecessary increase of taxation, more especially unequal taxation. No, sir; but by drawing no more from the People than the ordinary operations of the Government require. By discharging the public debt, and repealing the duties, instead of increasing them on articles of prime necessity—and by adhering to the principle that the resources of the nation are more safe under the control of the People than in possession of the Treasury. Following out this idea, I am opposed to the bill, because it will increase the revenue unnecessarily; because it will take from the People what the public service does not demand.

I have gone thus fully into this subject that the Senate might see the nature of the trade in which we are engaged, the importance and value of that trade, and the manner in which this bill will operate upon it.

I have shown how our shipping interest is to be affected, as well by curtailing its employment as by increasing its expense. I have shown the unequal operation of the measure, and that we are in no wise chargeable as having originated or supported it. I have been only anxious to discharge my duty to my constituents, to present their situation fairly to the Senate, under a hope that we may yet escape this impending danger.

Maine, sir, has always been willing—she is still willing—to bear her full proportion of the public burthens. When this nation was involved in war her citizens rallied round its standard. She furnished her proportion of means for the Treasury, of recruits for the army, and seamen for the navy. She is not blest, like the regions of the West, with a mild climate and luxuriant soil. If, therefore, her seamen and her fishermen whose farms have been upon the ocean, are driven from their accustomed employment, they can obtain but a scanty subsistence from farms on the land.

I take leave of this subject by adding, that, if we are let alone—if, by high duties and too much regulation, our fortunes are not prostrated, and our enterprise discouraged, we are a happy, and, if the word were proper in this country, a loyal People. Such we wish to remain—and, wishing this, we cannot look but with fear and deprecation upon the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. DICKERSON said that the prosperity spoken of as enjoyed by Maine, he was aware did exist. But how had they gained all this prosperity? He by no means denied them the merit of great enterprise and industry, but their commercial prosperity had chiefly arisen out of the discriminations in favor of American tonnage, and the protection to the fisheries. He did not wish to impose any unfair burthen on any State; and believed that it would not bear so heavily on Maine as the gentleman anticipated. The gentleman's calculations as to iron were not correct. The duty on foreign iron had obliged the importer to reduce the price of his iron, or to be driven out of the market by the domestic manufacturer. Mr. D. then alluded to the memorial presented by Mr. SMITH. He thought that it was for the benefit of a few persons in Baltimore. The rolling of copper was so easy a process that it hardly deserved the name of manufacture. He did not think the duty ought to be imposed.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. was very glad he had made his motion, as it had drawn from his friend from Maine one of the best speeches he had heard this session—a speech which could not be got rid of. It hung like a mill-stone round the neck of the gentleman from New-Jersey. He had said that it was from the discriminating duties that the prosperity of the ship-owners of Maine arose. It was not so. The merchants themselves, when they found they could do without it, came forward and said they could dispense with the discrimination. They knew that, with any thing like equality, they could compete successfully with any nation. But, he says, the fisheries also have contributed to this prosperity. In this he was also in error. The bounty is not any advantage to the fisherman; its operation is upon the consumption of salt; and when the duty upon that article has been taken off, the bounty has been removed also. So that the argument in relation to the fisheries will not do. It is said that this duty reduces the price of iron—but it is erroneous. No man takes less profit than he can get, and every man makes all that he can. Is it then to be supposed that the manufacturer, when he has the market to himself, will not keep the article as high as he can? Other causes have operated. The Rail Roads in England, and water, instead of land carriage, in Denmark, Sweden and Norway. These are the causes of the fall in the price of iron, and not the moderation of the domestic manufacturer. The gentleman thinks my proposition is for the benefit of the merchants of Baltimore. He seems to suppose that we have copper mines, which we wish to work. I have often heard of them, but believe they exist chiefly in the imagination. I presume, when we explore the Rocky Mountains, we shall find them, and not before. As to the article of copper sheathing, it was one of no small importance, and it was essential that it should be of a good quality. Mr. S. concluded by a statement as to the cost of copper for sheathing a vessel of two hundred tons.

Mr. PARRIS replied to the remarks of Mr. DICKERSON. He considered that the commercial prosperity of the country grew up from the wars in Europe, and the advantages enjoyed by us in the carrying trade. And now I will shew, said Mr. P. what has been done for our commercial interests. The very first step taken after the peace, was to open our ports to all nations, on their reciprocating the privilege. England, France, and other countries, accepted of these terms, and carried on a trade with us upon them. I do not complain of this, because we can, with the industry and enterprise of our navigators, compete with any other country on fair and equal terms. It is plain, however, that the statement of the gentleman from New-Jersey, that our commercial prosperity is owing to discriminations in our favor, is not correct. But I do complain, that, at that very time the tax on iron was brought up to 18 dollars, and that on hemp to 35 dollars. Thus, while we were exposed to the competition of other countries, by the repeal of the discriminating duties on tonnage, a burthen was inflicted on our commerce, by increasing the price of the articles used in the building of ships. This was the protection to the shipping of which the gentleman speaks—and this was all.

Mr. NOBLE, in rising, asked whether it was proper, when they had been talking about adjournment continually, to allow themselves to be detained, on a single point, and a very trifling point of the bill. I said something the other day about long-winded speeches, and I was called to order for doing so. I thought it was a little hard—but I now think I was in the right; for it appears that we are to have them in plenty. When you talk of adjournment, and predict that much talking will prevent it, you are stopped. Yet we have had splendid speeches, going back for years into the history of this system; but we don't come to the point. I want people to come out. I am now ready to vote. I consider the subject matter of much of this debate got up for home consumption. I do not like the manner in which this debate goes on. Every thing seems to be crowded in upon one point. We cannot get along, it seems, unless, in considering a motion on copper, we are to hear a speech on war, peace, molasses, iron, commercial ruin, and a military road. I do not like this course—first one thing is read, then another. Molasses is fixed upon the bill to poison it. Maine is to bear all the evil. This is the burthen of the song; and the lamentation over Maine is to stop the bill in its progress. I hope not. Who ever dreamed that Maine could have borne all the sins of New-England? I don't think that possible, neither do I think she will suffer as gentlemen seem to apprehend. I wish the business to go on, without interruption; and not the whole bill be delayed twenty-four hours upon a single point.

Mr. HAYNE said, that although he might incur the censure of the gentleman from Indiana, by prolonging the debate, he would apologize to the Senate for delaying the question a few moments. He sympathized with the gentleman from Maine, in the oppression which the bill threatened to inflict on that State; and he would say that the burthens with which she was threatened, should not be imposed with his [Mr. H's] consent. I have, said Mr. H. formerly expressed my opinion as to the operation of this system upon the South. I know that it is ruinous, that it is partial, that it is unjust. I agree with the gentleman from Maine entirely, that unless we come back to the sound principles of the country, which have so long been abandoned, the harmony, the peace, and the prosperity of the Union are endangered. In every view, this system is one of doubtful character. Its benefits are so concatenated with evils, that they can scarcely be separated. But I would ask of any gentleman who now advocates this bill, to turn to the act of 1824, and put his finger on one single item of the bill which has benefited the South? I will further ask you to look at the bill on your table, and shew me the item, except molasses, in which the South is now interested. There is not a provision that holds out a shadow of benefit to us, whilst Pennsylvania is to reap four millions from its operation.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had made the avowal yesterday that the States interested in the articles to be protected by this bill would derive advantages from it equal to four millions of dollars. That, from a calculation Mr. H. had seen on the subject, he believed that the burthens imposed by the bill on those who were to bear them, did not fall short of that amount. The gentleman, after telling us that Pennsylvania was interested in iron and whiskey, the West in hemp, and New-England in woollens, had avowed his determination to vote for the duty on molasses, (although it entered into competition with the whiskey of Pennsylvania) because he believed that sacrifice to be necessary to obtain the support of New-England to the bill, without which the bill would fail, and the benefit of the four millions of dollars would be lost. As a Southern man, [Mr. H. said] he could not stand by and witness a compromise by which certain States were to gain such advantages at the expense of those he represented. In what way are we interested in this bill? In no possible manner. We are to suffer all; to bear the burthen patiently; and to do this that other parts of the country may grow rich upon our ruin!

The gentleman from New-Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON] in answer to the complaints of the Senator from Maine, with respect to the oppressive operation of the bill on the shipping interest of New-England, had said, in the language of condolence, that they had only to transfer the tax to those in whose service the New-England shipping was employed—in other words, sir, don't mind the tax, put it on the South, make them pay for it. This is the principle throughout. The South must, and does, pay dearly indeed for this system of protection, which leaves her unprotected.

I say, sir, that in this business, from beginning to end, the interests of the South have been sacrificed, shamefully sacrificed! Her feelings have been disregarded; her wishes slighted; her honest pride insulted! I say that this system has created discordant feelings, strife, jealousy, and heart-burnings, which never ought to exist between the different sections of the same country. I repeat, that the feelings of the South have been disregarded, and her remonstrances slighted; and shall we sit coolly, and see the parties who are to benefit by this system, compromise with each other, while we are to be the losers under all circumstances? If the system be a good one, let its merits be fairly tested; let it be acted upon as it deserves; and, if its operation be not beneficial, let it be abandoned. Let it stand on its own merits. On such a principle, its operation would be less dangerous; as it is at present, it could scarcely appear more so.

Mr. BENTON made a few remarks, which were imperfectly heard. He was understood to say that the four millions of profits from the system spoken of by the Senator from Pennsylvania, could not be distributed over the whole country. It was impossible but it should work partially.

The question being then taken, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision levying a duty of 50 per centum ad valorem on vermicelli; which was rejected, on a division—19 to 25.

Mr. SMITH, of Md, moved to strike out "30th June," and insert "15th of September," as the time at which the bill shall go into operation; which having been briefly discussed by Messrs. McLANE, SMITH, of Md. and DICKERSON, on whose motion the yeas and nays were ordered, the question was taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the bill by striking out the third section.

Mr. FOOT said, that he believed that the duty on every article in that section, bore very hard upon the commercial interest; and he therefore wished it struck out. It would have a highly injurious operation on the commerce of New-England. The charge had been made, that the excitement in relation to this measure had been produced by New-England. The charge had been made, tauntingly, he thought, perhaps jocosely—and many remarks had been made in the course of debate, which were any thing but palatable to the members from New-England. He was surprised, yesterday, to hear a gentleman from North-Carolina propose to give New-England a dose of medicine, which, at least, was not over courteous. But a remark had fallen from the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BAXTER] to which we are not entitled. He says that New-England originated these tariff bills, and consequently argues that we must not complain. This is not the case. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, relative to the vote on the bill, and the motive which might induce it, he Mr. F. should always vote as he considered for the country, he hoped without views of a partial nature. He was averse to this section of the bill particularly. It laid heavy duties on articles essential to ship-building. On hemp, the tax would be seriously felt, and yet he did not think this very high duty would bring the domestic article into use. On flax, also, the duty was exorbitant, and he could see no competent reason for it. On sail duck, the duty was very high; at nine cents per square yard, it was about one hundred per cent. But, of all the duties, in all the tariff bills that had ever been passed, he considered the duty on molasses the most offensive. It was an article of necessity which ought not to be taxed. But, it is said, that it was manufactured into rum, and on this ground its taxation was defended. This was very true. But gentlemen should consider that it is already taxed by this bill, by the withdrawal of four cents drawback, which operated as four cents additional duty. It should also be recollected that, by far the largest quantity of the article was used for domestic purposes, and that, mixed with water, it made a pleasant beverage for the laboring classes in the warm season. And Congress ought to be cautious how they placed a high duty on an article from which no advantage could be gained by any class of manufacturers, and which might be replaced by ardent spirits. He could not believe that the manufacturer of whiskey needed this additional protection. The duty on molasses was now about eighty per centum, and it was increased four cents on the gallon by this bill, at least so far as concerned the article converted into rum, by the withdrawal of the drawback. He had been informed yesterday, by the Senator from New-York, [Mr. VAN BUREN] that the manufacturer of rum would receive an encouragement from the duty on foreign spirits. This Mr. F. thought an error. The duty on the latter will exclude them from our markets, so that there will be no competition. But it is not for home consumption that this rum is manufactured. It is exported; and the export will be injured, if not destroyed, by this high duty on molasses. Besides, the molasses which was generally used in distillation, is of the poorest kind—sour and unfit for use—and upon this article the duty would be as heavy as upon that which was worth double its value. The closing remarks of Mr. F. were not heard by the Reporter.

Mr. BRANCH replied to the remarks of Mr. FOOT.

Mr. MARKS rose to explain some of the expressions which he had made yesterday, which had been so much tortured, as he considered, from their fair interpretation. He had merely intended to say, he thought there would be no advantage in the duty on molasses. It had been said previously, that this duty would be of great advantage to Pennsylvania and the Western States, by giving a vent to their spirits. But he had expressed a doubt as to such an effect. He also said, that if there would be some slight advantage from this measure, he was willing to forego it, rather than to risk the loss of the other and more beneficial effects of the bill. He thought that the encouragement of the manufactures would cause a consumption to agricultural productions which would overbalance the consideration of the tax on molasses. He made some further remarks upon the effects which the encouragement of manufactures would produce in reducing the price of commodities, consuming the products of the country. He observed that the manufactures of the country already made use of one-fourth of the cotton crop of the Union.

Mr. HAYNE said, he had replied solely to the remarks of the gentleman made yesterday. He had then made use of but two arguments—the one, that they had better relinquish the duty on molasses, rather than endanger the bill; and the other, that the duty was not recommended by the Harrisburg Convention. In this latter point, he was then corrected by his colleague, who read a resolution of the Convention, recommending the duty. As to the new argument that the high rate of duties would not enhance the prices of commodities, he would ask, why then does not the gentleman vote for the duty on molasses? By his own theory, the people of New-England could suffer no injury by it. If the gentleman is as unfortunate in all his facts, as in that in relation to cotton, they cannot be much depended upon. He says, that the manufacturers now consume one-third of the cotton produced in the country. This was an error. Mr. H. could prove to the gentleman, and would do it at a proper time, that not more than one-fifth was so consumed.

Mr. MARKS said that the gentleman could not have forgotten that he remarked, yesterday, in giving his reasons for opposing the duty on molasses, that he doubted the capacity of the manufacturers to supply the consumption of the country. It was, therefore, a different case from a manufactory which, with encouragement, might take the place of the foreign article.

Mr. FOOT replied briefly to some remarks of Mr. BRANCH, to which

Mr. BRANCH rejoined.

Mr. FOOT said a few words, and alluded to some remarks made yesterday by Mr. ROWAN.

Mr. ROWAN rose to reply. After a few remarks, he said, that, to come back to the woollens, he would ask what was the origin of the Harrisburg Convention? and who created the excitement? It was known that the sole object of that convention was ~~not~~ manufactures. It was, although people did not like to speak out, got up for political purposes. He would ask how many Jackson men were in that convention? It was true that the people of New England were interested in every article protected by the bill, with the exception of those articles in the section which it was now proposed to strike out. He believed that the people of New England had collected for the last three years a tax of four millions on the Southern and Western people in the articles of clothing. They ought to bear their share of these burthens. It might be said that the clothing was necessary, and must be had in time of war. So were flax, and hemp, and iron. They must be had for our ships. He was against the bill on principle. Manufactures produced wealth, and wealth unequally distributed, as an inevitable consequence, hekl by few, produced aristocracy, and aristocracy sapped the foundation of free institutions. Thus he argued, that inordinate protection to manufactures was dangerous to the best interests of the country.

FRIDAY, MAY 9, 1828.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr BERRIEN moved that the message from the other House relative to the adjournment be taken up; agreed to.

Mr BERRIEN had no intention to discuss the question. But he thought it but decorous to consider the question. He trusted there was no objection to fixing upon the day, nor was it probable that a later period would be decided upon by the Senate. He, therefore, moved that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House of Representatives, directing the presiding officers of the two Houses to adjourn on the 26th of May. He would not anticipate any discussion, and should say nothing farther, unless the motion were opposed.

Mr. DICKERSON thought a fortnight's notice of adjournment was sufficient, and that would be had by concurring in the resolution on Monday next. He asked the yeas and nays on concurring; which was sustained.

Mr JOHNSON of Ken. said, he was of opinion that no man believed the Senate could, or would, or ought to sit longer than the 26th May. It would be an advantage to know how many days the Senate was to sit, and would, he thought, expedite the business.

Mr. McKINLEY said, that he voted the other day against the resolution, and he would now state his reason for having done so. The State of Alabama was deeply interested in a bill which had been three years before Congress, and had now been acted upon by the other House. For this reason he had voted against the motion a few days since. He should now vote for it. He could not but remark that the friends of the Tariff bill seemed to look upon any motion to adjourn as a treasonable act. This, however, was no argument with him, and he was now in favor of fixing the time for the adjournment.

Mr. HARRISON rose to say, that he, for one, did not come under the remark of the gentleman from Alabama, although he was a friend of the Tariff.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that, as he did not think it expedient to take the final question on the resolution at present, he would move to lay the message and the resolution on the table.

The question being then taken by yeas and nays, it was decided in the affirmative.

DEPORTED SLAVES.

On motion of Mr TYLER, the bill to settle the claims of individuals provided for by the 1st article of the Treaty of Ghent was taken up, and the proviso offered yesterday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, being under consideration, Mr. TYLER spoke at great length in opposition to the motion, when, on motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the bill was laid on the table.

TARIFF BILL.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then taken up, being the bill altering the several acts laying duties on imports; the motion of Mr. FOOT, to strike out the 3d section still pending.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to divide the question so as to take the vote on each item embraced by the section, separately.

After some slight conversation, Mr. FOOT withdrew his motion; which was renewed by Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. DICKERSON renewed his motion to divide the question; which was agreed to.

Mr. SILSBEE then spoke at considerable length in favor of the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER said:—This subject is surrounded with embarrassments, on all sides. Of itself, however wisely or temperately treated, it is full of difficulties, and these difficulties have not been diminished by the particular frame of this bill, nor by the manner, hitherto pursued, of proceeding with it. A diversity of interest exists, or is supposed to exist, in different parts of the country. This is one source of difficulty. Different opinions are entertained as to the constitutional power of Congress; this is another. And then, again, different members of the Senate have instructions, which they feel bound to obey, and which clash with one another. We have this morning seen an Honorable Member from New York, an important motion being under consideration, lay his instructions on the Table, and point to them, as his power of attorney, and as containing the directions for his vote.

Those who intend to oppose this bill, under all circumstances, and in all or any forms, care not how objectionable it now is, or how bad it may be made. Others, finding their own leading objects satisfactorily secured by it, naturally enough press forward, without staying to consider, deliberately, how injuriously other interests may be affected. All these causes create embarrassments, and inspire just fears, that a wise and useful result is hardly to be expected. There seems a strange disposition to run the hazard of extremes; and to forget, that in cases of this kind, measure, proportion, and degree, are objects of inquiry, and the true rules of judgment. I have not had the slightest wish to discuss the measure; nor believing that, in the present state of things, any good could be done by me, in that way. But the frequent declarations that this was altogether a New England measure, a bill for securing a monopoly to the capitalists of the North, and other expressions of a similar nature, have induced me to say a few words.

New England, Sir, has not been a leader in this policy. On the contrary, she held back, herself, and tried to hold others back from it, from the adoption of the Constitution to 1824. Up to 1824, she was accused of sinister and selfish designs, because she discountenanced the progress of this policy. It was laid to her charge, then, that having established her manufactures herself, she wished that others should not have the power of rivaling her; and, for that reason, opposed all legislative encouragement. Under this angry denunciation against her, the act of 1824 passed. Now the imputation is precisely of an opposite character. The present measure is pronounced to be exclusively for the benefit of New England; to be brought forward by her agency, and designed to gratify the cupidity of her wealthy establishments.

Both charges, Sir, are equally without the slightest foundation. The opinion of New England, up to 1824, was founded in the conviction, that, on the whole, it was wisest and best, both for herself and others, that manufactures should make haste slowly. She felt a reluctance to trust great interests on the foundation of Government patronage; for who could tell how long such patronage would last, or with what steadiness, skill, or perseverance, it would continue to be granted? It is now nearly fifteen years, since, among the first things which I ever ventured to say here, was the expression of a serious doubt, whether this Government was fitted by its construction, to administer aid and protection to particular pursuits; whether, having called such pursuits into being by indications of its favor it would not, afterwards, desert them, when troubles come upon them, and leave them to their fate. Whether this prediction, the result, certainly, of chance, and not of sagacity, will so soon be fulfilled, remains to be seen.

At the same time it is true, that from the very first commencement of the Government, those who have administered its concerns have held a tone of encouragement and invitation toward those who should embark in manufactures. All the Presidents, I believe, without exception have concurred, in this general sentiment; and the very first act of Congress, laying duties of impost, adopted the then unusual expedient of a preamble, apparently for little other purpose than that of declaring, that the duties, which it imposed, were imposed for the encouragement and protection of manufactures. When, at the commencement of the late war, duties were doubled, we were told that we should find a mitigation of the weight of taxation in, the new aid and succour which would be thus afforded to our own manufacturing labor. Like arguments were urged, and prevailed, but not by the aid of New England votes, when the tariff was afterwards arranged at the close of the war, in 1816. Finally, after a whole winter's deliberation, the act of 1824, received the sanction of both Houses of Congress, and settled the policy of the country. What, then, was New England to do? She was fitted for manufacturing operations, by the amount and character of her population, by her capital, by the vigor and energy of her free labor, by the skill, economy, enterprise, and perseverance of her people. I repeat, what was she, under these circumstances, to do? A great and prosperous rival in her near neighborhood, threatening to draw from her a part, perhaps a great part, of her foreign commerce; was she to use, or to neglect, those other means of seeking her own prosperity which belonged to her character and her condition? Was she to hold out, forever, against the course of the Government, and see herself losing, on one side, and yet making no efforts to sustain herself on the other? No Sir. Nothing was left to New England, after the act of 1824, but to conform herself to the will of others. Nothing was left to her, but to consider that the Government had fixed and determined its own policy; and that policy was protection.

New England, poor, in some respects, in others, is as wealthy as her neighbors. Her soil would be held in low estimation, by those who are acquainted with the valley of the Mississippi, and some of the meadows of the South. But in industry, in habits of labor, skill, and in accumulated capital, the fruit of two centuries of industry, she may be said to be rich. After this final declaration—this solemn promulgation of the policy of the Government, I again ask, what was she to do? Was she to deny herself the use of her advantages, natural and acquired? Was she to content herself with useless regrets? Was she longer to resist, what she could no longer prevent? Or, was she, rather to adapt her acts to her condition; and seeing the policy of the Government thus settled and fixed, to accommodate to it, as well as she could, her own pursuits, and her own industry? Every man will see that she had no option. Every man will confess that there remained for her but one course. She not only saw this herself, but had, all along, foreseen that if the system of protecting manufactures should be adopted, she must go largely into them. I believe, Sir, almost every man from New England who voted against the law of 1824, declared, that, if notwithstanding his opposition to that law, it should pass, there would be no alternative but to consider the course and policy of the Government as then settled and fixed, and to act accordingly. The law did pass; and a vast increase of investment in manufacturing establishments was the consequence. Those who made such investments, probably entertained not the slightest doubt that as much as was promised would be effectually granted; and that if, owing to any unforeseen occurrence, or untoward event, the benefit designed by the law, to any branch of manufactures, should not be realized, it would furnish a fair case for the consideration of Government. Certainly they could not expect, after what had passed, that interests of great magnitude would be left at the mercy of the very first change of circumstances which might occur.

As a general remark, it may be said, that the interests concerned in the act of 1824, did not complain of their condition under it, excepting only those connected with the woollen manufactures. These did complain; not so much of the act itself, as of a new state of circumstances, unforeseen when the law passed, but which had now arisen to thwart its beneficial operations, as to them; although in one respect, perhaps the law itself was thought to be unwisely framed.

Three causes have been generally stated, as having produced the disappointment experienced by the manufacturers of wool, under the law of 1824.

First, it is alleged, that the price of the raw material had been raised too high, by the act itself. This point had been discussed at the time, and although opinions varied, the result so far as it depended on this part of the case, though it may be said to have been unexpected, was certainly not entirely unforeseen.*

But, secondly, the manufacturers imputed their disappointment to a reduction of the price of wool in England, which took place just about the date of the law of 1824. This reduction was produced by lowering the duty on imported wool from sixpence sterling to one penny sterling per pound. The effect of this is obvious enough; but in order to see the real extent of the reduction, it maybe convenient to state the matter more particularly.

The meaning of our law was doubtless to give the American manufacturer an advantage over his English competitors. Protection must mean this, or it means nothing. The English manufacturer having certain advantages, on his side, such as the lower price of labor, and the lower interest of money, the object of our law was to counteract these advantages, by creating others, in behalf of the American manufacturer. Therefore to see what was necessary to be done, in order that the American manufacturer might sustain the competition, a relative view of the respective advantages was to be taken. In this view the very first element to be considered was, what is to each party the cost of the raw material. On this, the whole must materially depend. Now when the law of 1824 passed, the English manufacturer paid a duty of sixpence sterling on imported wool. But in a few days afterwards, the duty was reduced by parliament from sixpence to a penny. A reduction of five pence per pound, in the price of wool, was estimated in Parliament to be equal to a reduction of twenty six per cent. ad valorem, on all imported wool; and this reduction, it is obvious, had its effect on the price of home-produced wool also. Almost, then, at the very moment, that the framers of the act of 1824, were raising the price of the raw material here, as that act did raise it, it was lowered in England, by the very great reduction of twenty six per cent. Of course, this changed the whole basis of the calculation. It wrought a complete change in the relative advantages and disadvantages of the English and American competitors; and threw the preponderance of advantage, most decidedly on the side of the English. If the American manufacturer had not vastly too great a preference, before this reduction took place, it is clear he had too little afterwards.

* Extract from Mr. Webster's Speech, on the Tariff of 1824. "This Bill proposes, also, a very high duty upon imported wool; and as far as I can learn, a majority of the manufacturers are at least extremely doubtful whether, taking these two provisions together, the state of the law is not better for them now than it would be if this bill should pass."

In a paper which has been presented to the Senate, and often referred to; a paper distinguished for the ability and clearness with which it enforces general principles—the Boston Report—it is clearly proved, (what indeed is sufficiently obvious from the mere comparison of dates) that the British Government did not reduce its duty on wool, because of our act of 1824. Certainly this is true; but the effect of that reduction, on our manufactures, was the same precisely as if the British act had been designed to operate against them, and for no other purpose. (I think it cannot be doubted that our law of 1824, and the reduction of the wool duty in England, taken together, left our manufactures in a worse condition than they were before. If there was any reasonable ground therefore, for passing the law of 1824, there is now the same ground for some other measure; and this ground too is reinforced by the consideration of hopes excited, the enterprises undertaken, and the capital invested, in consequence of that law.)

So much, Sir, for this cause of disappointment.

In the last place, it was alleged by the manufacturers, that they suffered from the mode of collecting the duties on woollen fabrics at the Custom Houses. These duties are ad valorem duties. Such duties from the commencement of the government, have been estimated by reference to the invoice, as fixing the value at the place whence imported. When not suspected to be false or fraudulent, the invoice is the regular proof of value. Originally this was a tolerably safe mode of proceeding. While the importation was mainly in the hands of American merchants, the invoice would, of course, if not false or fraudulent, express terms and the price of an actual purchase and sale. But an invoice is not necessarily an instrument expressing the sale of goods and their prices. If there be but a list or catalogue, with prices stated by way of estimate, it is still an invoice, and within the law. Now the suggestion is, that the English manufacturer, in making out an invoice, in which prices are thus stated by himself, in the way of estimate merely, is able to obtain an important advantage over the American merchant who purchases in the same market, and whose invoice states, consequently, the actual prices, on the sale. And in proof of this suggestion it is alleged, that in the largest importing city in the Union, a very great proportion, some say nearly all, of the woollen fabrics are imported on foreign accounts. The various papers which have come before us, praying for a tax on auction sales, aver that the invoice of the foreign importer is generally decidedly lower than that of the American importer; and that, in consequence of this and of the practice of the sales at auction, the American merchant must be driven out of the trade. I cannot answer for the entire accuracy of these statements, but I have no doubt there is something of truth in them. The main facts have been often stated, and I have neither seen nor heard a denial of them.

Is it true, then, that nearly the whole importation of woollens is, in the largest importing city, in the hands of foreigners? Is it true, as stated, that the invoices of such foreign importers are, generally, found to be lower than those of the American importer? If these things be so, it will be admitted that there is reason to believe that under-valuations do take place; and that some corrective for the evil should be administered. I am glad to see that the American merchants themselves, begin to bestow attention to a subject, as interesting to them as it is to the manufacturers.

Under this state of things, Sir, the law of the last session was proposed. It was confined, as I thought properly, to wool and woollens. It took up the great and leading subject of complaint, and nothing else.

It was urged indeed, against that Bill, that although much had been said of frauds at the custom house, no provision was made in it for the prevention of such frauds. That is a mistake. The general frame of the bill was such, that, if skilfully drawn and adapted to its purpose, its tendency to prevent such frauds would be manifest. By the fixing of prices at successive points of graduation, or minimums, as they are called, the power of evading duties by under-valuations would be most materially restrained. If these points, indeed, were sufficiently distant, it is obvious the duty would assume something of the certainty and precision of a specific duty. But this bill failed, and Congress adjourned, in March last year, leaving the subject where it had found it.

The complaints which had given rise to the bill, continued; and in the course of the summer, a meeting of the wool-growers and wool-manufacturers assembled in Pennsylvania, and agreed on a petition to Congress. I do not feel it necessary, on behalf of the citizens of Massachusetts, to disclaim a participation in that meeting. Persons of much worth and respectability attended it from Massachusetts, and its proceedings and results manifested, I think, a degree of temper and moderation, highly creditable to those who composed it.

But while the bill of last year was confined to that which alone had been a subject of complaint, the bill now before us is of a very different description. It proposes to raise duties on various other articles, besides wool and woollens. It contains some provisions which bear, with unnecessary severity, on the whole community; others which affect, with peculiar hardship, particular interests; while both of them benefit nobody and nothing but the Treasury. It contains provisions, which, with whatever motive put into it, it is confessed are now kept in, for the very purpose destroying the bill altogether; or, with the intent to compel those who expect to derive benefit, to feel smart from it also. Probably such a motive of action has not often been avowed.

The wool manufacturers think they have made out a case, for the interposition of Congress. They happen to live, principally, at the north and east; and, in a bill, professing to be for their relief, other provisions are found, which are supposed, (and supported, because they are supposed,) to be such as will press, with peculiar hardship, on that quarter of the country. Sir, what can be expected but evil when a temper like this prevails?—How can such a hostile retaliatory legislation be reconciled to common justice, or common prudence? Nay, sir, this rule of action seems carried still farther. Not only are clauses found, and continued in the bill, which oppress particular interests, but taxes are laid, also, which will be severely felt by the whole union; and this too with the same design, and for the same end before mentioned, of causing the smart of the bill to be felt. Of this description is the molasses tax; a tax, in my opinion, absurd and preposterous, in relation to any object of protection; needlessly oppressive to the whole community; and benefitting nobody on earth, but the Treasury. And yet, here it is, and here it is kept, under an idea, conceived in ignorance, and cherished for a short lived triumph that New England will be deterred, by this tax, from protecting her extensive woollen manufactures; or, if not, that the authors of this policy may at least have the pleasure, the high pleasure, of perceiving that she feels the effect of this bill.

Sir, let us look for a moment at this tax. The molasses imported into the United States amounts to thirteen millions of gallons annually. Of this quantity, not more than three millions are distilled; the remaining ten millions being consumed, as an article of wholesome food. The proposed tax is not to be laid for revenue. That is not pretended. It was not introduced for the benefit of the sugar planters. They are contented with their present condition, and have applied for nothing. What then, was the object? Sir, the original professed object, was, to increase, by this new duty on molasses, the consumption of spirits distilled from grain. This, I say, was the object originally professed. But in this point of view, the measure appears to me to be preposterous. It is monstrous and out of all proportion and relation of means to ends. It proposes to double the duty on the ten millions of gallons of molasses, which are consumed for food, in order that it may likewise double the duty on the three millions which are distilled into spirits; and all this, for the contingent and doubtful purpose of augmenting the consumption of spirits distilled from grain. I say contingent and doubtful purpose; because I do not believe any such effect will be produced. I do not think a hundred gallons more of spirits, distilled from grain will find a market in consequence of this tax on molasses. The debate here and elsewhere has shown that, I think clearly. But suppose some slight effect of that kind should be produced; is it so desirable an object, as that it should be sought by such means? Shall we tax food, to encourage intemperance? Shall we raise the price of a wholesome article of sustenance, of daily consumption, especially among the poorer classes, in order that we may enjoy a mere chance of causing these same classes to use more of our home made ardent spirits?

Sir, the bare statement of this question puts it beyond the reach of all argument. No man will seriously undertake the defence of such a tax. It is better, much more candid, certainly, to admit, as has been admitted, that obnoxious as it is, and abominable as it is, it is kept in the bill with a special view to its effects on New England votes, and New England interests.

The bill also takes away all the drawback, allowed by existing laws, on the exportation of spirits distilled from molasses; and this it is supposed, and truly supposed, will affect New England. It will considerably affect her; for the exportation of such spirits is a part of her trade, and though not great in amount, it is a part which mingles usefully with the exportation of other articles, assists to make out variety of cargo, and finds a market in the North of Europe, the Mediterranean, and in South America. This exportation the bill proposes entirely to destroy.

The increased duty on molasses, while it thus needlessly and wantonly enhances the price to the consumer, may affect also, in a greater or less degree, the importation of that article, and be thus injurious to the commerce of the country. The importation of molasses in exchange for lumber, provisions, and other articles of our own production, is one of the largest portions of our West India trade; a trade, it may be added, though of small profit, yet of short voyages, suited to small capitals, employing many hands, and much navigation, and the earliest and oldest branch of our foreign commerce. That portion of this trade which we now enjoy is conducted on the freest and most liberal principles. The exports which sustain it are from the East, the South, and the West—every part of the country having thus an interest in its continuance and extension. A market for these exports, to any of these portions of the country, is infinitely of more importance to it than all the benefit to be expected from the supposed increased consumption of spirits distilled from grain.

Yes, sir, this tax is to be kept in the bill, that New England may be made to feel. Gentlemen who hold it to be wholly unconstitutional to lay any tax whatever for the purposes intended by this bill, yet cordially vote for this tax. An honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] calls the whole bill a "bill of abominations." This tax, he agrees, is one of its abominations—yet he votes for it. Both the gentlemen from North Carolina have signified their dissatisfaction with the bill, yet they have both voted to double the tax on molasses. Sir, do gentlemen flatter themselves that this course of policy can answer their purposes? Do they not perceive that such a mode of proceeding, with a view to such avowed objects, must awaken a spirit that shall treat taunt with scorn, and bid menace defiance? Do they not know—if they do not, it is time that they did—that a policy like this, avowed with such self satisfaction, persisted in with a delight which should only accompany the discovery of some new and wonderful improvement in legislation, will compel every New England man to feel that he is degraded and debased if he does not resist it.

Sir, gentlemen mistake us: They greatly mistake us. To those who propose to conduct the affairs of Government, and to enact laws on such principles as these, and for such objects as these, New England, be assured, will exhibit not submission, but resistance; not humiliation, but disdain. Against her, depend on it, nothing will be gained by intimidation. If you propose to suffer yourselves, in order that she may suffer also, she will bid you come on—she will meet challenge with challenge—she will invite you to do your worst, and your best, and to see who will hold out longest. She has offered you every one of her votes in the Senate to strike out this tax on molasses. You have refused to join her, and to strike it out. With the aid of the votes of any one Southern State, for example, of North Carolina, it could have been struck out. But North Carolina has refused her votes for this purpose. She has voted to keep the tax in, and to keep it in at the highest rate. And yet, sir, North Carolina, whatever she may think of it, is fully as much interested in this tax as Massachusetts. I think, indeed, she is more interested, and that she will feel it more heavily and sorely. She is herself a great consumer of the article, throughout all her classes of population. This increase of the duty will levy on her citizens a new tax of fifty thousand dollars a year, or more, although her Representatives on this floor have so often told us that the People are now poor, and already borne down with taxes. North Carolina will feel this tax also in her trade, for what of foreign commerce has she more useful to her than the West Indian market for her provisions and lumber? And yet the gentlemen from North Carolina insist on keeping this tax in the bill. Let them not, then, complain. Let them not, hereafter, call it the work of others. It is their own work. Let them not lay it to the manufacturers. The manufacturers have had nothing to do with it. Let them not lay it to the wool growers. The wool growers have had nothing to do with it. Let them not lay it to New England. New England has done nothing but to oppose it, and to ask them to oppose it also. No, sir; let them take it to themselves. Let them enjoy the fruit of their own doings. Let them assign their motives for thus taxing their own constituents, and abide their judgment; but do not let them flatter themselves that New England cannot pay a molasses tax as long as North Carolina chooses that such a tax shall be paid.

Sir, I am sure there is nobody here envious of the prosperity of New England, or who would wish to see it destroyed. But if there be such any where, I cannot cheer them by holding out the hope of a speedy accomplishment of their wishes. The prosperity of New England, like that of other parts of the country, may, doubtless, be affected injuriously by unwise or unjust laws. It may be impaired, especially by an unsteady and shifting policy, which fosters particular objects to day, and abandons them to-morrow. She may advance faster, or slower; but the propelling principle, be assured, is in her deep, fixed, and active. Her course is onward and forward. The great powers of free labor, of moral habits, of general education, of good institutions, of skill, enterprise, and perseverance, are all working with her, and for her; and, on the small surface which her population covers, she is destined, I think, to exhibit striking results of the operation of these potent causes, in whatever constitutes the happiness or belongs to the ornament of human society.

Mr. President, this tax on molasses will benefit the Treasury, though it will benefit nobody else. Our finances will at least be improved by it. I assure the gentlemen we will endeavor to use the funds thus to be raised properly and wisely, and to the public advantage. We have already passed a bill for the Delaware Breakwater; another is before us for the improvement of several of our harbors; the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal bill has been brought into the Senate, while I have been speaking; and next session we hope to bring forward the breakwater at Nantucket. These appropriations, sir, will require pretty ample means: it will be convenient to have a well supplied Treasury, and I state for the especial consolation of the honorable gentlemen from North Carolina, that so long as they choose to compel their constituents, and my constituents, to pay a molasses tax, the proceeds thereof shall be appropriated, as far as I am concerned, to valuable national objects, in useful and necessary works of Internal Improvements.

Mr. President, in what I have now said, I have but followed where others have led, and compelled me to follow. I have but exhibited to gentlemen the necessary consequences of their own course of proceeding. But this manner of passing laws is wholly against my own judgment, and repugnant to all my feelings. And I would, even now, once more solicit gentlemen to consider whether a different course would not be more worthy of the Senate and more useful to the country. Why should we not act upon this bill article by article—judge fairly of each—retain what a majority approves—and reject the rest? If it be, as the gentleman from Maryland called it, a “bill of abominations,” why not strike out as many of the abominations as we can? Extreme measures cannot tend to good. They must produce mischief. If a proper and moderate bill, in regard to wool and woollens, had passed last year, we should not now be in our present situation. If such a bill, extended perhaps to a few other articles, if necessity so required, had been prepared and recommended at this session, much, both of excitement and of evil, would have been avoided.

Nevertheless, sir, it is for gentlemen to judge for themselves. If, when the wool manufacturers think they have a fair right to call on Congress to carry into effect what was intended for them by the law of 1824, and when there is manifested some disposition to comply with what they thus request, the benefit cannot be granted, nevertheless, in any other manner than by inserting it in a sort of bill of pains and penalties—a “bill of abominations,” it is not for me to attempt to reason down what has not been reasoned up; but I must content myself with admonishing gentlemen that their policy is destined, in all probability, to terminate in their own sore disappointment.

I advert once more, sir, to the subject of wool and woollens, for the purpose of showing, that, even in respect to that part of the bill, the interest mainly protected is not that of the manufacturers. On the contrary, it is that of the wool growers. The wool grower is vastly more benefited than the manufacturer. The interest of the manufacturer is treated as secondary and subordinate throughout the bill. Just so much, and no more, is done for him as is supposed necessary to enable him to purchase and manufacture the wool. The agricultural interest, the farming interest, the interest of the sheep owner, is the great object which the bill is calculated to benefit, and which it will benefit, if the manufactures can be kept alive. A comparison of existing duties with those proposed on the wool and on the cloth, will show how this part of the case stands.

At present, a duty of thirty per cent. ad valorem is laid on all wool, costing ten cents per pound, or upwards; and a duty of fifteen per cent. on all wool under that price.

The present bill proposes a specific duty of four cents per pound, and also an ad valorem duty of fifty per cent. on all wool of every description.

The result of the combination of these two duties, is, that wool, fit for making good cloths, and costing from thirty to forty cents per pound, in the foreign market, will pay a duty at least equal to sixty per cent. ad valorem. And wool costing less than ten cents in the foreign market, will pay a duty, on an average, of a hundred per cent. ad valorem.

Now, sir, these heavy duties are laid for the wool grower. They are designed to give a spring to agriculture, by fostering one of its most important products.

But let us see what is done for the manufacturer, in order to enable him to manufacture the raw material, at prices so much enhanced.

As the bill passed the House of Representatives, the advance of duties on cloths is supposed to have been not more than three per cent. on the minimum points. Taking the amount of duty to be now thirty-seven per cent. ad valorem, on cloths, this bill, as it came to us, proposed, if that supposition be true, only to carry it up to forty. Amendments, here adopted, have enhanced this duty, and are understood to have carried it up to a duty of forty-five, or perhaps fifty per cent. ad valorem. Taking it at the highest, the duty on the cloth is raised thirteen per cent. while that on wool is raised in some instances to thirty, and in some instances eighty-five per cent.; that is, in one case, from thirty to sixty, and, in the other, from fifteen to a hundred. Now, the calculation is said to be true which supposes that a duty of thirty per cent. on the raw material, enhances, by fifteen per cent., the cost of producing the cloth, the raw material being estimated generally to be equal to half the expense of the fabric. So that while by this bill the manufacturer gains thirteen per cent. on the cloth, he would appear to lose fifteen per cent. on the same cloth, by the increase in the price of the wool. And this not only would appear to be true, but would, I suppose, be actually true, were it not that the market may be open to the manufacturer, under this bill, for such cloths as may be furnished at prices intermediate between the graduated prices established by the bill.

For example: few or no foreign cloths, it is supposed, costing more than fifty cents a yard, and less than a dollar, will be imported; therefore American cloths worth more than fifty cents, and less than a dollar, will find a market. So of the intervals or intermediate spaces between the other statute prices. In this mode it may be hoped that the manufacturers may be sustained and rendered able to carry on the work of converting the raw material, the agricultural product of the country, into an article necessary and fit for use. And this statement, I think, sufficiently shows that no further benefit or advantage is intended for them, than such as shall barely enable them to accomplish that purpose; and that the object, to which all others have been made to yield, is the advantage of agriculture.

And yet, sir, it is on occasion of a bill thus framed, that a loud and ceaseless cry has been raised against what is called the cupidity, the avarice, the monopolizing spirit of New England manufacturers. This is one of the main "abominations of the bill," to remedy which, it is proposed to keep in the other abominations. Under the prospect of advantage held out by the law of 1824, men have ventured their fortunes and their means of subsistence for themselves and families, in woollen manufactures. They have ventured investments in objects requiring a large out-lay of capital, in mills, houses, water-works, and expensive machinery. Events have occurred blighting their prospects and withering their hopes. Events which have deprived them of that degree of succour which the Legislature manifestly intended. (They come here asking for relief against an unforeseen occurrence—for remedy against that which Congress, if it had foreseen, would have prevented. And they are told that what they ask is an abomination! They say that an interest important to them and important to the country, and principally called into existence by the Government itself, has received a severe shock, under which it must sink, if the Government will not, by reasonable means, endeavor to preserve what it has created. And they are met with a volley of hard names, a tirade of reproaches, and a loud cry against capitalists, speculators, and stock-jobbers. For one, I think them hardly treated: I think, and from the beginning have thought, their claim to be a fair one.) With how much soever of undue haste, or even of credulity, they may be thought to have embarked in these pursuits, under the hopes held out by Government, I do not feel it to be just that they should be abandoned to their fate on the first adverse change of circumstances, although I have always seen, and now see, how difficult, perhaps I should rather say, how impossible, it is for Congress to act, when such changes occur, in a manner at once efficient, but discreet; prompt, but yet moderate.

For these general reasons, and on these grounds, I am decidedly in favor of a measure which shall uphold and support, in behalf of the manufacturers, the law of 1824, and carry its benefits and advantages to the full extent intended. And though I am not altogether satisfied with the particular form of these enactments, I am willing to take them, in the belief that they will answer an essentially important and necessary purpose.)

It is now my painful duty to take notice of another part of this bill, which I think in the highest degree objectionable and unreasonable; I mean the extraordinary augmentation of the duty on hemp. I cannot well conceive any thing more unwise or ill-judged than this appears to me to be. The duty is nearly thirty-five dollars per ton; and the bill proposes a progressive increase, till it shall reach sixty dollars. This will be absolutely oppressive on the shipping interest, the great consumers of the article. When this duty shall have reached its maximum, it will create an annual charge of at least one hundred thousand dollars, falling not on the aggregate of the commercial interest, but on the ship owner. It is a very unequal burden. The navigation of the country has already had a hard struggle to sustain itself against foreign competition; and it is singular enough that this interest, which is already so severely tried, which pays so much in duties on hemp, duck, and iron, and which it is now proposed to put under new burdens, is the only interest which is subject to a direct tax by a law of Congress. The tonnage duty is such a tax. If this bill should pass in its present form, I shall think it my duty, at the earliest suitable opportunity, to bring forward a bill for the repeal of the tonnage duty. It amounts, I think, to a hundred and twenty thousand dollars a year; and its removal will be due, in all justice, to the ship owner, if he is to be made subject to a new taxation on hemp and iron.

But, objectionable as this tax is, from its severe pressure on a particular interest, and that at present a depressed interest, there are still farther grounds of dissatisfaction with it. It is not calculated to effect the object intended by it. If that object be the increase of the dew rotted American hemp, the increased duty will have little tendency to produce that result; because such hemp is so much lower, in price, than imported hemp, that it must be already used for such purposes as it is fit for. It is said to be selling for one hundred and twenty dollars per ton, while the imported hemp commands two hundred and seventy dollars. The proposed duty, therefore, cannot materially assist the sale of the American hemp of this quality and description.

But the main reason given for this increase, is the encouragement of American water-rotted hemp. Doubtless this is an important object; but I have seen nothing to satisfy me that it can be obtained, by means like this. At present, there is produced in the country no considerable quantity of water rotted hemp. It is problematical, at least, whether it can be produced under any encouragement. The hemp may be grown, doubtless, in various parts of the United States, as well as in any country in the world; but the process of preparing it for use, by water-rotting, I believe to be more difficult and laborious than is generally thought among us. I incline to think, that, happily for us, labour is in too much demand, and commands too high prices, to allow this process to be carried on profitably. Other objections, also, besides the amount of labour required, may, perhaps, be found to exist, in climate, and in the effects liable to be produced on health, in warm countries, by the nature of the process. But whether there be foundation for these suggestions, or not, the fact still is, that we do not produce the article. It cannot, at present, be had at any price. To augment the duty, therefore, on foreign hemp, can only have the effect of compelling the consumer to pay so much more money into the Treasury. The proposed increase, then, is doubly objectionable; first, because it creates a charge, not to be borne equally by the whole country, but a new and heavy charge, to be borne exclusively by one particular interest; and second, because, that of the money raised by this charge, little or none goes to accomplish the professed object, by aiding the hemp grower; but the whole, or nearly the whole falls into the Treasury. Thus the effect will be in no way proportioned to the cause, nor the advantage obtained by some, at all equal to the hardship imposed on others. While one interest will suffer much, the other interest will gain little or nothing.

I am quite willing to make a thorough and fair experiment, on the subject of water-rotted hemp; but I wish, at the same time, to do this in a manner that shall not oppress individuals, or particular classes. I intend, therefore, to move an amendment, which will consist in striking out so much of the present bill as raises the duty on hemp, higher than it is at present, and in inserting a clause, making it the duty of the Navy Department to purchase, for the public service, American water-rotted hemp whenever it can be had of a suitable quality; provided it can be purchased at a rate not exceeding, by more than twenty per cent. the current price of imported hemp, of the same quality. If this amendment should be adopted, the ship owner would have no reason to complain, as the price of the article would not be enhanced, to him; and at the same time, the hemp grower, who shall try the experiment, will be made sure of a certain market, and a high price. The existing duty of thirty five dollars per ton will remain to be still borne by the ship owner. The twenty per cent. advance, on the price of imported hemp, will be equal to fifty dollars per ton; the aggregate will be eighty-five dollars; and this, it must be admitted, is a liberal and effective provision, and will secure every thing which can be reasonably desired, by the hemp-grower, in the most ample manner.

Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

But, if the bill should become a law, and go into operation in its present shape, this duty on hemp is likely to defeat its own object in another way. Very intelligent persons entertain the opinion, that the consequence of this high duty will be such, that American vessels, engaged in foreign commerce, will, to a great extent, supply themselves with cordage abroad. This, of course, will diminish the consumption at home, and thus injure the hemp-grower, and at the same time, the manufacturer of cordage. Again; there may be reason to fear, that as the duty is not raised on cordage manufactured abroad, such cordage may be imported, in a greater or less degree, in the place of the unmanufactured article. Whatever view we take, therefore, of this hemp duty, it appears to me altogether objectionable.

Much has been said of the protection which the navigation of the country has received, from the discriminating duties on tonnage, and the exclusive enjoyment of the coasting trade. In my opinion, neither of these measures has materially sustained the shipping interest of the United States. I do not concur in the sentiments, on that point, quoted from Dr. Seybert's statistical work. Dr. Seybert was an intelligent and worthy man, and compiled a valuable book; but he was engaged in public life at a time, when it was more fashionable than it has since become, to ascribe efficacy to discriminating duties. The shipping interest in this country has made its way by its own enterprise. By its own vigorous exertion, it spread itself over the seas, and by the same exertion, it still holds its place there. It seems idle to talk of the benefit and advantage of discriminating duties, when they operate against us on one side of the ocean, quite as much as they operate for us on the other. To suppose that two nations, having intercourse with each other, can secure, each to itself, a decided advantage in that intercourse, is little less than absurdity: and this is the absurdity of discriminating duties. Still less reason is there for the idea, that our own ship-owners hold the exclusive enjoyment of the coasting trade, only by virtue of the law, which secures it to their exclusive employment. Look at the rate of freights. Look at the manner in which this coasting trade is conducted by our own vessels, and the competition which subsists between them. In a majority of instances, probably, these vessels are owned, in whole or in part, by those who navigate them. These owners are at home, at one end of the voyage; and repairs and supplies are thus obtained in the cheapest and most economical manner. No foreign vessel would be able to partake in this trade, even by the aid of preferences and bounties.

The shipping interest of this country requires only an open field and a fair chance. Every thing else it will do for itself. But, it has not a fair chance, while it is so severely taxed, in whatever enters into the necessary expense of building and equipment. In this respect, its rivals have advantages which may in the end prove to be decisive against us. I entreat the Senate to examine and weigh this subject, and not go on, blindly, to unknown consequences. The English ship-owner is carefully regarded by his government, and aided and succoured, whenever and wherever necessary, by a sharp-sighted policy. Both he and the American ship-owner obtain their hemp from Russia. But observe the difference. The duty on hemp in England is but twenty-one dollars; here, it is proposed to make it sixty; notwithstanding its cost here is necessarily enhanced by an additional freight, proportioned to a voyage, longer than that which brings it to the English consumer, by the whole breadth of the Atlantic. Sir, I wish to invoke the Senate's attention, earnestly, to this subject; I would awaken the regard of the whole Government, more and more, not only on this but on all occasions, to this great national interest, an interest, which lies at the very foundation, both of our commercial prosperity and our naval achievement.

Mr. W. concluded by submitting the following as a substitute for the provision in the bill, relative to hemp: "That the Navy Department be directed to purchase, for the use of the Navy of the United States, American water rotted hemp, when it can be procured of a suitable quality, and at a price not exceeding, by more than twenty per cent. the price of the imported article."

Mr. JOHNSON said, that, perceiving a disposition on the part of the Senate to take the question, he was unwilling to cause delay; but as they had been forced into, at least a partial discussion of the subject before them, in which he could not reconcile it to a sense of duty to give a silent vote, he should assume the privilege of addressing the chair, without waiting for a motion to adjourn.

I will not (Mr. J. remarked) say that I am astonished at the proposition now under discussion, which strikes so deadly a blow at the interests of the western country. After what I have heard and witnessed, I have no right to express astonishment. But my constituents, accustomed to regard with equal interest every section of the Union, and never wishing a favor that would cost the remotest part a sacrifice, will be greatly astonished at this motion, and especially at the quarter from which it comes. They will exclaim with the expiring Cæsar, "and thou too Brutus!" It is a proposition from an avowed and leading advocate of the "American System" as it is so plausibly called, to take off the duty from hemp, cotton bagging, molasses, and foreign distilled spirits. If these articles are exempted from duty, what remaining interest has the west in this long expected tariff? None. Strike them out, and the whole western interest is sacrificed—our western farmers and manufacturers are abandoned—their equitable rights totally disregarded, and our boasted "American System" becomes to one section, a system of cupidity—and a system of oppression to the other. We must pay a tribute on all that we purchase, and suffer a destructive sacrifice on all that we sell.

I have been highly gratified with the general remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WENDELL.] In argument, his expressions are liberal; he is theoretically magnanimous, the advocate for equal benefits to every part of the Union; but in the application of his principles to the bill before us, his theory is most unfortunately illustrated. Its practical effect is highly characteristic; it is to embrace his own favorite section, entirely regardless of the long neglected interests of the west—to sustain, at the expense of the west, the manufacturers of wool, located principally in New England and near the waters of the Atlantic. Beyond this interest, he is not disposed to travel far. Western produce and manufactures are not embraced in his views of American policy.

The State of Kentucky has been much agitated, but not much divided upon the "American System." I am with us a favorite system. A tariff founded in equity, extending equally its beneficial effects to all parts of the Union, will be favorably received throughout the west. But a partial system, a sectional system, a mere woollen system, will receive the support of no party there. We would not receive a partial favor, if it should be tendered us at the expense of the east; nor can we sacrifice to that section the dearest interests of the west. The industry of the west is worthy of the same support as that of the east; and our object is to encourage and protect both. It is American industry that we wish to call in requisition, not the industry of the east, or of the west, or of the north, or the south, but the industry of the whole.—We are one family, and we ask for equal benefit to every member as far as practicable. Let this be done, and we shall be a harmonious community. From the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, I began to cherish the hope that we should realize the prospect held out to us in the west on a late occasion, when it became important to unite their feelings with those of the east. We were then told with a confidence which political infidelity itself could scarcely question, that we might safely rely upon the friendship and support of the east on this occasion; and I can inform the honorable Senator, that the friends of the administration in Kentucky, during the last August elections, fought their battles at the polls, under the banner of the hemp stalk. They appeared at the hustings with flying colors, and the hemp stalk was their ensign. This fact is not introduced with a view of stirring up party feelings, but to shew something of the mortification which my constituents must feel, when they learn that the friend in whom they were taught to confide, has seized upon their standard to destroy it—when they discover that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, the Telamon Ajax of the "American System," the able friend and firm supporter of the Administration, has moved to strike from the protection of this bill, not only their hemp, but every other article of interest to Kentucky.

The argument of the gentleman has been confined principally to the importance of protecting woollens; and, therefore, he urges the propriety of striking out hemp and other articles more important to the west than woollens to the east. He assumes the ground, that the government has, by its policy, invited the manufacturers of wool to vest their capital in this business; and that the faith of the government is therefore pledged to protect them from foreign competition; that is, because the government has done much for them, it is bound to do much more; but because it has done little or nothing for the west, it ought to do nothing. The corollary of the proposition is, that the privileged order should receive higher privileges, and the oppressed should receive deeper oppression. Admit the correctness of his position, so far as it respects woollens, for I am willing and desirous to give them ample protection, and the principle will apply with equal force to hemp, cotton bagging, whiskey and molasses. I am not disposed to divest any order of its privileges, but to extend those privileges to every interest, till all America shall be of one order, and then the higher the privileges the better. If the law of 1824 protected woollens, the same law extended protection in some degree, to hemp, flax, cotton bagging, whiskey and molasses. How then can the gentleman urge a pledge in one case, and reject it in the others? And with what consistency can we, while recognizing an implied, or constructive pledge to the eastern manufacturer of wool, refuse to redeem an equal pledge to the western farmer and mechanic?

If the Senator will pursue the real "American System," agreeably to the intention of the Harrisburg Convention, so clearly expressed in their report, he will receive the cordial co-operation of the west. A majority of all parties will sustain the measure. That Convention originated, it is true, in the agitation of the woollens bill, during the last session; and though artificial means were employed to turn the question to party purposes, by which means one political party greatly preponderated as to numbers, yet the Convention was patriotic, and acted on principles of equity. Whatever motives may have predominated in the minds of some, there seems to have been a kind of patriotic charm in the State at whose capital they assembled, that forbade partiality. The very atmosphere of Harrisburg seems favorable only to what justice warrants and Heaven approves. If the spirit of that Convention does not survive in all its members, it still lives in Pennsylvania, an illustrious member of the good old American family, whose garments are yet unpolluted. That respectable Convention listened to the voice of the people, and embraced in their report almost every article which is named in this bill; and the article of hemp is particularly recommended as a proper object of protection in fixing the tariff. Contrary to that report, a proposition is now made, and I have heard it with deep regret, to reduce the "American System," to a woollen bill, which will, in fact, confine its operation to the country east of the Alleghany, and north of the Susquehanna. Such will be the effect of striking out the articles included in the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The American system now in operation has given very little if any advantage to the western farmer or manufacturer. It is a fact, which my constituents both know and feel, that in the purchase of New England cottons and woollens, we must pay the price in gold and silver, while our own produce lies as a drug upon our hands. We cannot exchange our whiskey, our cordage, our hemp, and our wool, for New England manufactures, because of foreign competition. They are imported into New England from other countries, and the specie drained from the west is exported from the country in payment for them. There is no reciprocity in our commerce with the eastern States. I have lately received from a friend a few thousand dollars to be disbursed in the purchase of domestic cottons and woollens. The purchases have been made, principally in Baltimore, where New England manufactures are deposited for the western market. Thus we clothe ourselves, male and female, with New England manufactures, and the specie which we pay them in return is sent to foreign countries for the purchase of the articles which we can supply in abundance, if the same protection can be extended to them. Let the tariff be fixed on principles of equity, and the commerce of the east and the west, like the ebbing and flowing of a stream, will bear reciprocal benefits to every part of the country; will invigorate and enrich the whole; but if the current must, without any returning flood, forever descend into the sea, the fountain will soon be exhausted, and the existing state of things must have a speedy termination.

We have long submitted to these evils, in the hope that the day to end them was not far distant. This session was hailed in prospect as the happy era; and the banner of the hemp stalk seemed to say that henceforth the east and the west shall be "one and indivisible." The favorable moment has now arrived; and now the boon is denied us.

The motion of the gentleman is also in opposition to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which represents hemp as a prominent article for a protecting duty. It is now contended, that domestic hemp cannot be procured in sufficient quantities. Why? Because the present duty is not so heavy as to exclude its importation. The contemplated duty on woollens will, it is believed, exclude their importation; but that on wool will not. The manufacturers then will be completely protected, but not the wool growers. So the growers of hemp will be left without adequate protection. The argument, if it proves any thing, establishes the fact to a demonstration that the duties heretofore imposed on foreign importations, have been insufficient, and that the proposed addition to the duty on foreign hemp is just and necessary. No person acquainted with the capacity of our soil, especially in the west, will question the ability of the country to produce, under adequate protection, double the quantity of hemp required for the whole population of the nation, and that without materially affecting other branches of agriculture. A question has arisen upon the comparative strength of the Kentucky and Russia hemp; but on this point, the most unequivocal testimony in favor of our own production is before the Senate. [Here Mr. Johnson referred to a document from the Navy Department, proving that upon actual experiment, from No. 1 to No. 12, the Kentucky dew rotted hemp is stronger than the Russia water rotted hemp.]

tem" is plain. Let us pursue the whole system, and it will be to us as the path of the righteous, shining brighter and brighter. Why then shall we contract it? Why shall woollens and cottons be the exclusive subjects of protection against foreign competition? Why shall we in the interior, be left alone to grapple with foreign competition in all the productions of our farmers and manufacturers who constitute the body and soul of our population, while the woollens and cottons manufactured in the East, are effectually protected, and in a great degree, at the expense of the West! Is it magnanimous? Is it equitable? Is it righteous? It is not.

I have always been one among the western members, to elevate New England above foreign competition, in the manufacture of hats, shoes, ready made clothing, woollens and cottons. In this, I have obeyed the will of my constituents. They have taught me to look with an equal eye upon every part of the United States, as composing one great family, united in interest and affection, pursuing the same path to independence and glory. They believed, in the honesty of their hearts, that the sentiment was reciprocated from their eastern brethren. What will be their astonishment to learn, that New England has deserted them—that New England policy, if correctly represented by the Senator from Massachusetts, cannot stretch a look beyond the mountains which divide the East from the West? For my own part, whatever may be the result of this motion, I shall still recur with satisfaction to my recorded votes in favor of the industry of New England. If gentlemen will do me the favor to examine the journals of 1824, when the former tariff bill was pending, they will find my name among the supporters of the measures for the protection of domestic cottons and woollens. We have done all we could for our New England brethren. If now, they will sport with the interests of the West, they are left without a pretext. We ask nothing more than what honor and justice warrant us to expect. If the motion before us shall prevail, the boon is gone. The west must remain tributary. We must receive the commodities of the East, under a protecting duty, while those of the West will be refused for want of that protection.

Having expressed these views, they are submitted to the consideration of the State. Duty would not permit me to say less, and inclination does not prompt me to say more.

The debate was continued by Messrs. WEBSTER, BENTON, SMITH, of Maryland, DICKERSON, TAZEWELL, and ROWAN; when, the question having been divided, on motion of Mr. BERRIEN, and the yeas and nays ordered, the vote on striking out was taken, (at about eight o'clock,) and decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chandler, Foot, Knight, Parris, Robbins, Seymour, Silabee, Webster, Willey, Woodbury—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chase, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Macon, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Thomas, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Williams—36.

Mr. BENTON then proposed an amendment, to impose a duty of 25 cents per pound on imported Indigo, with a progressive increase at the rate of 25 cents per pound per annum, until the whole duty amounted to $1 per pound. He stated his object to be two-fold in proposing this duty, first, to place the American system beyond the reach of its enemies, by procuring a home supply of an article indispensable to its existence; and next, to benefit the South by reviving the cultivation of one of its ancient and valuable staples.

Indigo was first planted in the Carolinas and Georgia about the year 1740, and succeeded so well as to command the attention of the British manufacturers and the British Parliament. An act was passed for the encouragement of its production in these colonies, in the reign of George the Second, the preamble to which Mr. B. read, and recommended to the consideration of the Senate. It recited that a regular, ample, and certain supply of indigo was indispensable to the success of British manufactures; that these manufactures were then dependent upon foreigners for a supply of this article; and that it was the dictate of a wise policy to encourage the production of it at home. The act then went on to direct that a premium of six pence sterling should be paid out of the British Treasury for every pound of indigo imported into Great Britain, from the Carolinas and Georgia. Under the fostering influence of this bounty, said Mr. B., the cultivation of indigo became great and extensive. In six years after the passage of the act, the export was 217,000 lbs. and at the breaking out of the revolution it amounted to 1,100,000 lbs. The Southern colonies became rich upon it; for the cultivation of cotton was then unknown; rice and indigo were the staples of the South. After the revolution, and especially after the great territorial acquisitions which the British made in India, the cultivation of American indigo declined. The premium was no longer paid; and the British Government, actuated by the same wise policy which made them look for a home supply of this article from the Carolinas, when they were a part of the British possessions, now looked to India for the same reason. The export of American indigo rapidly declined. In 1800 it had fallen to 400,000 lbs.; in 1814 to 40,000 lbs.; and in the last few years to 6 or 8,000 lbs. In the meantime our manufactures were growing up; and having no supply of indigo at home, they had to import from abroad. In 1826 this importation amounted to 1,150,000 lbs. costing a fraction less than two millions of dollars, and had to be paid for almost entirely in ready money, as it was chiefly obtained from places where American produce was in no demand. Upon this state of facts, Mr. B. conceived it to be the part of a wise and prudent policy to follow the example of the British Parliament in the reign of George II. and provide a home supply of this indispensable article. Our manufacturers now paid a high price for fine indigo, no less than $2 50 per pound, as testified by one of themselves before the Committee on Manufactures raised in the House of Representatives. The duty which he proposed was only 40 per cent. upon that value, and would not even reach that rate for four years. It was less than one half the duty which the same bill proposed to lay instantaneously upon the very cloth which this indigo was intended to dye. In the end it would make all indigo come cheaper to the manufacturer, as the home supply would soon be equal, if not superior to the demand; and in the mean time, it could not be considered a tax on the manufacturer, as he would levy the advance which he had to pay, with a good interest, upon the wearer of the cloth.

Mr. B. then went into an exposition of the reasons for encouraging the home production of indigo, and showed that the life of the American System depended upon it. Neither cotton nor woollen manufactures could be carried on without indigo. The consumption of that article was prodigious. Even now, in the infant state of our manufactures, the importation was worth two million of dollars; and must soon be worth double or treble that sum. For this great supply of an indispensable article, we were chiefly indebted to the jealous rival, and vigilant enemy, of these very manufactures, to Great Britain herself. Of the 1,150,000 lbs. of indigo imported, we bring 620,000 lbs. from the British East Indies; which one word from the British Government would stop forever; we bring the further quantity of 120,000 lbs. from Manilla, a Spanish possession, which British influence and diplomacy could immediately stop; and the remainder came from different parts of South America, and might be taken from us by the arts of diplomacy, or by a monopoly of the whole on the part of our rival. A stoppage of a supply of indigo for one year, would prostrate all our manufactories, and give them a blow from which they would not recover in many years. Great Britain could effect this stoppage to the amount of three-fourths of the whole quantity by speaking a single word, and of the remainder by a slight exertion of policy, or the expenditure of a sum sufficient to monopolize for one year, the purchase of what South America sent into the market.

Mr. B. said he expected a unanimous vote in favor of his amendment. The North should vote for it to secure the life of the American system; to give a proof of their regard for the South; to shew that the country south of the Potomac is included in the bill for some other purpose besides that of oppression. The South itself, although opposed to the further increase of duties, should vote for this duty; that the bill, if it passes, may contain one provision favorable to its interests. The West should vote for it through gratitude for fifty years of guardian protection, generous defence, and kind assistance, which the South had given it under all its trials; and for the purpose of enlarging the market, increasing the demand in the South and its ability to purchase the horses, mules, and provisions which the West can sell no where else. For himself he had personal reasons for wishing to do this little justice to the South. He was a native of one of these States (N. Carolina)—the bones of his father and his grandfathers rested there. Her Senators and Representatives were his early and his hereditary friends. The venerable Senator before him (Mr. Maçon) had been the friend of him and his, through four generations in a straight line; the other Senator (Mr. Branch) was his school fellow; the other branch of the legislature, the House of Representatives, always showed him in the North Carolina Delegation, the friends of him and his through successive generations. Nor was this all. He felt for the sad changes which had taken place in the South in the last fifty years. Before the Revolution it was the seat of wealth as well as of hospitality. Money, and all that it commanded, abounded there. But how now? All this is reversed.

Wealth has fled from the South, and settled in the regions north of the Potomac, and this in the midst of the fact that the South, in four staples alone, in cotton, tobacco, rice and indigo, (while indigo was one of its staples) had exported produce since the revolution, to the value of eight hundred million of dollars, and the North had exported comparatively nothing. This sum was prodigious; it was nearly equal to half the coinage of the mint of Mexico since the conquest by Cortez. It was twice or thrice the amount of the product of the three thousand gold and silver mines of Mexico, for the same period of fifty years. Such an export would indicate unparalleled wealth; but what was the fact? In place of wealth, a universal pressure for money was felt; not enough for current expenses; the price of all property down; the country drooping and languishing; towns and cities decaying; and the frugal habits of the people pushed to the verge of universal self-denial, for the preservation of their family estates. Such a result is a strange and wonderful phenomenon. It calls upon statesmen to inquire into the cause; and if they inquire upon the theatre of this strange metamorphosis, they will receive one universal answer from all ranks and all ages, that it is Federal legislation which has worked this ruin. Under this legislation the exports of the South have been made the basis of the Federal revenue. The twenty odd millions annually levied upon imported goods, are deducted out of the price of their cotton, rice and tobacco, either in the diminished price which they receive for these staples in foreign ports, or in the increased price which they pay for the articles they have to consume at home. Virginia, the two Carolinas and Georgia, may be said to defray three-fourths of the annual expense of supporting the Federal Government; and of this great sum annually furnished by them, nothing, or next to nothing, is returned to them in the shape of Government expenditure. That expenditure flows in an opposite direction; it flows northwardly, in one uniform, uninterrupted and perennial stream; it takes the course of trade and of exchange; and this is the reason why wealth disappears from the South and rises up in the North. Federal legislation does all this; it does it by the simple process of eternally taking away from the South, and returning nothing to it. If it returned to the South the whole, or even a good part of what it exacted, the four States south of the Potomac might stand the action of this system, as the earth is enabled to stand the exhausting influence of the sun's daily heat by the refreshing dews which are returned to it at night; but as the earth is dried up, and all vegetation destroyed in regions where the heat is great, and no dews returned, so must the South be exhausted of its money and its property by a course of legislation which is forever taking from it, and never returning any thing to it.

Every new Tariff increases the force of this action. No Tariff has ever yet included Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia, within its provisions, except to increase the burthens imposed upon them. This one alone, presents the opportunity to form an exception, by reviving and restoring the cultivation of one of its ancient staples, one of the sources of its wealth before the revolution. The Tariff of 1816 contributed to destroy the cultivation of indigo; sunk the duty on the foreign article, from twenty-five to fifteen cents per pound. These are the reasons for imposing the duty on indigo, now proposed. What objections can possibly be raised to it? Not to the quality; for it is the same which laid the foundation of the British manufactures, and sustained their reputation for more than half a century; not to the quantity; for the two Carolinas and Georgia alone raised as much fifty years ago as we now import, and we have now the States of Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi, and the Territories of Florida and Arkansas, to add to the countries which produce it; not to the amount of the duty: for its maximum will be but forty per cent. only one half the duty laid by this bill on the cloth it is to dye, and that maximum, not immediate, but attained by slow degrees at the end of four years in order to give time for the domestic article to supply the place of the imported; and after all, it is not a duty on the manufacturer, but on the wearer of the goods; from whom he levies, with a good interest on the price of the cloths, all that he expands in the purchase of materials. For once, said Mr. B. I expect a unanimous vote on a clause in the Tariff. This indigo clause must have the singular and unprecedented fatuity of an unanimous voice in its favor. The South must vote for it, to revive the cultivation of one of its most ancient and valuable staples; the West must vote for it through gratitude for past favors—through gratitude for the vote on hemp this night!—and to save, enlarge, and increase the market for its own productions, the North must vote for it, to shew their disinterestedness; to give one proof of just feeling towards the South; and, above all, to save their favorite American system from the deadly blow which Great Britain can at any moment give it by stopping or interrupting the supplies of foreign indigo; and the whole union, the entire legislative body, must vote for it, and vote for it with joy and enthusiasm, because it is impossible that Americans can deny to sister States of the confederacy what a British King and a British Parliament granted to these same States when they were Colonies and dependencies of the British crown.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. WEBSTER, NOBLE, and MACON, who gave way to an adjournment.

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1828.

The bill from the other House to authorize a subscription of stock to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal was read twice and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The resolution from the other House, relative to an adjournment, was agreed to, on a division—27 to 18.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to discharge from the special orders the bill to alter the several acts levying duties on imports; which having been agreed to, the general orders preceding that bill were postponed, on motion of Mr. DICKERSON, and it was taken up. The motion of Mr. BENTON, adding ten cents to the present duty on indigo, and 25 cents per annum afterwards, until it amounts to one dollar per pound, being under consideration—

Mr. MACON addressed the Senate in a speech of two hours in length, supporting the provision, and treating at large of the general policy of the bill, and its operation on the various sections of the country. He contended that the benefits of the system had been confined to the people of the Eastern States, and that the South had suffered severely under its influence.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to divide the question. He was disposed to protect the article, and he wished that the first part should succeed. Fifty cents per pound appeared to him to be quite sufficient, and he thought the amendment as it stood proposed too high a rate of duty. He asked that the question be taken by yeas and nays on the first part; which were ordered.

Mr. DICKERSON said that the proposition now advanced would add to the duty 25 cents in one year, which he thought far too rapid. The article was not now produced in any great quantity—certainly not sufficient to supply the consumption of the country; nor would it be in the course of one year. He was entirely willing that the article should receive an ample degree of protection. In doing this, however, common justice would point out that it ought not to be done so as to injure the manufacturer. If it was brought on suddenly, injury must be sustained by the manufacturing consumer, which would not be felt if the progress of the duty was gradual. The average price of the indigo imported was one dollar seventy-one cents. The duties now proposed on it would be about fifty-eight per cent., while the duty proposed on wool would be fifty-one per cent.; making, on the raw material and the dye, a charge disproportioned to the protection of the manufactured article. It was true that the coloring matter used in a yard of cloth was very small, but it would be felt very sensibly. The additional duty on the manufactured article was only forty-five per cent., and could not, consequently, bear any great decrease, by way of duty on the materials of their fabrics. [Here Mr. D. made some statements as to the amount of indigo imported, which our Reporter cannot accurately state.] Believing that the manufacturers could not bear this duty, unless a correspondent advance should be made on the duty on cloths, because indigo could not be produced in sufficient quantities at present, he was of opinion that fifty cents on the pound would be as much as the blue cloths could bear. He therefore moved to amend the amendment, by striking out, and inserting five cents, until it arrives at fifty cents, instead of one dollar.

Mr. BENTON said that it appeared by the evidence before the other House, that the first dye used by the manufacturers was of an inferior description, and that they afterwards made use of a fine dye. Three-fourths of the indigo used came from the British and Spanish East Indies; and it was testified that the fine quality cost about $2 50 per pound. That from Guatemala was of an inferior kind, and cheaper; taken together, the two descriptions of indigo imported amounted to a fraction less than one million of dollars. If the amendment offered by him [Mr. B.] was adopted, there would be no necessity for importing the inferior kind, and perhaps not to a great extent, the best. Now, the rate of his amendment was far from being exorbitant. On the fine indigo, of which the greatest amount was consumed, the maximum of duty was forty per cent. This certainly was reasonable, when the duty on woollens was seventy per cent., giving thirty per cent. in their favor. By this new proposition the duty on indigo would become twenty per cent., just half the additional protection enjoyed by the woollens on the passage of this bill. If this proposition was to succeed, it would be better and fairer to face the South at once, and say that they shall receive no benefit and no protection from this bill. The friends of the American System had better at once declare to the South that they have no lot or portion under that system. Better give them a direct refusal at once, that they may understand the exact extent of the American System, and whether it includes merely that portion of the Union in which its friends are interested.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, thought it was extraordinary that this proposition should be opposed, and on the grounds on which it was objected to. We are to do nothing which shall not be for the benefit of woollens and iron, and aid no other interest for fear it will conflict with them. I recollect, said Mr. S., that I told the friends of the tariff system in 1816, that the British were about doing the same thing, in relation to their woollen manufacturers, as was proposed by this system; and that it would be, in the end, much worse for the manufacturer than it then was; but they would not believe me. I was not mistaken, however, and it was easy to come at the fact. We got the papers from England, in which the matter was discussed. Then the friends of the system said that it was our policy to oppose and compete with Great Britain. It does not now seem that the same doctrine is held, for they are not willing to extend it to all the articles of this country's production. He objected entirely to the manner in which this bill was got up. Here was one interest opposing another, and a measure proposed which he did not think could be justly arranged by Congress in current legislation. Such a tariff ought to come from the Treasury Department to be well digested, and provide for all the different interests without injuring any. It was, it seemed, quite satisfactory to some, so long as it did sufficient for the woollens. That appeared to be all that was wanted. The bill, in his opinion, had not been sufficiently considered as to its consequences on the country. In the other House it should have been inquired into and reported upon by the Committee of Ways and Means. I see, said Mr. S., that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] smiles significantly, as much as to ask whether I suppose he would trust the bill in the hands of its enemies. This, however, is my opinion. I do not think that woollens alone are to be protected at the expense of other important articles.

Mr. HAYNE said he was opposed to this bill in its principles as well as in its details. It could assume no shape which would make it acceptable to him, or which could prevent it from operating most oppressively and unjustly on his constituents. With these views, he had determined to make no motion to amend the bill in any respect whatever; but when such motions were made by others, and he was compelled to vote on them, he knew no better rule than to endeavor to make the bill consistent with itself. On this principle he had acted in all the votes he had given on this bill. He had endeavored to carry out to its legitimate consequences what gentlemen are pleased to miscall the "American System." With a fixed resolution to vote against the bill, he still considered himself at liberty to assist in so arranging the details as to extend to every great interest, and to all portions of the country, as far as may be practicable, equal protection, and to distribute the burthens of the system equally, in order that its benefits as well as its evils may be fully tested. On this principle, he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, because it was in strict conformity with all the principles of the bill. As a Southern man, he would ask no boon for the South—he should propose nothing; but he must say that the protection of indigo rested on the same principles as every other article proposed to be protected by this bill, and he did not see how gentlemen could, consistently with their maxims, vote against it. What was the principle on which this bill was professedly founded? If there was any principle at all in the bill, it was that, whenever the country had the capacity to produce an article with which any imported article could enter into competition, the domestic product was to be protected by a duty. Now, had the Southern States the capacity to produce indigo? The soil and climate of those States were well suited to the culture of the article. At the commencement of the Revolution our exports of the article amounted to no less than 1,100,000 lbs. The whole quantity now imported into the United States is only 1,150,000 lbs.; so that the capacity of the country to produce a sufficient quantity of indigo to supply the wants of the manufacturers is unquestionable. It is true that the quantity now produced in the country is not great.

In 1818 only 700 lbs. of domestic indigo was exported.

In 1825     9,955                      do.

In 1826     5,289                      do.

This proves that the attention of the country is now directed to the subject. The Senator from Indiana, in some remarks which he made on this subject yesterday, stated that, according to the principles of the American System, (so called,) protection was not extended to any article which the country was not in the habit of exporting. This is entirely a mistake. Of the articles protected by the tariff of 1824, as well as those included in this bill, very few are exported at all. Among these are iron, woollens, hemp, flax, and several others. If indigo is to be protected at all, the duties proposed must surely be considered extremely reasonable, the maximum proposed being much below that imposed by this bill on wool, woollens, and other articles. The duty on indigo till 1816, was 25 cents per pound. It was then (in favor of the manufacturers) reduced to 15 cents. The first increase of duty proposed here, is only to put back the old duty of 25 cents per pound, equal to an ad valorem duty of from 10 to 15 per cent.—and the maximum is only from 40 to 58 per cent. ad valorem, and that will not accrue for several years to come. With this statement of facts, Mr. H. said he would leave the question in the hands of those gentlemen who were engaged in giving this bill the form in which it is to be submitted to the final decision of the Senate. He did not wish to be considered as taking any peculiar interest in this question, in any aspect but this: that he wished his constituents to be made to understand whether the American System means a system for the exclusive benefit of particular employments, and particular States, or whether it is to be carried out to embrace every branch of industry in the country—whether the manufacturers were the only class in the country who are to enjoy the protection of this system.

Mr. KNIGHT said that this was an additional tax on the manufacturer, without, as he conceived, any benefit to any body. We have no evidence that the article is produced, or will be produced, in any quantity fit for use in this country—that so onerous were the duties already on the materials used in coloring, that the British manufacturer, with whom we had to compete, was enabled to put his colored goods into the market at 12 mills less per square yard than the American manufacturer can do; in other words, that the duties paid by the American manufacturer on materials for coloring amounted to 12 mills the square yard more than they cost the British manufacturer.

Mr. MACON said a few words.

Mr. DICKERSON did not doubt the capacity of the Southern country to produce all the indigo required for the consumption of the country. It was a valuable article, and its production ought to be encouraged to a reasonable extent; but it could not be carried beyond that without injuring the manufacturers. The reason why the culture of indigo had not received greater attention was, he believed, because the capital of the South had been turned to cotton; and that being now the direction of the capital of the country, he believed no great amount would be immediately turned to indigo, and, therefore, that the high duty would be a hardship to the manufacturer, without a correspondent benefit to the agriculturist. He believed that, for some years, the South would choose to sell their cotton to those countries whence the indigo was brought, to raising large crops of the latter. He hoped it would in a few years be produced, and he did not doubt it would; and, as the production progressed, it would be right to extend the duty on the blue cloths, and, in a corresponding degree, upon indigo.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that he did not know but the proposition was a fair one—as fair as could be expected from the quarter whence it came. But the object of the gentleman from Missouri was to create a sudden excitement, by which the agriculturist would be induced to go at once into the production of indigo, so that, in a few years, no indigo would be imported. At present we get our indigo chiefly from Bengal. And it was interesting to know how it was purchased. For every pound that is imported we pay specie, for it can be purchased in no other way. We cannot find, in return, a consumption of our produce, which is an additional consideration in favor of the protection of the home product. Some time next year the Bengal ships would be on their return, and, in the meantime, the effect of the excitement which the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri would have given in favor of its culture, would have operated to a considerable extent, and in five years you will not be under the necessity of importing the article at all. Mr. S. moved to divide the question, so as to take the vote first on striking out; which, the question being taken, was decided as follows:—Yeas 23, nays 23.

The vote being equal, the CHAIR voted in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the amendment, by striking out "one dollar," and inserting "fifty cents," making the increase of duty proposed by Mr. BENTON, stop at the latter amount.

On this motion a question of order arose, which was debated at some length by Messrs. KING, VAN BUREN, DICKERSON, WEBSTER, MACON, HARRISON, WOODBURY, BRANCH, and CHANDLER.

The question, which was admitted to be a doubtful one by Mr. Jefferson, in his Manual, whether, after having refused to strike out a portion of a bill, the part proposed to be struck out was amendable, was submitted to the Senate by the CHAIR, and the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. DICKERSON then renewed his motion.

MAY 10, 1828.]

Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

Mr. NOBLE moved the reconsideration of the vote on Mr. DICKERSON's previous motion, which took precedence of that gentleman's last motion; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was decided as follows: Yeas 23, Nays 23.

The vote being equal, the CHAIR voted in the negative.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the motion of Mr. DICKERSON was divided, and the question being put on striking out, it was carried.

The question then occurring on inserting "fifty cents," it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. KNIGHT said that, as his object was to protect manufacturing industry of every description, he would propose to amend the amendment, by adding, "and on all silk goods, 25 per centum ad valorem," but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. WEBSTER, who said, in relation to the duty proposed on indigo, that he considered 25 cents per annum too sudden an augmentation, and one which, he thought, would outrun the production. He should think five cents per annum a reasonable increase, and accordingly moved to strike out 20, so as to make the increase of duty 5 cents per annum; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON moved to amend the amendment, by inserting 10 cents for the first year, 5 cents for the second year, and 10 cents for each successive year, until the duty shall amount to fifty cents per pound.

Mr. BENTON moved a call of the House, as there were three or four members absent from their seats.

Mr. CHANDLER opposed it on the ground that it had never been practised in the Senate; which statement was corroborated by the CHAIR.

The motion was waived.

Mr. WOODBURY observed, that he should vote against this proposition, as he had against all those connected with an increase of the duty on indigo. He should not vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, nor for any other on this article unless to remove entirely the present duty. It was for one plain reason; and he would detain the Senate only to state it, to prevent a misconstruction of his votes. The article was not one, in his opinion, of such national magnitude, nor in so distressed a state, as to the profits in making it, as in any view to justify the protection of the culture and manufacture of it. While, on the other hand, the removal of the duty would much relieve the depressed manufacturers of woollens. Indeed, the duties on indigo alone, and olive oil, burdened a single woollen establishment, in the neighborhood where he resided, more, perhaps, than all the benefits conferred by this bill. Such was the consumption of those two articles there, that the duties alone on them exceeded, yearly, the sum of three thousand dollars, which would appear by the following estimate, some time since handed him, by a proprietor of the Great Falls Company, in New Hampshire, which consumes annually.

15,000 lbs. indigo, the duty on which, at fifteen cents per lb. is	$2250
4500 galls. olive oil, duty, 25 cts. per gall.	1125
	$3375

The motion of Mr. HARRISON was then agreed to.

Mr. KNIGHT then renewed his motion in relation to silks.

Mr. WOODBURY said, he had prepared a specific proposition in relation to this article. If the question on indigo was allowed to be taken separately, he would agree to a moderate duty on silks.

Mr. KNIGHT said, that, in offering this amendment, he conceived he should conciliate the other side of the House, as, if they obtained their duty on indigo, they might be willing to grant it also on silks.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that he should be against this motion, because he was against the duty on indigo, with which it was connected.

Mr. BENTON said, it was an unnatural connexion.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks; when, On motion of Mr. BENTON, the yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being put, the motion was negatived as follows:—yeas 2—nays 43.

The question then occurred on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. DICKERSON said, although he was willing to allow the gradual increase of the duty to 50 cents per pound, yet the amendment was not what he designed. The advance for the first year was too great, as ten cents on the quantity imported next year would be more than $120,000. It could not be expected that any indigo would be produced in one year, although it might in two or three years. Yet, although no good would at once be experienced by the agriculturist, the duty falls on the manufacturers immediately. For this reason he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey was the same as he, the other day, had accused him [Mr. S.] of having held in relation to cordage. But it seems, that now it was his bull that was gored, and consequently, the case was altered. The argument in favor of the amendment, as it stands, is this: If you give this excitement to the planter, and show him a prospect of profit, he will have his indigo in the ground next year, and enjoy the benefit of his crop, while the object of the duty will operate at once.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that his difficulty, in relation to this proposition, was only want of information. It had been introduced last night, at a late hour, and no time had been afforded for examination as to the quantity produced, or as to the quality of the domestic article. As to the Bengal indigo, on the way to this country, this duty will have the effect to raise its price in the market at once. Little benefit will be derived by the planter, while it will lay a heavy tax on the manufacturers.

Mr. BENTON said, he was astonished to find the Representatives of sister States refusing to three States a protection which was granted by a monarch: for a bounty had been given by Great Britain when we were her colonies, on this article. The gentleman from New Jersey was now endeavoring to shift his ground, which was always a most dangerous attempt.

To change one's front—whether in military or in legislative manœuvres, was always more or less dangerous. But it now comes out. The article is found now, not to be of sufficiently good quality for the American system. We must have Bengal indigo, which is brought from the British East Indies and Manilla, equally under the influence of Great Britain. So that, it now appears that this same system, in relation to which we were formerly told that it was to oppose Great Britain, is dependent on that country; this very Great Britain, which we have been told de die in diem, must be opposed by the American system, is to have the preference, in the production of indigo, to our own citizens.

The gentleman from Massachusetts shews us, by this, that the American system depends on the British Government for its existence. I say, sir, that this is a fair inference. For I have proof which is better than the opinions of gentlemen, however high their stations, but who do not happen to be indigo dyers, that this article can be produced in perfection in this country. I have the authority of indigo dyers for this assertion. But do we want better proof of this, than that the bounty was given by the British Government on American indigo, and that the British factories were built up on American indigo before the Revolution? The export, at the commencement of the war, into England, was about the same as the import into this country now. If the present plan is adopted, at the end of 4 or 5 years, the duty will be 20 per cent. It is contemptible—it is an insult to the South. It shows them they can only receive the benefits of the system far below the rate of protection which is extended to the manufacturer. They are to be allowed 20 per cent, on the article in 5 years, while the cloths of New England are placed at 70 per cent. instant. Through a variety of questions this motion had been followed up. Even in the agonies of death it was hunted down by the friends of the American system. And now we are told that it will occur too soon—that it must be deferred to a later period. This, then, is the American system, extending to but one or two interests, and leaving others untouched. I expressed a hope last night that the friends of the Tariff bill would give the only proof to the South in their power, that they too were included in the American system. It seems, however, that this paltry boon is to be refused. I beg gentlemen to spare their strength, as I have motions yet behind that will require all their energies. It seems to me unconscionable that the manufacturers should desire to grasp the whole 70 per cent. upon their productions, and refuse to do a little for the agricultural community. Now I ask, whether the friends of the American system do not, by their decision upon this motion, shew clearly that it depends upon Great Britain for its existence? It is the inevitable conclusion, from their own arguments. They have their choice of the horns of the dilemma—and they have chosen this. The American system then depends upon Great Britain, and she will doubtless cherish it with kindness and affection.

Mr. DICKERSON said that he was not against the duty, but the time at which it was to be levied. It is said that we struggle against this proposition even in the agonies of death; but do not they struggle on the other side? We struggle against an unnecessary imposition—one which will not aid the agriculturist, and yet will injure the manufacturer. He believed it would produce no good effect; and should, therefore, vote against it. Should it be stricken out, he should then propose a substitute. The question being taken on adopting the amendment as amended, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON then moved to amend the bill, by inserting a clause laying an additional duty of 5 cents per annum on the pound of indigo, until it arrives to 50 cents; which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill, by an additional duty of five cents on cordage.

Mr. DICKERSON said he would not object to this, unless commercial gentlemen opposed it. He, however, believed the great difference between hemp and cordage was sufficient to protect the cordage from competition with the foreign manufacturer.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that this was a new proposition, and he, for one, wished to give to it due consideration. He therefore moved that the Senate adjourn, but suspended his motion at the request of

Mr. WEBSTER, who said, that he was inclined to assent to this motion. They had been informed by the gentleman from Missouri, that he had yet several amendments to offer. He would, therefore, suggest the propriety of gentlemen offering their amendments, so that they might be printed, after which the Senate would meet with the full understanding of the questions they were to be called upon to decide.

Mr. WOODBURY renewed the motion to adjourn; which was rejected.

It being half past four o'clock, Mr. SMITH, of S. C. moved that the Senate have a recess until six o'clock; which was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

The motion offered by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was briefly discussed by Messrs. WEBSTER, DICKERSON, and SMITH, of Maryland.

Mr. PARRIS asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ROWAN said, that it seemed at first that the duty on hemp would be of no importance to the agriculturist, because it could not be produced in this country. But, now it appeared to be of sufficient importance to swell the price of hemp itself, and call for a duty on cordage. He should vote against the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that the gentleman supposed that this duty would not add a single blade to the product of the domestic article. Yet, it will increase the price of manufactured hemp. And the question is, whether you will purchase the foreign manufactured article, or that manufactured in this country. Does he not see, that, if we lay a heavy duty on raw hemp, it will be a bounty on the foreign manufactured article, unless that is taxed also? Does he not see, that, if we intend to keep the manufacture of hemp alive in this country, we must lay a duty on the foreign manufactured article? He merely rose to make this statement, because he thought the gentleman under a misapprehension of the intention of his motion.

Mr. PARRIS said, that the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] is correct, and ought to have its weight, unless this article be already protected. To shew whether that is the case, a statement of a few facts only would be necessary. The existing duty on cordage is $89 60 per ton. The duty contemplated by the bill on imported hemp, will be $60 per ton, when it shall have arrived at its ultimatum; thus giving the domestic manufactured article an advantage of nearly $30 per ton over the same article of foreign manufacture. This would seem to be sufficient protection. If gentlemen think so, they will negative the amendment. Only one other fact need be stated. There is not, now, nor has there been for years, a pound of foreign cordage used on American tonnage. It is imported only for exportation as an article of trade. During the last year, the importation of this article exceeded 1,500,000 pounds; the principal part of which was from Russia, and of course encumbered with the same expense for freight, insurance, &c. as the unmanufactured hemp. The exportation of cordage, for drawback, during the same year, somewhat exceeded that quantity, principally to Cuba, Brazil, and Chili. Mr. P. said, as he was opposed to the increased duty on hemp, he should uniformly vote against any additional duty on manufactures from that article.

Mr. ROWAN said, he rose to acknowledge that he had taken an erroneous view of the operation of this amendment. He was convinced, from the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the effect of the duty on cordage would be beneficial to the hemp growing interest of this country, and, as he was always ready to admit any erroneous impression, he should now consider himself bound to vote for the amendment.

The question being then put, the motion was rejected.

Mr. BENTON then moved a progressive duty on wool on the skin, to make it entirely prohibitory in four years.

On this motion a debate ensued, in which Messrs. BENTON, DICKERSON, CHANDLER, and HARRISON participated.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that he did not rise to discuss the question, but to shew, that it was idle to go on with the debate at present. Within the last thirty-four hours the Senate had been in session twenty hours, which had been entirely employed in the discussion of the Tariff bill—the strikings out, and the puttings in. Such continued labor might do for others, but he had neither the nerves nor the lungs to go farther in this fatiguing business. He considered that it was too much for the human frame. He therefore moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Tariff Bill.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WOODBURY moved that the hour of adjournment be noted on the journal; and asked the yeas and nays. The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

MONDAY, MAY 12, 1828.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The bill altering the acts imposing duties on imports, was again taken up; and the motion of Mr. BENTON, to prohibit the importation of raw wool, by gradual advances, so as to go into effect in the year 1832, being under consideration, the question was put, and decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON then proposed to amend, by inserting a provision, laying a duty of ten per centum per annum on wool unmanufactured, until it shall amount to 50 per centum ad valorem, and 5 per centum afterwards, until it amounts to 70 per cent.

This motion was briefly discussed by Messrs. BENTON, SMITH, of Md. HAYNE, and DICKERSON; when the question was taken, it was negative.

Mr. BENTON moved that a duty of six cents per gallon, in addition to the duty of ten cents in the bill, be laid on imported molasses, to take effect on the 30th day of June, 1830, so as to make the whole duty on that article amount to sixteen cents per gallon after that time. This proposition he supported in a speech of considerable length, in which he went back to the first proposition under the Federal Government to impose a duty on molasses; and shewed that it was then considered as a duty on sugar. This statement he confirmed by a recurrence to the first tariff of 1790, reported by a Committee of the House of Representatives, of which Mr. Madison was Chairman, in which brown sugar was dutied at one cent per pound, and molasses at eight cents per gallon; and the two duties held to be equal, as a gallon of molasses was admitted to be equal in weight, and superior in saccharine matter, to eight pounds of brown sugar.

Both were treated as duties upon sugar; one in its granular, and the other in its fluid state; and the House of Representatives sustained that idea, and voted the two duties as reported. But in the Senate this equality was altered, upon the earnest representation of the New-England members, that molasses was used principally for distillation, and not as a substitute for sugar in that section of the Union; and the duty was reduced, under this belief, from eight to two and a half cents per gallon. Since that time this idea has prevailed; and in the enactment of subsequent tariffs, molasses has nearly escaped all duty, while brown sugar has twice been subjected to an advance of duty, and each time to an advance of one hundred per cent. upon its original amount. The tariff, now in force, levies three cents a pound on brown sugar, and only five cents a gallon on molasses; the tariff now under consideration proposes an advance of only five cents a gallon on molasses; and the amendment proposed only contemplates a further advance of six cents, to take effect two years hence.

Mr. B. said that he was induced to revive the original idea of taxing molasses as sugar, by a piece of information which had been given to the Senate a few nights ago by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] in the debate on New-England rum, in which that liquor was treated as the antagonist of Western whiskey, and the foreign material out of which it was made, was shewn to be the rival of domestic grain, and of course entitled to no favor from a legislature professing to be a friend to the American System. That Senator, in the course of that debate, declared, upon this floor, that this was a mistake; that molasses in New-England was used principally on the table, and not in the stills; and that of the ten millions of gallons annually imported into that section of the Union, not more than two millions were distilled into rum. This would leave eight millions of gallons, equivalent to sixty-four millions of pounds of brown sugar, to be used as sugar; and shews that the New-England statesmen of the year 1790, however correct at the time, were prodigiously mistaken as to the future distillation of molasses; and that this mistake led the Congress since that day, into a great error; an error which has pervaded our legislation ever since, destroyed the equality of the sugar tax, and deprived the Treasury of an immense revenue. But that mistake is now corrected. The important fact is now admitted, that four-fifths of the molasses imported into New-England, are consumed as sugar; and the knowledge of this fact suggest grave questions to the American statesman in reference to our revenue, the equal distribution of our taxes, and the preservation of a market for our domestic sugar and molasses.

Mr. B. would briefly touch these great questions, and leave many of their results to be pursued and developed by the minds of others.

1. As it concerns the revenue.—The Treasury, he said, was an enormous loser. Eight millions of gallons of molasses were equal to 64 millions of pounds of sugar; this quantity of sugar, at the present rate of duty, would pay $1,920,000; its equivalent in molasses, under the existing duty of five cents per gallon, has only paid $400,000; under the proposed duty in the bill, it will only pay $800,000; and even if carried to 16 cents, will still pay but $1,280,000. The result was, that the Treasury had heretofore lost upon this item, $1,520,000 per annum; that it was destined to lose under the operation of the bill as it stood, a further annual sum of $1,120,000; and even if his amendment should be adopted, the annual loss would still be $640,000. This loss, though great, would still be so much less than that now suffered, that Mr. B. would be willing to compromise upon it, and leave to his New-England brethren the quiet enjoyment of so great an advantage until the time came round for a general revision of the tariff, and an extensive reduction and equalization of duties consequent upon the extinction of the public debt.

2. As it concerns the equal distribution of the public taxes. The tax upon brown sugar is one of the heaviest that is imposed. That article is dutied at three cents a pound, which, with the merchant's profit upon that sum, makes it cost nearly four cents higher in the pound. The aggregate tax for the last three years, shews an average of two millions and a quarter of dollars per annum. This is a tax upon a necessary of life; it is a tax upon an article consumed by the poor; it is a tax which is chiefly paid by the people of the Middle, Southern and Western States; for they cannot use molasses as a substitute. Their interior position forbids the extensive use of an article which is spoilt and wasted in a long overland transportation. The commercial tables prove this fact, for while New-England alone annually imports ten millions of gallons of molasses, all the rest of the Union put together—the eighteen other States and three territories united, only imported three millions of gallons! This proves the fact that molasses is but little used as a substitute for sugar, outside of New-England; it proves the fact that the present great revenue derived from brown sugar is chiefly paid by citizens of other parts of the Union; and it presents the question to the American statesman, how far it is right in itself, how far it is consistent with the principles of our confederacy, how far it is just towards the inhabitants of the Middle, Southern and Western States, to devolve the burthen of the sugar tax upon them, and relieve the New-England people from it, by continuing the vast inequality of duty upon the granular and the fluid state of the article?

Mr. B. here addressed himself directly to a Senator from

SENATE.]

Tariff Bill.

Pennsylvania, [Mr. MARKS] who had allowed his feelings, a few days before, to carry him so far as to throw out a very odious imputation on the Committee of the House of Representatives, which had reported the Tariff bill of the present session. That imputation was to this effect: that the increased duty on molasses was put into the bill for the purpose of poisoning it; and preventing the New-England members from voting for it. Mr. B. repelled this imputation, as a satire upon the New-England members, whose patriotism it would seem to rate so low, and as an unjust and disorderly attack upon members of the other branch of the Legislature; and said to the Senator who had made it, that he would confront him with very eminent authority from his own State, the speech of Mr. Fitzsimmons, a distinguished member of Congress from the State of Pennsylvania, in the year '90, who supported Mr. Madison in his proposal to place an equal duty on sugar and molasses; and supported him on the express ground, that the people of Pennsylvania should not, by his vote, be made to pay more tax on their sweetening than the people of New-England paid on theirs.

3. As it concerns the enlargement and preservation of the home market, for Louisiana sugar and molasses.—We possess, said Mr. B., an extensive region on the lower Mississippi, adapted to the production of these articles. Our laws have fostered and cherished their cultivation. It is the duty of an American statesman—and especially the duty of a legislator from any part of the valley of the Mississippi, to preserve and augment this cultivation. I am an American legislator; I am from the valley of the Mississippi. I acknowledge the force of the obligation I have announced, and shall discharge it with pleasure. And here, Mr. President, when sugar is the subject of debate, I shall seize the opportunity which it offers to satisfy my fellow citizens of the lower Mississippi, that in any reduction or abolition of duties, meditated by me on the extinction of the public debt, no injury is intended, and so far as my voice and vote can go, no injury shall be done to the domestic cultivation of this great staple by them. In saying this, I retract nothing, I explain nothing, which I have heretofore said. I am no man to retract or explain. I stand upon my words, and abide their import; all I ask is the benefit of my own words. I say then, that in the event of a reduction of the duty on imported brown sugar, consequent upon the extinction of the public debt, that no injury is intended, and none will be done to the sugar planters of the lower Mississippi. This is an assertion; and as such I do not claim for it any peculiar deference in or out of this chamber; but far be it from me to leave such a question dependent upon assertion; and fortunately for me, it is a question not of politics, but of commerce; a question which depends, not upon argument, but upon facts and figures, a question in the exact sciences, in which the data being fixed, the result is inevitable and incontrovertible. The facts and figures then are these, that the price of Louisiana brown sugar in all our markets now is, and for years has been, as any price current will shew, from two to three cents lower than that of Havana brown of the same class; and that the product of the Louisiana plantations is less than fifty millions of pounds, while the importations from Havana and other West India islands, exceed seventy millions of pounds. Such are the data. Now for the results—and these are that the present duty of three cents a pound on foreign brown sugar, is more than enough for the purpose of protection; it is more than enough to prevent the foreign article from coming into competition with the domestic; it is more than enough to prevent the foreign article from underselling the domestic in our own market, and sinking the price of the domestic below the sum for which it can profitably be raised. It is now raised in great quantity, and sold at a great profit, at an average of two cents per pound below its foreign competition; the planter is satisfied and getting rich upon such sales. Let him remain satisfied and grow richer still. I will not disturb his satisfaction, nor diminish his price, or his profits, a single farthing. But he is not able to supply half the demand; we have to import seventy or eighty millions from abroad in addition to all that he can make; and for this great quantity we have to pay, in consequence of a duty of three cents per pound, an average of two cents in the pound, more than we pay him for what he can furnish. The effect is, that to the amount of one cent, or thereabouts, the duty is protective; to the amount of two cents or thereabouts, it is a revenue measure; taking so much out of the pockets of the people, putting it into the Treasury, and having no effect whatever on the price or sale of the Louisiana sugar. Here then is a tax upon the community to the amount of one half or two thirds of the whole sugar tax, to the amount of a million or a million and a half of dollars per annum, without the smallest advantage to the Louisiana planter, answering no other purpose but that of replenishing the Treasury, and when the Treasury shall no longer need it, a tax which will remain without one solitary reason for keeping it up to its present height, and against numerous and cogent reasons for reducing it. I therefore reiterate my declaration, that when the public debt is paid off—a consummation devoutly to be wished—an event achievable in five years, the duty on imported brown sugar may be reduced without injury to the Louisiana planter, and with sensible relief to the American people. I speak of brown sugar, (in which description is comprehended mascabado*) and which is dutied at three cents a pound, and not of clayed sugar, which is dutied at four cents. The former is no better than the Louisiana, the latter is. The former is used by the poor, the latter is not. It is on the brown, which includes mascabado, that the duty is more than enough for protection, and may be reduced—how much it may be reduced, must depend upon the relative prices of the foreign and domestic article, when the reduction may be attempted. Future price currents must decide that question. What I commit myself to, is the principle which should govern the decision, namely, that the duty should be reduced to a duty of protection, when no longer needed for the purposes of revenue.

Having finished this exposition, Mr. B. said he was very far from being an enemy to Louisiana, as some late publications in that quarter might lead the uninformed to believe. During the seven years that he had sat in the Senate, he had given a laborious and cheerful attention to all the bills which concerned her welfare, or that of her individual citizens, not only in votes and speeches on this floor, but in the less ostentatious, and perhaps more useful investigations of the committee room. His will to serve her, was not limited to the peaceful business of legislation. He had been ready to serve her in arms and in battle. He had raised a regiment of Tennessee volunteers, and led it to Natchez in the first expedition of General Jackson to the lower Mississippi, in the winter of 1812-13, when the British were expected at New Orleans, but did not come. Even now, in this very moment, in the moving of this additional duty on molasses, he was giving a fresh proof of his regard for Louisiana, for if the motion succeeded, that State would have a new market opened in New England, for the consumption of her sugar and molasses, more than equal to the amount of her present crop.

Having placed the equity of his proposition, (to carry the duty on molasses to sixteen cents per gallon,) on ground which seemed to him to be inattaackable, Mr. H. next took a brief view of the objections which might be made to it, as comprehended from the course of previous debates. These were :

* An inferior kind of brown sugar, always selling at a less price, exclusively used by the poor, and corruptly called mascabado. The duties on sugar are: on brown, (including mascabado) 3 cents per lb; on clayed, 4 do.; on lump, 10 do.; on loaf, 12 do.

Tariff Bill.

{SENATE.

1. That the molasses were consumed by the poor in New England, and ought not to be taxed high.

2. That they were used in distillation for the manufacture of rum.

3. That they were necessary, as a return cargo, to keep up the New England trade to the West Indies in fish and lumber.

To each of these objections Mr. B. gave a brief answer.

To the first—that brown sugar was used by the poor in other parts of the Union in the same way that molasses was used by the poor in New England ; that the consumers of sugar now paid nearly six times as much duty as the consumers of molasses ; and under the provision of the bill, as it stood, would still pay nearly three times as much ; and that fair and impartial justice required that the burthen of supporting the government should be more equally distributed.

To the next—that the proportion of molasses distilled into rum, in the New England States, did not exceed the one-fifth part of the quantity imported ; and that to this extent it was entitled to no favor ; that the rum when made was inferior in flavor and wholesomeness to spirits made of grain ; and that being made of a foreign material it had no right to come duty free, or subject to inadequate duty, into a country abounding with grain, to diminish the demand for whiskey, and consequently diminish the demand for grain, and lessen its value, out of which the whiskey was made.

To the third objection, he replied that it was neither his wish nor intention to diminish the trade of New England to the West Indies in the articles of fish and lumber, nor could his proposition, if carried into a law, have that effect. It might diminish the profits on the return cargo, but could not diminish the trade itself. The demand for fish and lumber would still be the same ; the molasses to pay for them, would still be ready ; the only effect would be that this molasses would pay more duty than formerly, but not as much as it ought to pay, and not as much, by one-third, as the rest of the Union paid on the article for which it was a substitute. Besides, the return cargo might be changed into brown sugar ; and then the farmers of the valley of the Mississippi, who sent beef, pork, corn meal, flour and whiskey to the West Indies, would be on a level with the New England people who sent fish and lumber there. Both would have a return cargo subject to the same tax on arriving in the United States. At present the tax was unequal ; and operated partially in favor of the citizens of New England. The brown sugar paid a duty of nearly one hundred per cent ; the molasses, at five cents a gallon, had only paid a duty of 15 per cent ; at ten cents it would only pay 30 per cent ; and even at the rate proposed by him, to wit, 16 cents, it would only pay about 50 per cent ; a rate of duty little more than half of what this bill, in the article of woollen goods, imposes upon the Western, Southern, and middle States, for the benefit of New England.

Mr. B. concluded with a compliment to the vigilance, sagacity, perseverance, and unity of action, which had enabled the New England members, heretofore, to appropriate to themselves all the benefits, and leave to others all the burthens of the different tariffs. He did not blame them for it. Their paramount duty was to their constituents, and they discharged that duty with a zeal and assiduity worthy of all praise. But he should blame himself if he did not profit from their example. His paramount duty was to the people of Missouri ; and this duty required his best exertions to protect her staples, and to equalize, if possible, the burthens and the benefits of the present tariff. This was all that he was aiming at, either in the present motion, or in the motions made, or to be made by him ; and he wished it to be so understood by all concerned.

Mr. WOODBURY briefly opposed the motion of Mr. BENTON ; when, the question being put, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the duty on woollen blankets. In support of this motion, Mr. B. observed, that blankets were an article of necessity, required by every body ; but mostly by the poorest people. They were also required for slaves and Indians, and, indeed, no class could do without them. There had always been a distinction between the duty on blankets and other woollen goods, in the various tariffs, on the ground that they were of prime necessity. There was another reason which might be urged for removing this duty. It was, that the manufacture was not competent to the supply of the consumption of the country, and, as the duty would only benefit a few individuals, while the poorer classes suffered in proportion—as the Senate had refused to put any further duty on wool, he thought it would be but reasonable to take off the duty on blankets. Another reason in favor of this motion, was, that blankets were essential in the Indian trade. At present, the British brought them across the lines, while they also introduced their furs into this country free of duty. This was very bad policy : for, had these furs been taxed 37½ per cent., the revenue would have gained a million of dollars, and our trade have received ample protection. If the duty was continued, it would be a great injury to the revenue, and act, besides, as a heavy imposition on the poorest class of our community. He should be glad if the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures would give the amount of the manufacture of the article in this country, and its increase since 1824. The duty was not such as was given to the grower, when a paltry protection was extended to him, which was always gradual, but came down instantly upon the consumer.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, wished to know whether the manufacture had increased since 1824. At that time Congress laid a duty of 25 per cent. on the article, and he wished to know what had been its effect.

Mr. DICKERSON said he did not think the manufacture had increased to a very great extent. But the country was amply capable of producing the whole of the consumption.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made some further remarks, to show that the duty levied in 1824, had not operated effectually to increase the manufacture of blankets.

Mr. EATON opposed the motion, and read a statement of a Commissary, to shew the operation of the duties of 1824, on the price of the article, from which he argued, that a beneficial effect had been produced by the duty. The price had very sensibly decreased within a few years, which, he believed, must have been produced by the competition in our country, and the increase of the manufacture.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks in reply, attributing the fall of the prices, as was understood, to the reduction, by Great Britain, of the tax on wool imported into that country.

The question being then taken on the proposed amendment, it was negatived.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend, by inserting a provision laying a duty on furs, of all kinds, of 33½ per cent. according to the value.

Mr. BENTON remarked, that, when he proposed this duty, formerly, it was supposed that it would injure the manufacture of hats. But as one ounce of fur only was now put into a beaver hat, this duty would make but 8½ cents addition on each hat, while the revenue would be one hundred thousand dollars. He hoped the manufacturing interest would not spring forward to prevent so important a provision.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON then moved to amend the bill in the 3d section, by adding to the duty on hemp "ten dollars per ton, annually, until it amounts to ninety dollars;" which motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to amend the bill, by inserting, "on all manufactures of silks, from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, 30 per cent., and on all manufactures of silks, from countries this side of the Cape, 20 per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. WOODBURY said, the effect of this motion would be, to leave the duty as it now was on the manufactures of silk this side of the Cape of Good Hope. But, on those from beyond that Cape, it raised the duty five per cent. At this period of the session, he would occupy the attention of the Senate only a few minutes in stating the probable effect of the amendment, should it prevail. By the change of duty, the whole impost on silks, annually, would be somewhat raised for a time. This might increase the zeal already excited in this country for the culture of silk, and thus tend to encourage enterprise, and improve skill. Should the change alter in time our importations, and introduce into the market more of the silks of Europe, and less of those from India and China, till the former entirely engrossed the market, the effect would prove highly beneficial both to our agriculture and navigation. The commercial men in this body were very conscious that the discrimination in duty of five per cent. between silks from India and Europe, introduced in the tariff of 1824, had very considerably augmented the importations of those manufactured nearest home. Without troubling the Senate with a statistical detail, the year ending in September, 1826, exhibited an importation of almost five millions worth of this article from Europe, and of only a little more than three millions from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. All who heard him, and had reflected on the subject, were aware that the silks from India were paid for mostly in specie, and employed but little navigation directly, while those from Europe were chiefly obtained in exchange for cotton, tobacco, and other staple articles of agriculture, and gave occupation directly to a much larger amount of tonnage. Another effect would probably be, that the duty on some of these articles abroad would be lowered, with a view to reciprocate our friendly discrimination in favor of European silks. From one Power especially, and that was France, we might not only hope this; but it would give to her some substitute for the diminution occasioned by other parts of this very bill, in our present trade for woollens from that country. Should any objection be made to an increase of this impost, it might also be replied, it was a tax on what was in some degree a luxury, and chiefly used by the wealthy, while this same bill taxed very highly a great number of the first necessities of life, used by the humblest classes of society. He would only add, at this time, that the change now proposed was in exact conformity with the recommendation of the Committee on Manufactures, in 1824; and the experience of three years had shown the benefits of the discrimination so fully, that no further argument was wanted, he thought, to verify their recommendation in its fullest extent, and induce us to make the whole discrimination then advised, not only by the committee, but by the Chamber of Commerce in the first commercial city in the Union.

Mr. SILSBEE made a few remarks.

Mr. DICKERSON said, it appeared that the object of the amendment was to increase the discrimination. He agreed that the effect had been to reduce the amount of silk imported from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and he thought that the present duty was producing the change so rapidly, it was not necessary to increase the discrimination.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to make a single remark, as to the operation of the discrimination, and to propose to the gentleman from New Hampshire to fix some period at which the additional duty should commence, or it would operate severely on the merchants whose ships had already been sent to the East Indies for silks. The importers of this description of goods might suffer great loss, unless the amendment were so modified as not to go into effect until a period late enough to save their orders, already sent, from its operation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks in relation to the importance of our trade with France. He considered it to be our interest to be on the best terms with that country, as she took our articles in return—and it was but fair to give to her an advantage, in the silk trade, over China, where we were obliged to pay specie—although he had wondered that our merchants did not export cotton to the latter country, as the experiment had been made successfully in one instance, which he mentioned.

Mr. BENTON was decidedly in favor of the proposed amendment. He was in favor of this discrimination, when it was proposed in 1824, and the beneficial effects produced by the discrimination of five per centum, imposed at that time, encouraged him to carry the principle to the point now proposed. At present we got our chief supplies of silks from France, England, and the East Indies. From the latter place, we purchase for gold and silver; from the two former, for the products of our soil. We pay for French and English silks in cotton, rice, and tobacco; and our statistical tables show us, that our exports, in these articles, to one of the European Powers, France, has increased nearly three fold since 1824. It is the part of a wise and prudent policy to keep that increase on the rise; and the doubling the discriminating duties in favor of European silks, will contribute to effect that object. So much for agriculture. On the other hand, the navigating interest will be benefitted by the same policy. It takes but little tonnage to carry the gold and silver to China, which brings back, say three million dollars' worth of silks; but it would require at least 30,000 tons of shipping, the freight on which would be worth $400,000, at a cent and a half per pound, to carry as much cotton to France or England as would purchase the same amount of silks in those countries. Thus the interests of commerce, of agriculture, of the land holder, and ship owner, are both concerned in fostering the silk trade with France and England, in preference to that from beyond the Cape of Good Hope; and every interest is concerned in promoting a trade which consumes the products of the country, in preference to one that carries off its gold and silver.

Mr. WOODBURY modified his amendment on the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, so as to make its operation commence on the 3d day of June, 1829.

The motion was then agreed to.

Some discussion arose on a suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, to strike out that portion of the bill subjecting all invoices of goods to the decisions of appraisers, in which Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. SANFORD took part. Mr. W. did not then press his motion.

Other verbal amendments were made in the bill, to make it correspond with the amendment last adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved to amend the bill, by striking out the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th lines of the 3d section, which embraced the duty on cotton bagging, for which he gave, as one of his reasons, the fall in the price of cotton; since the duty had fallen so that it was felt severely by the planters.

Tariff Bill.—Deported Slaves.

[SENATE.]

The motion was rejected.

Mr. TAZEWELL moved to amend the bill, by striking out the duty on steel, lead, leaden shot, litharge, orange mineral, and sugar of lead.

Mr. T. said, that he had made the proposition for the purpose of making a single remark in opposition to the duty. All the lead mines in this country, of any value, were the property of the United States. It seemed to him an extraordinary policy that the Government should increase the duty for the purpose of adding to its own profits. He had raised the question in order that it might be settled whether it was proper that the Government should tax the People in this manner for its own profit.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. T., it was decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by levying a duty on oranges, limes, and lemons, as he observed, to protect the products of Florida; which was rejected.

Mr. BENTON also moved to amend, by levying a duty of 50 per cent. ad valorem, on olives, sweetmeats, and castor oil; which was rejected.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the bill by striking out the duty on imported spirits; which was decided in the negative.

Mr. SILSBEE moved to insert a duty on imported umbrellas. [Mr. S. also presented a memorial of manufacturers of the article, praying for an additional duty.] The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., moved that the date "30th of June" be stricken out, and the "1st of September" inserted, (the time at which the bill goes into operation;) which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill, by adding a proviso exempting all books, tracts, &c. for Bible and other religious societies, from the payment of the duties on such articles; which was rejected.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend the bill, by striking out that portion of the 8th section, which points out the duty of the appraisers, and empowers them to fix upon the value of importations independently of the invoices.

On this motion discussion arose, in which it was opposed by Messrs. DICKERSON, BARNARD, VAN BUREN, and SANFORD, and supported by Mr. WEBSTER.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the question was decided in the negative.

Mr. WOODBURY proposed the following amendment in relation to the duty on molasses: add at the end of 3d section, 20th line, the following words: "except such as the holder thereof shall give sufficient bond shall not be distilled; and, on all such, 5 cents per gallon."

The motion was negative.

The question then occurred on ordering the bill to a third reading, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

THE TARIFF BILL.

The bill making alterations in the several acts imposing duties on imports, was read a third time, and on the question, Shall the bill pass?

VOL. IV.—50

Mr. HAYNE spoke at length in opposition to the bill, and entered a solemn protest against it, as a partial, unjust, and unconstitutional measure, and concluded by moving an indefinite postponement of the bill; on which the question being taken by yeas and nays, it was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Berrien, Bouigny, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Cobb, Ellis, Hayne, Johnston, of Lou. King, McKinley, Macon, Parris, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S.C. Tazewell, Tyler, White, Williams, Woodbury.—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Benton, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Foot, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Ken. Kane, Knight, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Thomas, Van Buren, Webster, Willey.—27.

Mr. WEBSTER replied briefly to Mr. HAYNE.

Mr. BENTON read some statements to shew that the duties of 1824 had not been of any benefit to the agriculturist.

The question then occurring on the passage of the bill, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Cobb, Ellis, Hayne, Johnston, of Lou., King, McKinley, Macon, Parris, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S. Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, White, Williams, Woodbury.—21.

So the bill was PASSED, and returned to the House of Representatives, for concurrence in the amendments.

[The debate on the Tariff Bill in the Senate is very limited, the Editors not having been able, from circumstances beyond their control, to procure the remarks of all the gentlemen who engaged in the debate. Such portion of the prominent speeches on the bill, as were in their possession, are given in the preceding pages, no part of which did they feel themselves at liberty to withhold.]

DEPORTED SLAVES.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, the message and amendments from the other House, of the bill for the settlement of claims for slaves, under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, were taken up, and the proviso, offered by Mr. JOHNSTON, to allow the taking of evidence until the first of July, being under consideration, Mr. J. spoke at considerable length in defence of its object; and, in conclusion, withdrew it, substituting therefor an amendment for the same purpose, but which was not subject to the objections which had been made to the other, that it would dictate to the commissioners any particular course in the performance of their duty. Mr. J. then offered an amendment authorizing the commissioners to receive all testimony presented to them, in proper form, previous to the first day of July next, provided that notice of the testimony which they intend to offer shall be given by all individuals, within three days after the passage of this bill.

Mr. TAZEWELL opposed the motion, on the ground that it would be out of order to amend the amendment reported from the other House, as it was a proposition merely in relation to time, as it was an alteration of the time at which the commission should expire, from the 30th November to the 1st of September. He submitted to the Chair the question whether the amendment was in order.

The CHAIR said it was not parliamentary; but it was not competent to the Chair to decide.

SENATE.] Internal Improvements.—President Pro tem.—Ches. and Ohio Canal.—Land Claims. [MAY 15, 16, 1828.]

Mr. TAZEWELL asked if there was no mode by which the Senate could not act upon the motion.

The CHAIR said that it was competent to the Senate to decide upon it on the ground of incongruity.

Mr. BERRIEN then rose, and expressed himself at considerable length in favor of the motion.

Mr. TAZEWELL replied at great length, and insisted on the point of order which he had previously urged, also opposing the object of the motion as imposing a duty on the commissioners.

Mr. FOOT said the question appeared to be one of parliamentary practice, and he thought the Senate not competent to amend the amendment. The only way in which a modification could be obtained, would be for the Senate to disagree to the amendment, and then appoint a committee of conference.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, then withdrew his amendment, and moved that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, with the design of moving the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. TYLER observed that he had, several days since, moved that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CHAMBERS spoke at some length in opposition to the proposition of Mr. JOHNSTON.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the yeas and nays were ordered on the motion of Mr. TYLER to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TYLER read a letter from the commissioners to the Hon. Charles A. Wickliffe, of the other House, in support of his motion.

Mr. BERRIEN also made some further remarks opposed to the motion of concurrence, when, the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. McLANE, from the committee of conference on the amendments of the Senate to the bill for internal improvements, reported the following resolutions, agreed to by the managers of the two Houses, respectively:

1st. Resolved, That the Senate adhere to the fifth amendment.

2d. Resolved, That the Senate recede from all that part of the third amendment, after the word "expenses," in the first line, and that the same be modified in such manner as to read as follows: "For defraying the expenses incidental to making examinations, under the act of 30th April, 1824, $30,000, provided that this appropriation shall not be construed into a legislative sanction of any examinations or surveys which shall not be deemed of national importance, and within the provisions of the aforesaid act of 30th April, 1824."

On motion of Mr. COBB, the question was divided so as to be taken on the resolutions separately.

The first resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was rejected.

The question then occurring on the second resolution, it was agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Bouigny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Ken. Johnston, of Lou. Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, of S. C. Tazewell, Willey.—27.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bateman, Chandler, Cobb, Foot, Hayne, Smith, of Md. Macon, Parris, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Woodbury.—12.

THURSDAY, MAY 15, 1828.

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The Secretary having given notice of the absence of the Vice President from the Chair, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tem.; and a ballot having been taken, Mr. MACON was declared to have been elected.

Mr. MACON rose, and returned thanks to the Senate for the honor conferred on him; but wished to decline serving.

Mr. TAZEWELL then moved that Mr. MACON be excused from serving as President pro tem. This motion having been agreed to, nem con., another ballot was taken, and the vote stood as follows:

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,	26
HARRISON,	13
Scattering,	5

So Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was duly elected; and, having been conducted to the Chair, by Messrs. MACON and HARRISON, briefly addressed the Senate; making acknowledgments for the confidence which had been reposed in him, and the honor conferred upon him, and which had been entirely unexpected on his part. It was so long since he had occupied the Chair, that his knowledge of the rules of order were, perhaps, less perfect than, from the length of his service in Congress, might be supposed, and he might often ask for the aid and forbearance of his fellow-Senators; but he could assure them that he should discharge the duty of the Chair with fidelity and impartiality.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

The bill from the House to authorize the Corporations of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, to subscribe for stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, was read, and, on the question of ordering it to a second reading, it was decided in the negative, 12 to 13.

The bill from the other House to abolish the office of Major General of the Army of the United States, was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROWAN moved the reconsideration of the vote on the second reading of the bill authorizing the Corporations of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, to subscribe for stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

Mr. WEBSTER advocated the motion to reconsider, and expressed a hope that the bill would go to a committee.

Mr. EATON explained the bill, and said that the property of the corporations stood pledged for the payment of the subscriptions.

Mr. CHAMBERS observed, that this bill would be important or not, according to the decision of the Senate on another bill, which would probably soon come before them. If that bill should pass, this bill would be absolutely necessary, to enable the company to go on. The object of that bill could not be carried into effect without this. He presumed that no friend of the measure would ask the Senate to act on this bill, should the other be rejected. He trusted, therefore, that they would not strike a fatal blow to the measure, by staying this bill here.

Mr. McLANE expressed himself in favor of the reconsideration, although he would not pledge himself to vote for the main bill.

Mr. NOBLE considered it peculiarly hard, that Congress could not let the people of the District of Columbia crawl out of their nut-shell, or enjoy any of the benefits of internal improvement, in common with other parts of the country. He was in favor of giving to the people of this district, the benefits of the system, and thought they ought not to be bound down, while Congress was called the local Legislature. He hoped the motion to reconsider would be adopted.

The question was then put and carried.

The bill was read a second time, and referred to the committee on the Judiciary.

FRIDAY, MAY 16, 1828.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the bill to continue in force for a limited time, and to amend the act to enable claimants to lands within the State of Missouri, and Territory of Arkansas, was taken up; and, after having been discussed at length, by Messrs. HERRIEN, VAN BUREN, BENTON, BARTON, and MACON, the question occurred on engrossing the bill; and being taken by yeas and nays, was decided in the negative.

BREVE' RANK.

The bill to abolish Brevet rank in the Army of the United States was read a second time.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed a desire to hear the reasons for this measure.

Mr. HARRISON replied, and read a report upon the subject. The number of Breveted Officers in our Army was very great, so much so, that the system was considered an evil by the officers themselves. The bill would have no effect on officers already Breveted, or on those who were now entitled to Brevets. He observed that the task which had been imposed on him as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs had been a very disagreeable one; as, take whatever course they might, it was not supposed that they could give entire satisfaction.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that the subject was new to him; and he thought it required consideration. As he understood the gentleman, the bill had the same effect on those who had served ten years, as on those who were entitled to a Brevet for the gallantry of their exploits. He saw the difficulty of the subject which had been mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio. It might be that those who were already Breveted were of opinion, that the system should be done away. But what do those under them say? This wanted inquiry. He hoped, unless the gentleman from Ohio saw a prospect, which he, (Mr. WEBSTER,) did not see, that this bill will pass into a law this year, that he would allow it to lay over. He then moved to lay the bill on the table, but withdrew it.

On the request of Mr. HARRISON, who expressed a willingness to lay the bill on the table, as another bill was in a measure connected with it, which he should have called up this morning, but from an error, no printed copy being on the table. [Mr. H. was understood to allude to the bill from the other House, to abolish the office of Major General in the army of the United States.]

Mr. CHANDLER remarked, that the present bill would not touch those officers who were entitled to Brevet rank for actions in the field. He hoped, if the bill was laid on the table, it would be called up to-morrow, as the difficulty occasioned by the present system was accumulating every year; and as a short time only would be taken up in considering the bill, he thought it might be acted upon this year.

Mr. WEBSTER then renewed his motion, and the bill was laid on the table.

SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1828.

The Senate was occupied the best part of this day's sitting in discussing a bill in alteration of the act establishing a Sinking Fund; which was finally laid upon the table, for want of time, during the session, to give to its provisions a proper consideration.

MONDAY, MAY 19, 1828.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

The bill from the other House, for the relief of sundry Revolutionary Officers and Soldiers, and Widows, was read; and, on the question of reading a second time—

Mr. NOBLE objected to the second reading, and consequent reference to the Pension Committee, on the ground that there was not time to examine the various claims comprised in the bill, previous to next Monday night. The House had sent this bill at a late period. It was true they had been employed in other things. He did not take upon himself to say whether their time had been well employed or not. But now they came out with love and charity overflowing. At this late hour they hurry through this bill; and every man who has ever been where a gun was fired, is put on the pension list. He had been last year accused of slighting these claims. It went forth in the newspapers, which charged him of abusing the officers of the Revolution. The charge was unjust. He only wished to do his duty understandingly, and, if it took six months for the other House to mature their opinions, how could it be supposed that the Senate could do it in six days? The Committee on Pensions did not wish to stick their fingers into the Treasury at hap-hazard; which they must do, if they acted upon this bill this session: for it was impossible to go through with the examination. He, therefore, moved that it lay on the table; but withdrew his motion on the suggestion of

Mr. WEBSTER, who said he did not wish this claim passed over without some reason being assigned. He thought it better to let it have a reference, and afterwards, if the committee found difficulty in investigating the subject, it could then be laid on the table.

Mr. COBB said, the committee knew now, as well as they could hereafter, that it was out of their power to examine this bill during the present session. The cases comprised in it were all peculiar, being those of individuals who could not be placed on the pension list, under the pension law. And it was not in the power of the committee satisfactorily to investigate one hundred and fourteen cases, before the day of adjournment, even if they should sit during the sittings of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERS would regret that the bill should be laid on the table. It provided for individuals who were poor; and many of them would, probably, never have an opportunity of again applying for the benefit of this bill. He should regret that their claims should not be examined by the committee.

Mr. NOBLE said, that, to show that the committee were not unwilling to do their duty, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that, to obviate the difficulty which seemed to be apprehended, the committee might report on those claims against which there was no objection, and those might be acted on; which would be preferable to postponing the whole.

The bill was then read a second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

TUESDAY, MAY 20, 1828.

NAVY YARD BETWEEN CAPE HATTERAS AND FLORIDA.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, was taken up for consideration, viz:

“Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to Congress, at their next Session, whether the establishment of a Navy Yard, for the construction and repair of vessels of war, or a Depot for the collection of ship timber, at some point on the coast between Cape Hatteras and Florida, would be advantageous to the public service: And that he do also report to the Senate all the information in possession of the Department, showing the facilities afforded for such an establishment by Charleston and Beaufort, (South Carolina,) and Savannah, Brunswick, and St. Mary's, (Georgia,) together with the expense of creating the same.”

Mr. HAYNE said, that, upwards of four years ago, he had called the attention of the Senate to the subject of the establishment of a Navy Yard at Charleston, in South Carolina. He believed then, and had not changed his opinion since, that such an establishment would be extremely convenient to the Navy, especially to that portion of it which was employed on the West India station—generally composed of sloops of war and schooners. To these vessels, it would be a matter of great convenience to have a Navy Yard at some point between Cape Hatteras and Florida Cape, to which they could resort, not only for naval stores, but for necessary repairs. Mr. H. said, he was satisfied that the efficiency of our squadron, on the West India stations, and true economy, too, would be promoted by such an establishment. He was likewise well satisfied that, from the superior quality and greater cheapness of timber, and from other advantages, the interests of the service would be advanced, by building vessels of an inferior class at some convenient point on the Southern coast. Influenced by these considerations, and believing, moreover, that it was very desirable that a portion of the immense revenue collected at the South should, if possible, be expended there, on objects of national importance, he felt it to be his duty to submit the resolution of which he had spoken, very soon after he became a member of the Senate. But, though he had not lost sight of the object for one moment since, and had always improved every opportunity to urge it, he had never yet been able to arrive at a point, at which he could obtain even a decision on the subject. He knew, of course, when he first undertook to move in the business, that Congress would not act without an inquiry by the Naval Committee of the Senate, nor without a report from the Navy Department, on the practicability and expediency of this measure.

His first step, therefore, was to institute such an inquiry. The committee would not act without the opinion of the Department, and the Department would not act without a survey and examination. All, therefore, that he could accomplish, (and that was not easily effected) was the passage of a law directing a survey of the harbor of Charleston, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and expediency of establishing a Navy Yard there. It was nearly two years before the survey directed by that act was completed, and the report submitted to Congress. At this stage of the business, said Mr. H., and at the very moment that I indulged the hope that I should at length obtain a decision on a subject so deeply interesting to my constituents, the claims of our sister city, Savannah, were interposed; and the question was presented, whether Savannah or Charleston was best adapted to the purpose of a Naval establishment? The claims of Beaufort, Brunswick, and St. Mary's, were also, soon after, interposed, and new surveys were ordered. Though most of these surveys have been completed, the Senate has not, to this hour, been furnished with the results of the whole. In the mean time, a second petition has been presented from the city of Savannah, and the Committee on Naval Affairs, finding themselves still without the information necessary for a final decision on the subject, have directed me to submit the resolution which has just been read. Mr. H. said, that he would, in conclusion, only remark, that all that he desired, or could ask, was, that the proper department of the Government should (as soon as the reports were all made) candidly consider, and finally decide, whether, on account of any, or all, of the considerations he had stated it was not just and proper that a Navy Yard, or depot, for supplies, should be established at one of the places mentioned in the resolution; and, should that be decided on, he would be perfectly willing that the claims of Charleston should be compared with those of Savannah, St. Mary's, Brunswick, and Beaufort, and that an impartial decision should be made among them.

The resolution was then agreed to.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to take up the bill to amend and explain an act, entitled "An act confirming an act of the Legislature of Virginia incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company;" and an act of the State of Maryland, for the same purpose: the object of which having been explained by him, he asked the yeas and nays.

On this motion considerable debate took place, in which Messrs. DICKERSON, FOOT, HAYNE, and SMITH, of South Carolina, opposed it; Messrs. WEBSTER and McLANE desired that it should be taken up to-morrow; and Messrs. HARRISON, HENDRICKS, and NOBLE, advocated the present consideration of the bill.

The question being then put on considering, it was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Boulogay, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, Thomas, Tyler, Webster, Willey.—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, King, McLane, Macon, Parris, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury.—20.

Some documents were then read, on motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, explanatory of the act.

Mr. CHAMBERS made some explanations; when, the question being taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to take up the bill to authorize the subscription to stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company; on which he asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. COBB moved that the Senate go into Executive business; which was rejected.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, rose to speak upon a question of order. The bill which had been already ordered to a third reading had not been passed, and he thought it improper to consider the question of subscribing to stock in a company before its charter was granted.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he would merely correct a mistake in facts, which the gentleman from South Carolina had fallen into. The charter had been granted by a former Congress, and the bill which had been ordered to a third reading, only provided for its modification in certain particulars.

The question being then taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HENDRICKS, in reply to some remarks of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed that this was not a Western measure. Not one dollar would be expended west of the Alleghany mountains. So far from this being the case, by the express language of the bill, the canal was to terminate at Cumberland. This being the fact, it was not fair to argue that they were pressing Western measures, in preference to others, upon the notice of Congress. He did not, however, think, as others did, a long series of years would elapse before it would pass the Alleghanies. He believed that, in a few years, the stock of the company would become as valuable as that of the Erie Canal, and that it would be supported by subscriptions from every quarter. It had been assumed that this measure was commenced by Congress. This was not the case, as it had emanated from the Legislature of Virginia, which passed an act to incorporate the company in 1824. Since that period other confirmatory acts had been passed. Mr. H. here detailed the various acts in relation to the object under consideration. He then gave a succinct history of the various surveys, and their results, which were highly favorable to the project. He referred to the result of the Erie and Champlain canals; and expressed an opinion that the stock in the Che-

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal would become as valuable as in those works. He considered it highly important, as forming a bond of union between the East and the West. He read several documents to shew the nature of the work on the different sections, and the practicability of surmounting all the difficulties which the face of the country presented. The means for carrying the canal successfully into operation were within the reach of the company, if the assistance on the part of Government, provided for by this bill, should be granted. The subscriptions in the District of Columbia, of the three Corporations of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, and of the State of Maryland, amounted to about three millions, while the largest estimate of the expense of the canal to Cumberland was only about four millions. Virginia had not yet subscribed, nor had Pennsylvania; and the former was deeply interested in the completion of the work. The subscriptions which he had mentioned were entirely contingent, and depended upon the passage of this bill. The importance of its passage at this time was very great; as, if this session was allowed to pass by, the spirit which had operated to obtain the subscriptions which had been already made, would have abated, and the work would consequently be discouraged and delayed. The canal was to pass through a country abounding in valuable products, and would be of vast utility to one of the richest portions of the Union; and, from the view he had taken of the subject, he was of opinion that, large as the dividends of the New York canals were, those of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, after having been as long in operation, would be still greater. As a means of uniting the feelings and interests of the East and the West, he considered it far more important than all the millions which could possibly be expended in its construction.

Mr. MACON observed that he had but a few words to say on this subject. He had said, some time since, that the Constitution was dead and gone, and he should not speak of the constitutionality of the measure. He should also say nothing of its effect upon the public debt, because a public debt was now considered a public blessing. He looked upon this bill in the light of a partnership to be entered into by the Government with a number of individuals; and, said Mr. M., before I enter into partnership with a man, I should like to know who he is, and what is his standing. I should ask, beforehand, is he able? is he good at the Bank? is his reputation fair? But Congress was about to go into this partnership without knowing who they are to be connected with. He thought the corporations of the District of Columbia were now sufficiently taxed without going into farther embarrassments. But the Government would have to bear the burthen, as in the case of the Cumberland Road, the expense on which would last as long as the Government itself. He had offered a resolution, in the early part of the session, on the subject of that road, but it had never been reported on. He wanted to get rid of the Cumberland Road altogether. But it was said that the work could not go on unless Congress subscribed the million; so that it appeared that the whole depends on getting the United States by the hand. They had but a few days since passed a most enormous tariff, which must have some effect on the revenue—to what extent he did not know; but, at any rate, it did not seem to be the time for entering into other grand projects. As to the canal stock in the State of New York, he thought it belonged to the State, and that there was no stockholders, which made quite a different case from this. He knew no other consideration on which it could be supported, but the design to keep up the public debt forever. That appeared to be the object. There were many reasons against the project; but he would only mention Pennsylvania was about to make another canal; Baltimore was about making a rail-road which would affect the same section of country through which this canal was to pass; so that they would interfere with the subscriptions to stock in this company, and it would be a long time before subscriptions by private individuals, to any great amount, would be made.

He did not believe in artificial regulations to bind together the different sections of the country. They must be bound together by love. A durable public opinion cannot be bought. The moment you cease dealing out the price for this sentiment, it stops. Good will and a fellow feeling must do it. He was sorry to perceive that those who formerly voted with him, and who were able to discuss the subject, had, in this instance, abandoned their ground. He would trouble the Senate no further, and would now take his leave of it.

Some conversation here took place between Messrs. CHANDLER, HENDRICKS, and CHAMBERS, in regard to the documents relative to the bill, which Mr. HENDRICKS observed were very long, and that their reading would consume much time.

Further discussion took place, in which Messrs. CHAMBERS, COBB, and EATON participated, at considerable length.

Mr. CHANDLER suggested that the bill which had been ordered to a third reading this morning, ought to be passed before that now under consideration was acted upon. He, therefore, moved to lay this bill upon the table, in order that the other might be taken up, but withdrew it in favor of Mr. KANE, who opposed the motion, and was followed on the same side by Messrs. CHAMBERS, RUGGLES, and NOBLE.

Mr. CHANDLER then renewed his motion to lay on the table; and the question having been taken by yeas and nays, it was negatived.

Mr. COBB then moved to amend the bill in the first section, seventeenth line, by striking out "half," so as to make it necessary for the stockholders of the company to pay in the whole of their assessments before the Government shall be required to advance its assessments.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. EATON, WEBSTER, and NOBLE; and supported by Messrs. COBB and BERRIEN, who suggested a modification, which was accepted by Mr. COBB, so as to make it requisite for the stockholders to pay the whole of their assessments, except those whose stock shall have been forfeited for non-payment.

Mr. KANE opposed the amendment as modified, as also did Mr. BENTON.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. CHAMBERS and COBB, when Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved an adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 21, 1828.

The bill to confirm the act of the Legislature of Virginia, incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, and an act of the Legislature of Maryland, was read a third time and passed.

RETRENCHMENT REPORTS.

Mr. BENTON moved that 3000 copies of the reports of the committee of the other House on Retrenchment, be printed.

Mr. KING said, that it was now late in the session, and if ordered to be printed, these documents would not come to the members before their franking privilege was over. It had been so last year. He had received several documents after his franking privilege was at an end, and he could not send them to those individuals to whom they would have been useful, without their being at the expense of postage, or paying it himself. He thought the number moved was too large, and he would move to insert 1,500, instead of 3,000.

Mr. BENTON said, that, a long time since, he had thought, that, without any regard to persons, the two Houses ought to have their separate printers, and his reason for so thinking was, that one printer could not execute the work for both Houses with the speed that was required. As an illustration of this fact, he would remark, that the Commercial Report, being a statement of the tonnage, &c. of the country, had not formerly been printed until after the rising of Congress. But this year, it had already been printed several days. The consequence of there being two printers was, therefore, advantageous, so far, as the promptness with which the work was done was much increased.* The documents which were now under consideration could, therefore, be printed before Senators went away, or would follow soon after them. These reports would, he believed, prove acceptable to their constituents, as the subject was one of great interest to the American People. They also had the peculiar merit of presenting both sides of the question pro and con. The motion to print 3,000 was then agreed to, on a division, 22 to 21.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then taken up, being the bill to authorize the subscription to stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; the amendment offered by Mr. COBB on yesterday, still pending.

Mr. CHAMBERS asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS remarked, that, in his opinion, if the amendment passed, it would operate as a serious injury to the measure, as it would have the effect to postpone the payment of the million subscribed by the Government, until all the instalments of the other stockholders were paid in.

Mr. COBB said, that it was not his design to destroy the bill, but to provide for the safety of the Government. They were going into a doubtful scheme. He would ask attention to the subscriptions for stock in this District. The amount was small—was contemptible—while not one single dollar was subscribed in Pennsylvania, nothing in Virginia, nor in Ohio—for the benefit of which this work was to be done—after all. The whole subscription was in the District of Columbia: and he believed that they were made for the purpose of being forfeited. He drew this inference from the subscriptions themselves. They presented but a beggarly account; and if the Senate would examine them, it would be found that the men of known capital and prudence were not among the subscribers. And he did not doubt, that, when the United States should come forward, they would immediately be forfeited, the object having then been gained. Another circumstance had been brought to his notice, this morning, which he thought of great importance. When they looked at the act of Maryland, it is stipulated that the million shall first be paid by the United States, before her subscriptions are to be considered binding. The act passed also by the State of Pennsylvania provided that the whole of its subscriptions should be expended within the limits of the State. If this was not done, the act was to be withdrawn, and to prove of no effect. Ought not these circumstances to make the Senate cautious in acting upon this matter? He had read the act this morning, and he was strongly impressed with the conviction that it ought to lead the Senate to pause and consider well the plan to which it was giving aid. When he saw so much caution on the part of those States, and such doubt expressed by the conduct of the People of the District, he could not but think they should act with great deliberation. From what he had heard, he was now led to believe that it was not contemplated to carry the canal beyond Cumberland. If so, it would have to compete with the operation of the Rail Road, which was about to be built by the citizens of Baltimore, which would carry the produce to a better market. That Rail Road would touch the Potomac, and, to a great extent, supply to the People in its vicinity all the advantages of the Canal. It seemed that they were plunging in this business without the least reflection. To him, however, it did not seem a trivial matter. And, although the Senator from Tennessee, in his remarks of yesterday, spoke of a million of dollars very lightly, to him [Mr. C.] it did not seem in the same light. The times were too hard in his State, to allow him to think lightly of so heavy an expenditure as this bill proposed. He thought they ought to pause, convinced, as he was that there was not time at this period of the session to act upon it. This had been the most extravagant session that he ever recollected, and it would be seen that all those measures of Internal Improvement, the amount of which had been so vast, had their direction to the Western country. So much so, that it appeared to him that the scuffle had been to see which party should get the West. Such, he thought, had been too generally the system of legislation this session; and he did not think that the Representatives of the People were in that calm unbiassed state of mind which was requisite to sound legislation. He therefore thought this subject ought to be deferred, to come up next year, when it could be more fully understood.

Mr. HARRISON said, that the State he had the honor to represent, seemed to have a fatal name. The very sound of Ohio seemed to present a spectre to the minds of certain gentlemen. It was now said that this bill was to be passed for the good of Ohio. He had yesterday said that Ohio would not subscribe for it, because not beneficial to her—nor was she, in any degree, interested in the object. It would, however, be eminently beneficial to the State of Maryland, and to the State of Virginia, as well as to this District. These latter considerations actuated him in supporting the bill, and he had never been more disinterested in his support of any measure. For, as he had said yesterday, he did not believe that the canal would go beyond the Mountains. This was however, no motive with him, as, if it went only to Cumberland, it would be vastly beneficial to this District, and the States of Maryland and Virginia. As to the subscriptions, he believed that it had been aided by some of the first men in the District, as he perceived that Lord Fairfax had subscribed 50,000 dollars, and Judge Washington for a large number of shares. Mr. H. had been told, by a gentleman from Virginia, that the People of his State were more interested in this, than in any other measure that had for a long time been before Congress. It was certainly not an Ohio measure. It was not thought of there, because they were not interested in it; so little, indeed, that his constituents, probably, would not know whether he voted for it or against it.

Mr. HENDRICKS observed, that he had yesterday, protested against this bill being set down as a Western measure, and he wished now, also, to declare, that this was not, so far as he understood it, a political measure. If no subject could be settled upon other than party principles, Congress had much better go home than remain here. Mr. H. then spoke of the act of Pennsylvania, which he said could not be confirmed, because the Board of Directors had not been formed. There had been already, two millions of stock subscribed, all of which was contingent, and dependent on the passage of this bill. Mr. H. made a few remarks in conclusion, which the reporter did not hear distinctly.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that he thought the effect of this bill was not understood. The friends of the measure seemed sanguine of carrying it, and it might be that they had the votes to effect it. Still, he thought it not satisfactorily examined, and that the Senate was legislating in the dark. For this reason, he wished to postpone this subject to the next session. He was of opinion, that, if they entered into partnership, they ought to know who were their partners. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia contemplated a proper security to the United States. It was true, that the United States would appoint one-third of the Directors; but there would be two-thirds elected by the other Stockholders, against the Government. Congress ought to be unwilling to do that, which no prudent person would do. We would not enter into connexions, without knowing our partners: neither should the Government. He would ask whether the Senators had examined the Charter? He had not done it minutely, but he had found one thing in it which was worthy of notice. It appeared that all the Stock was not to be paid in money, as there was a provision that it might be paid in the Stock of the Potomac Company.

[Mr. D. read a passage in the Charter.]

Nearly half a million might be subscribed in this Potomac Stock. He supposed that the Stock was somewhat under par, as, in looking over the price-current, he did not find the Potomac Stock noticed, whereas, in the London Market, the New York Canal Stock sold at a high rate. It had been intimated to him, that it was selling for nothing—that it was now utterly worthless: but, if Congress passed this bill, it would become good in the market, and would be bought up to be made available, in paying for the shares in this Company. There ought to have been in this Charter a proviso, that the Company should not enter into any banking or other operations, foreign to the object of its incorporation. Such a proviso was inserted in the act of Pennsylvania, and experience had proved that it was absolutely necessary to insert these negative words, to prevent the perversion of the stock to banking or any other business. But it appeared, from the words of the bill, that this Company was to make its dividend not only on the Stock of the Canal, but on other resources. What could these other resources be, if it was not designed that the funds should be employed for other purposes? He thought the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia was necessary: for, he was not willing to come in with this million, and make this Potomac Stock valuable. Indeed, he saw no good reason for the provision in relation to the shares of the Potomac Company, as, by it, the bill was rendered a hotch-potch, not easily to be defined. It appeared that Congress was about entering into a speculation, from which others were to reap profit. He was in no way opposed to the interests or prosperity of the District of Columbia. He voted, last year, for the appropriation of $20,000 for the sufferers at Alexandria, and he feared that he did so more from feeling than judgment. But, if Congress was to do any thing for this District, he had rather give the million of dollars out and out, than enter into a speculation of this kind, full of doubts and difficulties.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, he rose to correct the misconceptions of the gentleman from Georgia. He would say, emphatically, that the law of Pennsylvania had no more to do with this act, than the law of Tennessee. As to the law of Pennsylvania, it was provided that it should have no effect, unless the State of Maryland should pass a certain law. The State of Maryland never passed the law; so that the law of Pennsylvania was a dead letter. The law of Maryland provided that the Canal should go no farther than the Eastern side of the mountain. The Eastern section was first to be constructed out of the funds raised by this Company. That act had been ratified by an act of Congress. The law of Pennsylvania, on the contrary, never has been ratified. He did not care what words were introduced into the bill, it could not be more imperative than in the act of Maryland.

While he was on the floor, he would make one remark, in answer to the gentleman from New Jersey. He thought that, if the gentleman would examine the clause in the Charter, which he had read, he would be convinced by the very passage.

[Mr. C. here gave the history of the Potomac Company.]

If the Potomac stock were to be always as it was now, he would agree with the gentleman. But, when it becomes valuable by the operation of this act, it is a matter of value. By reference to the charter, it would be seen that the holders of Potomac stock could put in their stock and the debts due to the Company, but not on equal terms. They would not come in until those stockholders who had paid their money should have received ten per cent; then, those who hold their stock under these certificates, may come in and receive their six per cent. Mr. C. here read the charter, to show that there were three grades of stockholders, who were not placed on the same footing. He remarked, that the State of Maryland was debtor to those individuals who purchased this stock, and the State had never lost sight of a design to make that stock in some way valuable. He could not but remark, that the gentleman was very charitable in his proposition to give the million of dollars, out and out, but he believed that, if Congress were inclined to give that sum to the District, they could do it in no way more acceptably than by giving it towards this object.

Mr. McLANE observed, that, although friendly to the bill, he had doubts in relation to his vote. Whether it were better to defer the bill to another session, or to endeavor to modify it so as to make it acceptable, had seemed doubtful.

Mr. CHAMBERS remarked, that, unless the bill passed this session, it would be unavailing.

Mr. McLANE said, it was not his intention to embarrass the bill. He would only call the attention of gentlemen to the propriety of stopping here, not that they are to struggle for the system, but to consider the amount already expended for internal improvements this year. The amount was already nearly two millions, which was a large inroad on the funds, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury. He was a friend of the system, as he had formerly shewn, but he was of opinion, that, if it was to go on in a regular and efficient manner, Congress could not expend more than a million and a half with safety and propriety. But especially at this time an eye ought to be had to the finances, when Congress had just passed a tariff which threatened to overturn the revenue. He had made these remarks to explain the light in which he should look upon this bill, were it of a different character—a common case of internal improvement. But, on this measure, he felt differently. This District is ours, and it is our duty to cherish it. This City has been fixed on as the Seat of Government, and as such it ought to be aided. No one is to suppose that we are to keep this city in a ragged state; that it is to be stunted in its growth by the neglect of Congress, or that they will refuse to open its natural resources, and give it a fair share of the advantages enjoyed by other parts of the country. Now, Sir, I am in favor (said Mr. McL.) to aid in providing, while the Atlantic cities are enjoying the profit and prosperity which flow from internal improvement, for the development of the natural advantages of the District of Columbia, and of doing all that can be done to make the City of Washington a great city. I am bound to look upon it as the permanent Seat of the General Government, nor do I wish it otherwise. I wish to keep it here, and by improving the city to give no inducement to remove it.

But the great objects to be effected cannot be done without assistance; and that assistance Congress ought to give. He did not enquire into the particulars of the cost, or the results of this canal. He did not count the hogheads of tobacco that would be floating down its waters. To him, it was sufficient to know that the country into the heart of which it would penetrate, was a great empire rich in natural products and fertility; and that its trade had been considered of sufficient importance to induce the city of Baltimore to undertake the construction of a rail road to bring its products to that city. New York, in advance, had anticipated these results, and had already in operation a vast canal. The capital of the country ought to be allowed to share in these benefits. These were the motives on which he was in favor of this bill; not that he was willing to give a million without producing a beneficial effect, but because it is a great work, and one which interests the whole country. He wished to take it up coolly, and would not detain the Senate long in examining the objections that had been made to the bill. It was assumed, that all that this incorporation wanted, was the subscription of a million of dollars by Congress. It was said that the Pennsylvania law was a dead letter. He did not think so. It was true that the eastern section would go on without touching Pennsylvania. But the western section comes under her law. Now, the gentlemen of the Company may say, after this organization, We will not advance our money, unless you will allow us to do the whole—the western, as well as the eastern, section of the work. And then the act of Pennsylvania comes in. It is, then, no longer a dead letter. And thus the operations of the Company might be suspended by the differences of the stockholders; and, should it be so, where will the money advanced by the Government be? In the hands of the Directors. But it will be idle and unproductive. It will not be active for the purposes of the Company. Therefore, to obviate this, he was disposed to insert a provision to cause the payment of the stock taken by the United States whenever the Company went on with its operations. He was, therefore, disposed to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, and in favor of a proposition which he understood a gentleman from Connecticut intended to present. He had examined the subject, and was friendly to the design; but, as a public man, he thought it his duty to endeavor to provide for the security of the Government against unforeseen contingencies.

Mr. MARKS said, he would trouble the Senate but with a single remark. He had been informed that application was made last year to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, to remove the shackles from the law of that State, in relation to this object, and that it was not acted on. The law was framed so that it was not operative until the canal entered the State. In relation to the application, it was not possible to say what the Legislature would do, for it was not possible to say what we would do ourselves any long period in advance. But he believed that the Legislature of his State would be induced to remove, as far as possible, all obstacles for the attainment of this great object. He was opposed to the amendment now before the House, as giving an undue advantage to the United States over the other stockholders.

Mr. FOOT said, that, as the gentleman from Delaware had referred to him, he would now propose an amendment to which he would call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia, as he considered that it would embrace the object of his motion. Mr. F. then moved to amend the bill by inserting in the 8th line, 1st section, after the word "of," the words "and paid by," so as to read: "and [the United States] to pay for the same, at such time, and in such proportions, as shall be required of, 'and paid by,' the stockholders generally," &c. &c.

While he was up, he would take the opportunity to say, that his opinions upon the subject of Internal Improvement had been often expressed, and were well known. He looked on this as a different case. As to the two States through which the canal was to run, their assent had been granted already, and Congress being the local Legislature of the District of Columbia, there appeared to him no objection to the bill in proper form.

Mr. DICKERSON asked for explanation, and further objected to the bill, that it contained no proviso, that the stock should not be employed in banking and other operations.

Mr. WEBSTER said, he would like to know if such requisitions were usually made. He mentioned several companies which had been bound by no such restrictions. This company held its rights under several Governments, which might be considered in some respects rivals. The interests of these several Governments were necessary to be consulted, and great difficulty must have been experienced. The company had overcome all these obstacles, and had obtained the acquiescence of these several Powers, and now they want the assistance of Congress. But it seemed not sufficient to examine the laws: not sufficient to place the usual guards to the bill. But we are to fear a bank in disguise. Now, on the contrary, it appeared to him that Congress might safely take it for granted, that the corporation was as secure as any other, because they were interested to retain the assistance of the Government; and that the United States were as secure as was necessary, they not being called on to pay their assessments, until one half of the other assessments were paid. The proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut was essentially the same as that of the gentleman from Georgia, before it was modified by him, and would have the effect to tie up the operations of the company, when a single stockholder should fail to pay in his assessment. It would have the effect to destroy the measure, and place the United States in a most unequal point of advantage. If it was adopted, he thought it would be found necessary to take it off next year. There must be some kind of confidence in the company and the stockholders, made up of people who are interested, and would not, by any act of their own, wilfully incur the withdrawal of the assistance of the Government. I take it that the objection is a broader one than that stated. It appears to me, that, if the Constitutional question could be more satisfactorily understood, we should not hear these objections to the details of the bill.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that he had voted for some of the objects alluded to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and, in some instances, he had repented doing so. But this was a larger project, and more precaution was necessary. The United States being about to take one-third of the stock. The gentleman has told us, that we must trust somewhat to the company. Why should we do so? The Legislature of Pennsylvania passed a law, merely allowing the canal to pass through the State, and yet she has seen fit to insert a provision against entering into banking or mercantile operations. There had been some striking instances of the kind, which all must remember. There was the Manhattan Company, in New York, incorporated to supply the city with water. The whole design appeared, at last, to erect a bank, which went on without any relation to the water works. It was so, also, with the New Hope Company, which was incorporated to build a bridge, but which was converted into a bank. Now, in this instance, he saw no reason why as much precaution should not be made use of as had been found necessary in less important companies.

Mr. COBB said he rose to enquire whether a person could not go into the market and purchase Potomac stock, and make his payment for those shares for which he had subscribed in that stock. The reading of the charter would convey to him that idea. If it was so, what would be the consequence? Suppose the United States were to be called on for two hundred thousand dollars, and the other subscribers were to pay in their share of the assessment in Potomac stock, would it not be according to the charter? I say it would. And thus the canal would go on upon the money advanced by the United States alone.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that the holders of the Potomac stock were authorized to become subscribers to the stock of this company, calculating their amounts according to their stock. But, in no case would the Directors have the power to allow an evasion like that mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia. The modes of attack upon this bill were of various kinds. Why, yesterday, the District was a bankrupt, and obliged to bring here a schedule of its effects. And now the Government is to bear the whole expense of the canal. But there was no power to render the available funds of the company useless. Nor was it for the interest of any party that it should be done. The representatives of the District in the Board of Directors, and the Directors on the part of the United States, would all, as a matter of course, prevent such a transaction. Would they do any thing to destroy their own interest, or to destroy the company? We cannot believe that these individuals would do any thing of the kind. But the words of the law, and the charter, are sufficient, and they sweep the idea of this objection from under the gentleman. [Mr. C. here read from the charter.] The moment they should attempt to do what the honorable Senator supposed, the charter would be vacated, and the association would be destroyed. Is it, then, to be believed, the Directors would follow such a course? Are these men madmen? Would they do what would destroy the company? It cannot be supposed. He would answer one more question, in relation to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. When that company was incorporated, the stock of a former company was in existence, and the charter brought in that stock in the same manner as is proposed in this bill. He spoke advisedly, because he had some shares in his own possession. In that company the old stockholders came in, not after, as in this case, but with the others. In that case, the old stock was a much larger amount in proportion, than in this; and yet no speculation, no bank grew out of it.

Mr. COBB said, that the gentleman from Maryland had not answered his objection. It still appeared to him, [Mr. C.] that, when one-fifth had been paid in of the whole amount, only that of the United States would have been paid in available funds. The remainder might have been paid in stock of the Potomac Company. He understood that the State of Maryland was indebted to the Potomac Company, and that this was the means which it was to take to pay off the debt. The United States would pay in its fifth, 200,000 dollars, in cash; the share to be paid by Maryland would be 100,000 dollars; and what does she pay it in? Why in Potomac stock! Well, the City of Washington has its share to pay; and they too will pay it in Potomac stock. They will buy it up in the market, and apply it in this manner. Georgetown and Alexandria will do the same. Thus the work will commence with the 200,000 dollars of the United States, and the useless scrip of the Potomac Company for the rest. This, to use the words of the gentleman from New-Jersey, is practising a little too hard upon Uncle Sam. It appears to me to be tugging too hard at his purse, and calling a little too loud for his aid. The paper which would be given would be mere fodder and worse. It would not purchase fodder. But we are told that we ought to have confidence in the Company; and that we must trust them. But can we trust them, when we know that they will be directed by their interest, and if they can buy for a dollar what will be valued at one hundred dollars, will do it. It would appear that I did injustice to the Corporations of this District yesterday, in saying that they were bankrupt; and that I have put them to the trouble of producing a schedule of their property. There was certainly no need for it; for the Senator from Tennessee gave a schedule yesterday; and he said that the property of individuals in this District, amounted to five millions. Now, I say, that the property of individuals is not the property of the Corporation. But are they not poor? Will any man who knows deny it? Do they not owe several hundred thousand dollars? Have they not begun a City Hall, which, from want of money, they cannot finish? And is not nearly all the private property in the City mortgaged to the Banks; while they are the real capitalists? No man could deny these facts. He was formerly a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and he became acquainted with the situation of the Corporations, and he knew them to be poor and depressed. He did not believe that the subscriptions would be found good, and he was more particularly against the scheme, because it was to oppress the poorest class of people. It was now admitted that the Canal was to go no farther than Cumberland, and he would ask whether the rich products that had been spoken of were to be found in its vicinity. If they were, he had not heard of them. Was there coal or iron in the neighborhood of Cumberland? He had not heard that they were found there. But the funniest idea was one that had been broached yesterday by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. NOBLE] and that was the floating down masts from the Western country. He did not know how a mast could be brought down by the zig-zag of a Canal, which must be a thousand times more crooked than the little Canal in this City, through which he did not fear to say the mast of a man of war could not be floated. He saw no way in which it could be effected, unless by some new machine, which should carry the mast in the air above the Canal, and unaffected by its sinuosities. He should, if his own amendment were rejected, vote for that of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HENDRICKS did not rise to answer the mast argument of the gentleman from Georgia; but to spar with one of his statements. He says the amount of the assessment on the shares held by Maryland, Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, that is to say 600,000 dollars, may be paid in in Potomac stock. If he could bring 600,000 out of 160,000, then his statement would be correct. But I state from documents which cannot be denied, that there is only 160,000 in the hands of individuals. Maryland has subscribed half a million, exclusive of this; Virginia had also a share of this Potomac stock; but the whole did not amount but to about 300,000 dollars.

Mr. DICKERSON rose to correct the gentleman from Indiana, as he found by a reference to documents, that there was upwards of 400,000 dollars of the Potomac Stock.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that it had no bearing on the case, 160,000 dollars only being held by individuals. Of the two millions already subscribed, none of it was subscribed in Stock.

Mr. COBB said, that may be; yet it may be paid in this Stock; because the Charter authorizes Maryland to pay a share in Stock. So it may be with the State of Virginia. She may go into market, and sell her Stock, and it will be purchased by individual Stockholders to pay in their shares. This would be the effect of it.

The question being taken on Mr. COBB's motion, it was negatived, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Hayne, Macon, Parris, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Mr. FOOT then moved the amendment previously stated.

Mr. CHAMBERS asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BENTON supported the motion to amend, in a few words.

Mr. WEBSTER considered that this amendment would withhold the payment of the assessment of the United States, until the other Stockholders had all paid in. He thought it now stood as it should; that the Government were on the same footing as other stockholders, with the advantage of not being called on until a moiety should be paid by the other Stockholders.

Mr. FOOT said a few words in support of his amendment; when

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, Kane, King, McLane, Macon, Parris, Ridgely, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury—24.

Mr. FOOT moved further to amend, by striking out of the 16th, 17th, and 18th lines the following words: "nor until one-half of the aggregate amount of such assessments shall have been paid." He observed, that his object was to place the United States in the same position as other stockholders.

Mr. COBB asked the yeas and nays on the question; which, being taken, was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Macon, Parris, Ridgely, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of S. Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Bateman, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Thomas, Webster, Willey—19.

The question then occurring on engrossing the amendment, and ordering the bill to a third reading,

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, spoke briefly in answer to some remarks of Mr. McLANE, in relation to the funds in the Treasury.

Mr. McLANE replied briefly; and Mr. JOHNSTON made a few additional observations; when, the question being put, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on engrossing the bill, on motion of Mr. EATON, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

THURSDAY, MAY 22, 1828.

The bill to authorize a subscription to the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal was read a third time, and passed.

FRIDAY, MAY 23, 1828.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, made a report in relation to the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of sundry officers, soldiers, and widows, that it was not possible to act upon the bill at this late period of the session, and moving that the committee be discharged from the consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

DUTY ON WINES.

The bill to reduce the duty on imported wines was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOODBURY observed that he had made some preparation to give a full view of the benefits likely to result from a revision of the present duties on wines, but this was not a period of the session when such a view could be useful. The bill now before us must be taken as it is, and the principles on which it rests be received without much discussion, or no time will remain for any change whatever to be made in the existing tariff. He would then merely state the material alterations effected by this bill, and the probable effects, from its passage, on our commerce and revenue. It reduced the duties on Madeira one-half, because it was now so enormous as to have destroyed a large portion of a valuable commerce with that island. This was fully developed in the documents that had been laid on our tables this session, but which there was not time or perhaps necessity now to read. The wines of France and Germany that before paid the same duty with Madeira, were now required to pay only 30 cents per gallon, because the quantity of that description imported was small, and the trade for them mostly a barter trade, highly advantageous to this country. The duty on Claret, in casks, was lowered to 10 cents per gallon; but still it was as high, and, indeed, higher, on the first cost of Claret, than the duty on Madeira. This last wine had become almost a necessary of life in the southern part of our Union, and an increase of the use of it, by a reduction of the duty, would increase the exchange market for some of our most valuable staples, such as cotton, tobacco, and rice. The changes thus far did not differ very essentially from those contained in the bill which passed the Senate last year. But the next, and, in his view, one of the most important changes, was in doubling the present duty on non-enumerated wines. By the present law it is 15 cents per gallon; last year 12 cents was proposed; by the bill before us, 30 cents per gallon. These non-enumerated wines included something like 38-40ths of the whole importation of wines into the United States during the last three years. Thus, in 1825, the whole quantity was 2,688,640 gallons, of which the non-enumerated wines were 2,073,569 gallons; in 1826 the whole was 2,780,574, and the non-enumerated 2,047,637; and in 1827 the whole 2,767,893, and the non-enumerated 2,043,254. Gentlemen will thus see that only 15 cents per gallon has been paid on about 38-40ths of all the wine imported, while, by the proposed bill, 30 cents per gallon would be paid. This change will not only prevent frauds caused by bringing in wines of high value at a low duty, under names not enumerated in the present tariff, but will tend to equalize the duties much nearer than they now are, according to the first cost of the different kinds of wine.

He would say no more, under the pressure of business now on our tables, except to state that the whole revenue on wines would be increased between one and two hundred thousand dollars by the present bill, provided precisely the same importations took place hereafter, as during the last few years, and provided the calculation be made on the same quantity of non-enumerated wines. The revenue on wine was last year 711,790. But compute the duties on the same importations according to the proposed tariff, and without altering the quantity of non-enumerated wines, and the revenue would be over 820,000 dollars. But under this bill, doubtless, the non-enumerated wines will be much less in quantity; and yet the friends of this bill believed the whole importations would be much augmented under its provisions, and the revenue in that way still improved. Considering, then, the probable benefits to agriculture, navigation, and revenue, from the proposed changes, and that it was now too late for any amendment to be safely made, he trusted the bill would meet with little or no opposition.

Mr. CHANDLER said that the Senate had within a few days passed a bill increasing the duties on articles of necessity. As this was an article of luxury, and was chiefly used by the rich, he was opposed to taking off the duties, either on non-enumerated or on any description of wines. He asked the yeas and nays on the question; which being taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Cobb, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, McLane, Macon, Ridgely, Robbins, Silabee, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Webster, Williams, Woodbury.—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Chandler, Chase, Dickerson, Knight, Marks, Noble, Parris, Ruggles, Seymour, Willey.—10.

OFFICE OF MAJOR GENERAL.

Mr. HARRISON moved that the Senate take up the bill from the House to abolish the office of Major General. Agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON said that he had but one word to say on this subject, and that was, that, after a full consideration of this subject, since it had been acted upon formerly by the Senate, he had not seen cause to change the opinion expressed in a report made by himself. To him it was clearly a mistaken idea, that the six thousand men composing the Army of the United States, scattered over our extensive territories, did not require the influence of a supreme commander. On the contrary, he considered that our army required it more than if it was composed of twelve thousand men concentrated. He would trouble the Senate but with this single remark.

Mr. WEBSTER said he would submit to the gentleman whether it would not be better to postpone the bill until twelve o'clock, as there were several Senators who were not now in their seats.

Mr. HARRISON said he was only desirous to do the duty incumbent on him as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. He was radically against the bill, but he wished that it should be brought before the Senate. He asked whether any bill, originated in the Senate, would be acted on by the House after to-morrow.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. HARRISON observed that he would acquiesce in the postponement, as he wished to amend the bill, by inserting the provisions of another bill to abolish brevet rank.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved to lay the bill on the table; which was agreed to.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

The bill making appropriations for the suppression of the slave trade was taken up, and explained by Messrs. McLANE and KING.

Mr. HAYNE was under the impression that an appropriation had already been made in relation to this object, and that there was still a balance in the Department, of money formerly applied to this purpose. This was the first time a separate bill had been passed for this object; and he wished to know whether this object had not already been provided for?

Mr. KING said, in reply, that this item was not in the appropriation bill, as it had been considered by the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, better to provide for it in a separate bill.

Mr. MACON said it appeared that the committee had reported the bill without having any estimates at all to go upon.

Mr. KING further explained, directing his discourse to Mr. MACON.

Mr. HAYNE still objected to the first section of the bill, which appropriated the sum of $30,000 to suppress slavery. It had been said that this bill was authorized by a general law empowering the Government to apply, from time to time, certain sums for this object; but no estimates had been made, and it certainly was not satisfactory to act on the bill under such circumstances. He did know, for he had looked into the subject, that the sums heretofore appropriated under that general act, had been applied to other objects.

Mr. McLANE made some explanatory remarks.

Mr. CHAMBERS inquired whether the slaves, in relation to whom a bill had been a short time passed, (the case of Mr. Wilde,) were not to be carried out at the charge of this sum, and if the fund required would not thus be enlarged.

Mr. WEBSTER said that there were inquiries on all sides, and it appeared that no one could give information upon the subject under consideration. He therefore moved to lay the bill on the table; which was agreed to.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the bill to enlarge the powers of the corporations of the District of Columbia, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. The amendments reported by the committee being under consideration.

Mr. CHAMBERS explained the object of the bill, which, he observed, had been framed according to the wishes of the people of the District; and, as far as he could judge, there existed no objection to it in any way.

The amendments were then severally agreed to; and the bill was ordered to a third reading, by yeas and nays; and at a later period of the day, this bill was read a third time, and passed.

On the passage of the bill, Mr. MACON asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, when the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silabee, Smith, of Maryland, Thomas, Webster.—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, McLane, Macen, Parris, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury.—17.

OFFICE OF MAJ. GENERAL AND BREVET RANK.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill from the other House, to abolish the office of Major General in the Army of the United States, was taken up.

SENATE.]

Suppression of the Slave Trade.

[MAY 24, 1828.]

Mr. HARRISON offered an amendment, in substance, to abolish brevet rank.

Mr. HARRISON remarked that the amendment was drawn in the same words as the bill for that purpose, which he had a short time since reported to the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was disposed to vote against the amendment under any circumstance. Within three days of the close of the session, it seemed improper to insert new matter in a bill from the House, which they had not time to act upon. He saw no difference between sending a new bill to the House, and sending, as an amendment to a bill, a subject which was entirely new to them. The rule was adopted, that no new bill should be acted upon during this period, to prevent hurried legislation. But this mode would be an evasion of that rule. He was not informed upon the subject, and did not understand it sufficiently to act satisfactorily to himself.

Mr. BARNARD moved that the bill and amendment be postponed until next year. There was not time to act upon them this session; and, although he should have been happy to have an opportunity to explain more fully his views on both of these subjects, rather than trespass upon the time of the Senate at present, he now made this motion. There would be next year sufficient time to act upon them. And, as he believed the abolition of the office of Major General would be destructive of our military system, he hoped the subject would not be hastily acted upon.

After a debate, at considerable length, on the amendment, and the merits of the bill, in which Messrs. HARRISON, WEBSTER, CHANDLER, TYLER, and BARNARD, took part—

Mr. WEBSTER then moved to lay the bill on the table, to put an end to the debate, which he remarked could not at this stage be productive of beneficial results.

After a few remarks from Mr. HARRISON, the question being taken on laying the bill on the table, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. HARRISON then withdrew his motion to amend, which was renewed by Mr. COBB; and the yeas and nays having been ordered on motion of Mr. EATON, the question was decided in the affirmative.

The question then occurred on ordering the bill to a third reading, which was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, McLane, Macon, Noble, Par- ris, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury.—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Bateman, Boulogny, Chase, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston, of Lou. Knight, McKinley, Marks, Ridgely, Robbins, Ittugles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Thomas, Webster.—20.

So the bill was lost.

The bill making an additional compensation to the members of the Legislature of the Territory of Arkansas, was then taken up.

This bill was amended, on motion of Mr. McLANE, by allowing a compensation to the Judges of that Territory for their services as land commissioners.

The bill was opposed by Mr. EATON, and supported by Mr. VAN BUREN; and, on motion of Mr. EATON, the bill was laid on the table; and, having been shortly after taken up, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McLANE said that his attention had been called, this morning, to the fact of a deficiency in the contingent fund of the Senate; and, as it would be impossible to make any farther appropriation at this period, except as an amendment to some bill which had already been acted upon, he would now move to amend this bill by making an additional provision for the contingent fund. He held in his hand the letter of the Secretary, stating that this deficiency occurred on account of the extra amount of printing ordered this year by the Senate. The amendment was then agreed to, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1828.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON the joint resolution from the other House, relative to the printing of the two Houses, was considered.

The object of the resolution was explained by Mr. DICKERSON to be to economise space and expense. As the printing was now executed, a whole page was taken up in the title, and the documents had otherwise much blank space, which it was the object of this resolution to save. The printing of the yeas and nays in small letter, and the arrangement of the documents in consecutive order, would contribute very essentially to this object, etc. By correcting this mode of arrangement, they would be rendered more accessible, besides saving a considerable annual expenditure.

The resolution was then ordered to a third reading.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

The bill for the suppression of the slave trade was again taken up.

Mr. HAYNE remarked, that he had yesterday addressed himself to those gentlemen who had charge of this bill, for information as to the large appropriation in the first section, of 30,000 dollars. That information he had not received, and he now asked it again.

Mr. KING said, that this sum had been fixed upon, after full investigation, by the Committee of Ways and Means, of the other House. On enquiry, he had heard, that the sum was much larger as first proposed; but that the committee had cut it down; and, at its present amount, was not sufficient to send out those slaves already in the country. He trusted that no gentleman would require an exact estimate of the expenses to occur under this appropriation; because it could not be given, as they must depend on unforeseen circumstances. The items could not be anticipated, and the committee took the gross amount, and made the appropriation to cover it. This was the universal practice, and was perfectly proper, as, if the expenditure was over the amount given, the objects could only be executed as far as it went; and if below, it would remain in the Treasury, to be applied on the next year's appropriation. The money could not be applied to other objects; because proper and legitimate purposes would absorb it. If gentlemen disliked the principle on which this provision was made, the repeal of the general law would meet their object. But he thought this bill should not be obstructed. The provision in the second section for the Marshal of Alabama, was founded on a just claim. He had acted under the general law, and he could not obtain expenses which he had incurred under that law, unless by this bill. He hoped that no objection to the general law would stop the progress of this measure.

Mr. CHANDLER asked whether a report had been received of the mode in which the expenditure for this object had formerly been made?

Mr. KING said, in reply, that an account of every item had been rendered. He knew that a certain sum had been applied to the Colonization Society, which was considered an improper appropriation; but that ought not to operate on the passage of this bill.

Mr. HAYNE said, he did not rise to oppose the passage of this bill, but to protest against the manner in which it had been brought before the Senate. It had been presented here with no paper, with no document, with no estimate. They had no evidence to go upon. This was what he objected to. He knew that the gentleman from Alabama was not a member of the committee to which it was referrible; but he had endeavored, without much success, to obtain information. Mr. H. had no doubt that the claim of the Marshal of Alabama was a just one; but he objected altogether to the method of introducing the payment of an individual claim into a bill nominally to suppress the slave trade. This amalgamation of objects embarrassed him extremely. He must vote for the bill, or he should aid to deprive the Marshal of Alabama of a compensation to which he was justly entitled. He repeated his objection to this mode of legislation, and said he should vote for this bill; but, said he, if I live to come back to the Senate next year, I pledge myself to take measures to obtain a most rigid examination of the manner in which the expenditure has been made.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out the first section, providing $30,000 to restore negroes to the coast of Africa.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that the appropriation was absolutely necessary to carry into effect the object of the law. The gentleman from Alabama had stated correctly the difficulty in making out the estimates for purposes which must be contingent, from their very nature. It was not a case where cost and charges could be computed at the outset. The sum pointed out by reasonable probability, had been fixed upon, and that had been cut down in the other House. As to the claims of the Marshal of Alabama, the pledge of the Government had been contracted to pay the expenses which he had incurred. He hoped the bill would pass.

The question being then put on the motion of Mr. MACON, it was rejected, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

MIAMI CANAL.

Mr. RUGGLES moved that the Senate take up the bill to aid the State of Ohio to make the Miami Canal from Dayton to Lake Erie.

Mr. COBB opposed it, on the ground that there was not time for discussion upon a subject so important. Congress had already given 175,000 dollars this year for roads in Ohio.

Mr. RUGGLES said, that the objection did not come with a good grace, from the gentleman from Georgia, who had consumed much time during the last week. He did not wish to prolong debate, and was willing to take the vote at once upon the bill.

Mr. COBB said, that the gentleman from Ohio had found out that he [Mr. C.] had occupied much time during the week, and he deserved a leather medal for the discovery. In the discussion of the canal bills he occupied no more time than his duty made incumbent upon him. If the gentleman alluded to the Executive business of the week, he [Mr. C.] had certainly not consumed much time in debate in secret session. He repeated his objections to taking up the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER said, it was too late to take up a bill of so much importance, and which contemplated a large gift of land to the State of Ohio.

Mr. HARRISON said, that, if the gentleman would take the trouble to examine the bill, he would find that the gift of land was to the United States, and would make their lands in the State of Ohio much more valuable. He asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the question being then taken, the bill was ordered to a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston, of Louisiana, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Thomas, Willey, Williams.—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Hayne, Knight, McLane, Macon, Sanford, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, Woodbury.—14.

MONDAY, MAY 26, 1828.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

Mr. WOODBURY moved that a message be sent to the President of the United States, to inform him that the Senate had concluded its business, and to ascertain whether he had any further communication to make; which was agreed to.

Mr. MACON moved that a message be sent to the H. of Representatives, to convey the same information; which was agreed to.

Messrs. MACON and WOODBURY were then appointed a Committee to wait upon the President.

OUTRAGES IN THE CAPITOL.

Mr. FOOT said that he rose to submit two resolutions, with which he would not now trouble the Senate, but that he considered it his duty to himself, to the Senate, and to the parties concerned. It would be recollected that he had, at a former period, offered a resolution, relating to the same subject, which had been laid on the table, on his motion in consequence of a message from the President having been brought under the consideration of the Senate. He did not ask the present consideration of these resolutions, as he was sensible there was not time to act upon them; but feeling it his duty to present them, he would now move that they be laid on the table:

Resolved, That the assault made by Russel Jarvis, within the walls of the capitol, upon the private Secretary of the President, charged with the delivery of an Executive message to the Senate, when in Session, is a contempt of the sovereign power of the Nation, and a breach of privilege of the Senate.

Resolved, That the assault made by Duff Green, Printer for the Senate, in one of the Committee rooms, on the person of E. V. Sparhawk, one of the Reporters, is a contempt, and breach of privilege.

Mr. FOOT said, the session was too thin to allow their being effectually considered, and he wished them to remain until the next session.

Mr. CHANDLER wished that the subject might be now considered and disposed of.

Mr. BRANCH said, if the gentleman from Connecticut was desirous that it should now be acted on, he, for one, was prepared to do so promptly.

Mr. FOOT repeated his objections to considering the resolutions at present.

Mr. CHANDLER moved that the resolutions be taken up, (which could only be done with the unanimous consent of the Senate.)

Mr. TAZEVELL objected; and the motion, consequently, failed.

ADJOURNMENT.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing that they had appointed Messrs WARREN, of Ohio, and DICKERSON, of New York, as a Joint Committee, on the part of the House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress was now ready to adjourn.

The Committee on the part of the Senate then joined that from the House, and waited on the President, and, shortly after, Mr. MACON, from the Joint Committee, reported that the President had instructed them to inform the Senate, that he had no further communications to make to Congress.

The Senate adjourned, sine die.

DEBATES, &amp;c. IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1827.

The House was called to order by MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, Clerk of the House, precisely at twelve o'clock, and the Roll of the House being called over by States, it appeared that there were present two hundred and seven Members, out of two hundred and thirteen, and two Delegates from Territories: Whereupon, the House proceeded to ballot for a SPEAKER.

Mr. SPRAGUE and Mr. HAYNES being named Tellers, reported the following as the result of the balloting:

For ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia, 104

For JOHN W. TAYLOR, of New York, 94

For P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, 4

Scattering votes, 3

ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia, having received a majority of the whole number of votes, was declared to be duly elected.

On being conducted to the Chair, the SPEAKER addressed the House in the following terms:

"GENTLEMEN: In accepting the distinguished honor which you have been pleased to confer upon me, I am penetrated with feelings of profound respect, and the deepest gratitude, and I receive it as the most flattering testimony of your confidence and favor. The office of Speaker of this House has been justly considered one of high and exalted character—arduous, in relation to the abilities necessary to its execution, and severely responsible and laborious. Its honor is to be measured by no ordinary standard of value. The individual, therefore, who shall fill this chair to his own reputation, and the advantage of the House, must be distinguished alike by knowledge, integrity, and diligence; he should possess an impartiality, which secures confidence; a dignity that commands respect; and a temper and affability that disarm contention. From his general character and personal qualities, he must derive a power that will give force to his interpositions, and procure respect for his decisions. He must conciliate the esteem of the enlightened body over whom he presides.

"These, gentlemen, are some of the leading qualifications necessary for this arduous station. I certainly do not possess them. I know my own inability too well to believe that I shall be enabled to meet the expectations of my friends, or discharge the high trust reposed in me, in a manner suitable to its dignity and importance. Bringing with me but little knowledge or experience, I shall, no doubt, often err, and stand in need of your utmost forbearance. Let me hope, on such occasions, you will scan my conduct with candor and liberality, and extend towards me the same kind indulgence which has heretofore characterized your conduct to the Chair. All that I can promise, will be a devotion of my time to your service, and an independent discharge of my duties in a plain and manly way. My gratitude for a distinction so little merited, shall stimulate me to supply, by diligence and application, what I want in knowledge and ability; and, however I may fail in other respects, I shall endeavor, at least, to entitle myself to the suffrages of zeal and impartiality.

"I need not admonish you, gentlemen, of the magnitude of your trust, nor say any thing as to the manner in which it ought to be discharged. We must all be sensible, that, in the deliberations and proceedings of this House, the character and permanent interests of our common country are deeply involved. It was in the organization and purity of this branch of the National Government, (endeared to their warmest affections,) that our fathers believed they had provided the best security for the principles of free Government, and the liberty and happiness of the People. Virtuous, enlightened, and patriotic, this House may justly be regarded as the citadel of American Liberty.

"Animated, then, by a virtuous and enlightened zeal, let us endeavor to realize the just expectations of our constituents; and let our proceedings be characterized by a cool and deliberate exertion of the talents, fortitude, and patriotism, of the House, as the surest and best means of sustaining the honor, and promoting the welfare and happiness of our beloved country."

The oath to support the Constitution of the United States was then administered by Mr. NEWTON, (the father of the House,) to the SPEAKER, and then by the SPEAKER, successively to all the Members from the several States.

On motion, it was

Resolved, unanimously, That MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, Clerk to the late House of Representatives, be appointed Clerk to this House; and that JOHN OSWALD DOWN be appointed Sergeant-at-Arms to this House; that BENJAMIN BURCH be appointed principal Doorkeeper, and OVERTON CARR, Assistant Doorkeeper to the same.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. LOWRIE, their Secretary, acquainting the House that a quorum had been formed, and that the Senate was ready to proceed to business.

The Rules and Orders established by the late House of Representatives, were ordered to be observed in this House, until a revision or alteration shall have taken place: and that the Clerk be instructed to cause the Members thereof to be furnished with such newspapers as they might respectively direct.

A committee was then appointed, consisting of Messrs. VAN RENSSELAER and EVERETT, to join the committee which had been appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that quorums of the two Houses have assembled, and that Congress are ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make.

The daily hour to which the House shall stand adjourned, was fixed at twelve o'clock, M.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1827.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that they had performed that duty, and had received for answer that the President would make a communication to them, in writing, at twelve o'clock this day.

Mr. JOHN ADAMS, the Private Secretary of the President of the United States, soon after came in with the message, [which will be found in the Appendix:] and the message was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. 6,000 extra copies thereof were ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1827.

THE LATE MR. YOUNG.

Mr. WICKLIFFE rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have risen to propose the resolution which I hold in my hand, as a testimony of respect due to my deceased friend and colleague. It may be expected of me that I should say something in reference to the character of the man for whose memory I ask of this House an expression of their respect. To those with whom he was associated for the last two years, as a member of Congress, no commendation from me can be necessary. It was in the walks of private life I have known him longest and best, and it was there his virtues and usefulness were most conspicuous. I move you that the House come to the following resolution.

Mr. W. then presented a resolution for wearing the mourning usual on such occasions, in testimony of respect for the memory of the late WILLIAM S. YOUNG; which was unanimously agreed to.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1827.

The House proceeded to consider a motion of Mr. LITTLE, made on the 4th instant, for the appointment of the Standing Committees; when the motion was agreed to; and the appointment of the committees was ordered accordingly.

The House then adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1827.

Standing Committees of the House, appointed by the SPEAKER, pursuant to the order of Thursday last, were announced.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, rose, and said, that, while he was fully sensible of the kindness of the Chair, in assigning to him a distinguished station, for which his own merits furnished him with no claim, nevertheless, from some particular circumstances, with which it was unnecessary he should trouble the House, his serving on the Committee on Military Affairs would be peculiarly unsatisfactory. He would, therefore, earnestly ask the permission of the House to be excused from such service.

And the question being put upon excusing Mr. HAMILTON from serving on the Military Committee, it was decided in the negative.

ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CORBIE in the Chair, on the President's Message; and a partition of the different branches thereof was made amongst the Standing and Select Committees.

Mr. SPRAGUE offered the following resolution for adoption:

Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the boundary line of the United States, and to the outrages alleged to have been committed on the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain, be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, he was reluctant to interfere with the course proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. WRIGHT) for the reference of the Message, but was constrained to offer this resolution, by the great importance of the subject to the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent. He was extremely gratified to find that this subject had received the constant and watchful attention of the Executive of the United States; and that the Government had zealously and assiduously labored to preserve our rights and effect a peaceable adjustment of the controversy, and had also taken the most prompt and effective measures to ascertain the character of the recent transactions upon our Northeastern frontier. He hoped that the House, so far as appertained to them, would manifest a readiness to second and sustain the efforts of the President. The question respecting our Northeastern boundary was one of no ordinary moment. The great extent of the Territory in dispute, the fertility of its soil, the quantity and value of its timber, its position, with reference to the St. John's river, and in a military point of view, all concurred to make it a matter of much interest to the nation at large, and of peculiar and increasing solicitude to the State of Maine; while the recent alleged outrage by the British Authorities, in arresting, upon this Territory, one who himself claimed to be, and whom we claimed as an American citizen, upon American soil, and transporting him to a foreign gaol, was calculated to excite the liveliest sensibilities of the people. Mr. S. said, the subject involved the integrity of our soil, and the inviolability of the persons of our citizens. The attention of Congress had been particularly called to it by the Message of the President, and he trusted that the House would be willing to make it a matter of distinct reference to a committee, and to give it all that consideration which its magnitude deserved.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, inquired of the gentleman from Maine, whether it was the purpose of his resolution to include the Northern boundary line of the United States from sea to sea?

Mr. SPRAGUE replied that his resolution was directed only to the reference of so much of the President's Message as referred to the subject of boundary; and the Message only spoke of the Eastern portion of the line. But it was not his intention to restrict the attention of the Committee to one part of the country in preference to another. They might extend their report to the whole of our Northern line, if they should think it necessary; but what he more particularly desired to have them report upon, was the present state of affairs in respect to the Eastern portion of it.

Mr. FLOYD said, that, if his resolution applied only to that part of our boundary, he would recommend to the gentleman from Maine so to amend it as to embrace the entire line, as well that on the West of the Rocky Mountains, as the residue. He thought that the state of things, in relation to this part of our Territory, seriously demanded the attention of Congress. The English had lately increased their force in that country; and he understood that, within that Territory, a great amount of furs had been collected within the past year by the N. W. Company. Mr. F. observed, that, from the tenor of the message, he perceived that the provisions of the treaty of Ghent on this subject were intended to be continued for an indefinite time; but he felt assured that the interest and tranquility of the Western States loudly demanded some other arrangement. Unless the English were expelled from their position on this part of our Territory, no man could answer what blood might flow.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he thought the rule to be a sound one, which had been established by the practice of this House, when a motion is made to refer a subject to a Select Committee, and there is a standing Committee of the House to which the subject appropriately belonged, that the reference of it should in preference be made to that committee. There was, he said, a peculiar fairness in the reference of the particular subject of this resolution to the Committee of Foreign Relations. Exceptions to the rule of reference of subjects of Standing Committees, arose from particular circumstances, such as the too great pressure of business on any particular committee, &c. Now, Mr. H. said, it must be within the knowledge of any gentleman, who had served but a single session in Congress, that, however delicate or honorable were the duties devolved on the Committee of Foreign Relations, they were not so onerous as to make it necessary to divide them with other committees; and, as this subject was one of great delicacy, and which might involve essential interests of the country, he thought it peculiarly proper that it should go to the General Committee on the subject of our Foreign Relations. Mr. H. adverted also to the objection to raising Select Committees on particular objects, as they were likely to be influenced in their decision by considerations of a local nature, or arising from the excitement of the moment amongst those particularly interested. Upon the whole, therefore, he was induced to propose the reference of this subject to the Committee on Foreign Relations, instead of a Select Committee.

H. OF R.]

Bank of the United States.

[Dec. 11, 12, 13, 1827.]

Mr. SPRAGUE said, in reply, that he had no particular preference for a Select Committee; he should be content with the reference of the subject to any committee of the House; and he willingly modified his resolution, so as to meet the views of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said, that, unless the gentleman desired a Select Committee, (which point he had now waived) he could not perceive the necessity of any distinct reference of this subject, as it was virtually included under the resolution for referring so much of the message as related to our Foreign Relations to the appropriate Committee.

Mr. SPRAGUE did not think that the general resolution, to which the gentleman referred, would cover this subject. The particular point which he wished to submit to a committee of the House, was the outrage committed on an American citizen peaceably residing within the limits of the United States.

The resolution, as modified by the mover, was then adopted.

The House, in obedience to an order adopted on Thursday last, proceeded to ballot for a CHAPLAIN to Congress, for the present session, on their part, and the Rev. REUBEN POST was chosen.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1827.

Sundry resolutions for enquiry were offered and agreed to this day, accompanied in some instances by remarks from their respective movers.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1827.

Mr. LITTLE asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill fixing the ratio of representation after the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1827.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to enquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of that portion of the stock of the Bank of the United States which is held by the Government of the United States, and the applications of the proceeds thereof to the payment of the public debt.

In offering this resolution, Mr. B. said, he wished to accompany it with a few remarks, not with any intention of now discussing the merits of the measure it proposed, but chiefly with the view of drawing to it the attention of the House, and especially of the Committee of Ways and Means, to which the resolution must be referred. The House were aware that the Government holds at this time stock of the Bank of the United States, to the amount of seven millions of dollars, which stock was at present worth in market about 23½ per cent. advance above its par value. If the whole of this stock should now be sold by the Government, it would nett a profit of one million and six hundred thousand dollars above the nominal amount of the stock. Such being the case, he thought it deserved the serious consideration of the House, whether it would not be a prudent and proper measure now to sell out that stock. It had been said, Mr. B. observed, by one of the best writers on political economy with whom he was acquainted, that the pecuniary affairs of nations bore a close analogy to those of private households—in both, their prosperity mainly depended on a vigilant and effective management of their resources. There is, said Mr. B. an amount of between seventeen and eighteen millions of the stock of the United States now redeemable, and an amount of nine millions more, which will be redeemable next year. If the interest paid by the United States on this debt is compared with the dividend it receives on its stock in the Bank of the United States, it will be found that a small advantage would be gained by the sale of the latter in this respect; since the dividends on bank stock are received semi-annually, while the interest on United States' securities is paid quarterly: this, however, he waived as a matter of comparatively small moment. It must be obvious, he said, that the addition of one million six hundred thousand dollars to the available funds of the United States will produce the extinguishment of an equivalent amount of the public debt, and consequently relieve the interest payable thereon, by which a saving would accrue of about one hundred thousand dollars per annum.

Thus, a merely pecuniary view of the measure he proposed in his resolution would show that its adoption would be good policy. But he would further observe, that, if the future profits of the Bank of the United States might be conjectured from its past experience, it was by no means to be calculated that our stock will continue to nett to us as much as six per cent. It would be recollected by all that that institution had its periods of difficulty and depression. At one time, it paid no dividends at all. Some time after, it paid four, four-and-a-half, and, at length, five per cent. And it was only recently that the rate of dividend had reached its present amount. It was certainly very improbable that the Government will ever get a larger dividend than at present; whereas it was possible, if not extremely probable, that the amount in future years may be much less. It was well known that the amount of the Bank's discounts depended on many and various circumstances, especially on the condition of our foreign commerce, and our consequent relations to other nations, whether as debtors or creditors. When the balance of trade was in favor of the United States, the Bank was liberal in its discounting; but, when that balance preponderated in an opposite direction, the Bank immediately curtailed its discounts, actuated by that prudence which taught banking institutions to guard against the effect of a sudden run upon their funds.

In addition to the depression of profits resulting from cases of this description, there was also to be taken into view that which was produced by bad debts, on which subject it could not be forgotten that the Bank had received an early and severe monitory lesson. But allowing, for argument sake, that the dividends for the Bank were to continue at six per cent. it was manifest that, by selling out its shares, the Government would clear the whole amount of the advance which the stock now bears in the market; whereas, by refusing to sell it, it was equally plain that this possible profit would certainly be lost.

But he had another reason, and one which he conceived to have a very serious bearing, why the measure he proposed should be adopted. He was one who held the opinion that the Government of the country ought not to be continued as a stockholder in any joint stock company like a bank. The incorporation of a bank was an exercise of high political power, and so long as the Government continued to have a pecuniary interest in such an institution, it could not but feel all those considerations which address themselves to that interest. Now, in nine years hence, the Bank of the United States will be presenting to Congress its petition for a renewal of its charter: and he did not think that the Government to whom such a petition was presented, ought, while listening to and deliberating upon it, be placed under the unavoidable bias arising from the Government itself being a joint stockholder with those who were petitioning.

Bank of the United States.

[H. of R.]

Mr. B. farther observed, that he did not see, from the proposed sale of stock, any difficulty likely to result to the management of the Bank, and the Government's share in its control. The present act of incorporation gives to the Government three different securities for the good management of its concerns. The first is a power of supervision: the next security is one of prevention: and the third is remedial. For supervision, the President of the United States has the power, with the consent of the Senate, to appoint a certain portion of the directors of the Bank. By way of the prevention of evil, a detailed statement is from time to time to be rendered, of the entire state of the affairs of the bank; and, as a remedial security, a Committee of Congress has the power at any time to examine into its transactions, and if it has violated the conditions of its charter, to order a scire facias, and revoke the charter. The withdrawal of the pecuniary interest of the Government in the stock of the Bank, ought not to affect, in any manner, the supervisory power of Government over the Bank and its concerns. This power ought to be the only connexion of the Government with it.

Mr. B. concluded by recapitulating the points he had advanced, and again pressing the enquiry, whether it was meet and becoming that Government, when asked to grant a charter for a corporate body, should, at that very time, hold a large pecuniary interest in that corporation? Objections, he was aware, might possibly be urged to the plan he suggested, but these would receive, he knew, when presented to the House, all that consideration to which they were entitled, and the question be decided on with due deliberation.

A second reading of the resolution was called for, and it was again read; when

Mr. BARBOUR again rose to add a suggestion which he had omitted when last up; which was, that, from information, it appeared probable to him that there would at this time be a great facility in effecting the proposed sale through the means of the United States' stock which was to be redeemed, (though he did not profess to be intimately acquainted with the state of matters on change) it was very probable that many of the holders of the public stock would take that of the Bank in exchange, at the advanced price.

Mr. McDUFFIE (a member of the Committee of Ways and Means) said, that he did not rise at this time with a view to oppose the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia. That resolution, he was aware, proposed only an enquiry. But the gentleman could not but be conscious, that the mere discussion of such a proposition in this House, had, of itself, a tendency injuriously to disturb the pecuniary relations of the United States with its creditors and with the Bank. But he rose principally for the purpose of declaring, at this time, that he differed, almost entirely, from most of the views which the gentleman had taken of the financial interests involved in the proposition; though it was possible he might not differ from him so widely as to their result. He would now advert to but one or two facts. As to the profit to accrue to the United States from the proposed sale, the gentleman must certainly, from his experience in the fiscal concerns of the country, be aware, that if the Government shall suddenly bring into the money market an amount of seven millions of United States' Bank Stock, instead of selling at 125 per cent. it would not produce 105 per cent. The effect of such an influx of stock could not but be very great. As long as there is a National Bank, an institution which has necessarily so important an effect on the currency of the Nation, the Government ought certainly to possess a control over it; but there was nothing which would render that control efficient, but its holding a large amount of the stock of the Bank. He made these remarks not in anticipation of the argument on the resolution, but mainly to the end that the country might know that the views which the honorable gentleman had expressed were not acquiesced in as the views of this House, on that important subject.

Mr. GORHAM deprecated the going abroad of an impression that the Government of the United States doubted the policy of its continuing to hold stock in the National Bank. The very notion that the Government was disposed to part with its portion of that stock, and to throw seven millions of it into market, would be a virtual proclamation to all the world, that it was not their interest to buy into the Bank. The very moment the Government shall attempt such a sale, the greater part, if not the whole of the present advance in the price of that stock will be at an end. Some gentlemen recollect the history of the sale of the Government's stock in the old bank. When that took place, there was a universal belief that the charter of the bank would be renewed, or rather extended, and that the same proprietors would have the privilege of subscribing into the new bank—but that expectation was sadly disappointed; the bank was suffered to expire, and four or five years to elapse before the charter of the present bank was granted. The sale of the stock was recommended, indeed, by the Secretary of the Treasury—but it was bought and sold under the confident belief that the charter would be continued, and the old stockholders have a privilege of buying into the new bank. The principal holders then, as now, resided in Europe—they all had this expectation, and were all deceived. And, at this day, it is idle to talk of disposing, in this country, of seven millions of the United States' Bank Stock. We must rely on capitalists abroad. Those men have, at present, full confidence in the permanence of both our moneyed and political institutions: but could they suppose that you were about to desert this bank as you deserted the Stockholders in the former one, great, indeed, would be the effect upon the price of the stock. When the present bank was incorporated, there was a general understanding that the Government were to be permanent stockholders in it—no man felt a doubt on the subject. Should it happen otherwise, the consequence in the stock market would be serious indeed. Why should the Government renounce its interest in the bank? They have great advantage from retaining it. They have a strong hold upon that institution—they appoint five of its Directors. But who ever doubted that such a privilege was consented to on the very ground that they were also to hold a large amount of its stock? This is, in fact, the only true ground of their control over it—for it would strike the mind of the American People most unfavorably, to see Government assuming such a power over what, if the gentleman's proposition were to succeed, would be mere private property. Mr. G. concluded with moving that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. BARBOUR expressed his cheerful assent, not being disposed to press such a matter hastily, and
The resolution was laid on the table accordingly.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1827.

The Speaker presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the City of Philadelphia, setting forth that at a General Election in October, 1826, in the State of Pennsylvania, for members of Congress, upon counting the votes "in the regular Congressional ballot boxes," there was found to be an equal number of votes for John Sergeant and Henry Horn, upon which it was declared that no choice had been made: that in counting the votes contained in the "Coroners and other boxes, there was found a number of votes in favor of Henry Horn, over and above those given for John Sergeant." Under these circumstances, the memorialists submit to the consideration of the House "the propriety of instituting an investigation into the premises, and of deciding the important question, whether by design, accident, or neglect, of the Inspectors or Judges of an Election, in misplacing, or suffering the votes of an elector to be misplaced, they may disfranchise the elector, pervert the intent and meaning of the constitution and laws of our country, and render nugatory the inestimable right of election." The memorialists "submit the opinion that no subsequent election can in any manner affect the important principle involved in the first."

This memorial was referred to the committee of Elections.

The Speaker communicated to the House the following letter.

DECEMBER 12, 1827.

SIR: I have received from the Clerk an order of the House requiring me to serve on the Committee of Ways and Means.

From some acquaintance with the duties of that Committee, acquired during six years' experience in the Chair, I am thoroughly persuaded of my inability to discharge them (in my present very feeble state of health) with any degree of satisfaction to myself, or advantage to the public. I therefore respectfully pray to be excused from serving.

I am, with high respect, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN RANDOLPH, of Roanoke.

To ANDREW STEVENSON, Esq.

Speaker of the House of Reps. of the U. States.

The letter being read, the question was put, "Will the House excuse Mr. RANDOLPH from serving on the Committee of Ways and Means?"

And decided in the affirmative.

Mr. McDUFFIE then moved that a member be appointed of the committee, so that the same be complete; which was agreed to.

Adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, DEC. 17, 1827.

The whole of this day was taken up in the presentation of petitions, and resolutions of inquiry, and in referring them to Committees.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE IN FLORIDA.

Mr. STRONG, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred a memorial of citizens of St. Augustine, reported a bill to secure to certain inhabitants in the Territory of Florida, the right of voting at elections, and to alter the time of holding the sessions of the Legislative Council of Florida.

Mr. STRONG expressed a wish that the House would consent that this bill should be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and accompanied this request by a few remarks explanatory of the nature and object of the bill; which was a copy of one reported by the same committee at the last session, but lost in the Senate, for want of time to consider it. It had two objects only: one was to allow certain persons, who had been residents of Florida at the time of the cession of that Territory by Spain to the United States, to vote at the elections, of which privilege they had been deprived by an act of the Legislative Council of the Territory, which the council had thought themselves authorized and competent to pass. The committee deemed this class of inhabitants to be as much entitled to the elective franchise, as others who exercised that privilege, and he doubted not that the House would agree with the Committee in opinion. The other object of the bill was to change the time of the meeting of the council, from October to December. He knew of no objections to the bill, and presumed none existed.

The bill was thereupon ordered to its third reading tomorrow, without being committed.

Mr. BARTLETT submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing to be paid to the Commissioners of the Navy Hospitals, such sum as may be due to the Navy Hospital Fund, from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT accompanied the resolution with some explanatory statements—from which it appeared, that, in the year 1798, a fund for the erection of Marine Hospitals was raised by means of a deduction from the pay of the officers and men of the Naval service. In succeeding years a similar arrangement took place again—and the sums thus raised had been paid into the Treasury, where they remained until 1811, when the Secretaries of the Navy, of War, and of the Treasury, were created a Board of Commissioners for the Navy Hospital Fund, and made a report to Congress on that subject. From a recent report of the Board, it appears that a balance of two hundred and sixty-two thousand dollars is still due from the Treasury to this fund. Congress were called upon, at the last session, to avail themselves of this balance for the objects intended, but nothing had been done. In the mean while, various works had been projected and commenced, and were now in a state which required the application of a further sum for their completion. The resolution was thereupon adopted.

The House proceeded to consider the following resolution moved yesterday by Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency and practicability of establishing some mode by which all the Indians East of the Mississippi River may be immediately and gradually removed beyond or West of said River, and a sufficiency of land attached to each tribe, and secured to such tribe or tribes, with the sovereignty or right of soil; in the same manner, and to the same extent, that the right of domain is secured to the respective States of the Union; and there to establish a Territorial Government over them, of the same kind, and regulated by the same rules, that the Territories of the United States are now governed; and that, if the said Committee cannot devise any plan that shall be just and magnanimous, on the part of the United States, to attain that end, that they shall then inquire into the right and expediency of extending the laws and municipal regulations of the United States, and, also, of the several States wherein said Indians reside, over them."

At the request of Mr. FORT, a resolution offered a few days ago by Mr. LUMKIN, on the the same subject, was read: Whereupon,

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, observed, that it had not been his intention to trouble the House with a single remark in support of the resolution he had had the honor to offer, nor should he now trouble them long. The resolution of the member from Georgia, although on the same general subject with his own, did not embrace more than a single one of the many and important points embraced in the latter, and which he had been desirous for years to bring forward, and have presented to the attention of this House. He could not but consider many of these propositions of great intrinsic importance. When that People, whose Representatives now held seats within this Hall, first came over the waters of the Atlantic, those to whom this resolution refers, were the original inhabitants and lords of the soil. By the gradual encroachments of the white settlers, they had been driven back from the coast, until their territory had been almost brought to a state of nothingness. It was, indeed, true, that some among them were possessed of great wealth; but the rest, who formed the great body of their tribes, were in the most wretched, abject, and destructive condition in which poor wretches could possibly be. In the year 1808, Mr. Jefferson, whose guardian care over every class of our population was equalled only by the expansion of his philosophic mind, was the first to turn his attention to the condition of these unhappy People. He revolved their state in his capacious understanding, and the philanthropic result was an attempt to provide every practicable relief for their wretched circumstances. He caused them to be furnished with agricultural implements, and with the various races of domestic animals; he enabled them, also, to avail themselves of the spindle and the loom, by which their women might be clothed, and their comforts greatly increased. By these measures of that great and benevolent man, many of the savage barriers which withheld them from the blessings of civilization were removed, and their condition was greatly ameliorated. But, though much had been done, their situation still required that more should yet be done. Every successive Administration had done something to aid the benevolent design. But still, the mass of these unfortunate people had groaned under the most despotic of all Governments, and the bondage of their savage rulers still continued to hold them in an iron grasp. Their situation called for our sympathy, not for a vindictive spirit which sought their destruction. For himself (Mr. M. said) his object by this resolution was not to remove them to the wilds, and there send them back to their hunting state; but to place them in a condition where they might gradually participate in the benefits of civilization. Their land, said Mr. M. I covet not; we have had enough of it; but the possession of their lands, should they continue to hold them, will prove an injury to themselves, as well as to those in their vicinity. As they are now situated, their condition resembles that of a person taking a slow poison, which must, ere long, destroy him. He trusted they would not be destroyed. He knew that their preservation, their civilization, and the general amelioration of their state, was the ardent desire of the humane throughout the Union. In their present situation, they were unprepared to receive the blessings of social order; and if you drive them, said Mr. M. into the wilderness, without any protecting and preserving arm extended over them, will it not be like leading these unhappy beings into one spot and there destroying them?

I repeat that the object of my resolution is not lucre; it is the good of the Indians, and not their lands that I seek. They never can be free, intelligent, and independent, while their present cruel masters lord it over them. Which of you would be willing, calmly to stand by while some miserable man was taking poison, and not snatch the fatal cup from his lips? Who among us would see the self murderer with the knife ready in his hand, and just about to plunge it in his own breast, and not snatch the deadly weapon from his grasp? I am sure there is none. And shall we not act with the same caution toward these children of the forest that we would with the miserable suicide? Is it our duty to consult their will in such a matter? What can be the result of consulting the ignorant, but ignorance in their determination? These poor beings are incapable of understanding their own true interest, or choosing what will be most for their benefit. Let us act for them—let us promote their union in a place where they will be protected from intruders, and enjoy the benefit of some system of Government. The roaming man of the forest will never be truly free till he has learned to submit himself to proper legal restraints—he must do what our fathers did—he must give up a portion of his savage liberty to secure that part of it which will best promote his happiness. Of what nature the government shall be under which these People are to be placed, I am far from attempting to dictate. That will be for the mature consideration of the Committee to whom my resolution may be referred, and for the solemn decision of this House. What I want is to remove them at once from the avaricious gripe of those who can never be satisfied with seizing upon their hunting grounds and half cultivated fields—I wish to have the soil of their new abode secured to them as firmly as that of any of the States is confirmed to their white possessors: so that the idea of holding councils, as they are called, for the purpose of cheating them out of their lands, may no more be heard to disgrace these Halls—I say disgrace them: for surely it is disgrace to the Government and to the Nation, to treat these people as if they were independent nations, while they live among us in the powerless and miserable condition in which they are now found. But give them a region of their own—give them a suitable Government—and soon they will begin to feel the benign influence of law—soon they will be prepared to become an integral part of the American People. Till you secure them a firm possession of the soil, it is in vain that you endeavor to improve their state—so long as the whites may claim and take from them the possession of their soil, they never can become effectually and permanently civilized. It is the right of soil which will attach them to their improvements—will attach them to their Government, and will soften gradually and refine their whole condition. But then they must be furnished with a system of education—not a mere elementary plan of giving them the A, B, C, but Universities and Colleges, where they may advance themselves in science. They must have manufacturing establishments, for the cultivation and exercise of their native ingenuity: in a word, whatever their gradual improvement may require. It is by adopting a plan like this, and by that alone, that you will get clear of those difficulties which Georgia, which Alabama, which Mississippi, which Missouri, which North Carolina, and many other States, have in turn had to encounter. Let us extend to them the hand of mercy, and not use the powerful arm of Government merely to put them out of our way, and there let them perish. Mr. M. concluded with expressing his trust that the humanity of the House would forbid their rejecting a resolution such as that he had the honor now to lay before them. As to the resolution of his friend from Georgia, that gentleman had consulted with him, and was not opposed to the resolution, now offered. The gentleman's resolution, as far as it went, was unexceptionable, but it stopped short of his motive in offering it.

Mr. LUMPKIN observed, that the gentleman from Tennessee had misunderstood him, if he supposed that the resolution he had offered stopped short of his motive. This was not the fact. It embraced all he had intended now to propose; but the resolution of the gentleman went much farther—the chief difference between them lying in this, that, while he (Mr. L.) had gone a certain length which he deemed expedient on this very important and interesting subject, the gentleman from Tennessee had prepared a plan which seemed to him to reach half a century ahead. He did not, however, object to it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON observed, that, as it was merely a resolution of inquiry, it did not commit the House, and he hoped it would be adopted. He thought the considerations involved by it were such as must weigh heavily on the mind of every gentleman in that House. When they took into view the anomalous condition of these decaying tribes, and the very imperfect rights which they enjoyed while placed under what was called the protecting arm of the Government, he was persuaded gentlemen would agree with him that their condition was one which required to be most carefully looked into, and to be cleared vated by every means which the wisdom of Congress may be able to devise. It called for all the care of the Committee, and all that discussion in the House which their report might be expected to call forth. On such a subject, every resolution that suggested any new idea toward the amelioration and relief of those unfortunate people, in religion, in politics, or in any feature of their social existence, ought, certainly, to be regarded with favor. The resolution of the gentleman from Georgia embraced the subject in its general aspect—but that now offered by the gentleman from Tennessee was more particular and definite, and directed the attention of the Committee to distinct objects, and those of the highest importance. He hoped it would be adopted.

The question was then taken, and the resolution of Mr. MITCHELL was adopted.

The House adjourned.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

The following resolution, moved yesterday by Mr. BARTLETT, came up for consideration:

“Strike out the following rule:

‘Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave, or by an order of the House, on the report of a committee; and, in either case, a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day’s notice at least shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill, and every such motion may be committed.’

“And substitute the following:

‘No bill shall be introduced except upon the report of a committee.’”

The resolution having been read—

Mr. BASSETT made some observations in opposition to its adoption, and on the general inexpediency of changing Rules of Order, which have been long tried, and found effectual for their object, for new ones of an equivocal utility.

Mr. BARTLETT spoke in reply, disclaiming any particular anxiety for the adoption of the rule he had introduced, having been led to propose it mainly from observing the inconvenience which had recently been experienced from the operation of that now in existence. It had received very different constructions; and, if it was intended to be so understood as to admit the introduction of bills into the House, which had been submitted to no committee of the House, he was certainly of opinion it ought immediately to be repealed. If it was to be interpreted the other way, then, it would be equivalent to the new rule, and the only difference would be that the latter expressed in simple and direct language, what was now expressed in obscure and dubious terms.

Mr. BASSETT now delivered his views more at length, and insisted on the practical inconvenience which would result from the adoption of the new rule; circumstances might easily occur in which there would be a great expediency in having a bill introduced without any delay: if this rule were adopted, the committees must have leave to sit during the sittings of the House, which might often be very inconvenient; and yet, if this leave were refused, much delay must be sustained. If the rule were permitted to stand in its present form, the mover and second of the motion for leave to introduce a bill, would be practically considered as a committee to introduce it: and though the rule requires a day’s previous notice of such motion for leave, yet, when there was need of expedition, this part of the rule might be dispensed with for the occasion. He could see no obscurity in the language of the rule, and hoped it would not be exchanged for one which was against all Parliamentary usage.

Mr. S. WOOD, of New York, thought, that, though the existing rule was not absolutely obscure, yet it was, in its operation, certainly deceptive. For he believed that no new member would know or believe, from its slight perusal, that he might, individually, introduce a bill into the House whenever he could get leave. Yet such was the fact. He contended that a bill thus introduced must, under the present rule, take the course of a bill reported by a committee. This was, indeed, the practice in some of the States; it was so in the State of New York. [Here he stated minutely the practice which obtains in the Legislature of that State.] But if a bill introduced on leave must afterwards go to a committee, and that committee have power to revise, alter, and re-modify it, what advantage did the mover gain by leave to introduce a bill more than a mere resolution? And what practical use was there in the rule? For himself, he was friendly to the new rule, but suggested to the gentleman from New Hampshire, to introduce into it the words “by order of the House,” from the present rule. With this addition the rule would be simple, intelligible, and adapted to the practice of the House.

Mr. STRONG was opposed to abrogating the present rule; the practical advantage of which he contended was this: that it enabled a member to introduce the subject-matter on which he desired the action of the House, not merely in a general form, as was done by a resolution, but in a more particular and detailed form, if he might think that most expedient. But then the practice under the rule ought to be, that, when a bill is introduced by a member on leave, and taken to the Clerk’s table, it ought not there to receive its first and second reading, but to be immediately referred to one of the standing committees of the House, or to a select committee. Thus the whole object of the mover would be attained. He would present the subject to a committee of the House in that particular form which he considered most advantageous. But if an opposite practice should prevail, and a bill introduced by a member on leave, is to be treated as if it had been reported by a committee, this consequence would follow, that speeches would be immediately in order on a subject just presented for the first time to the notice of the House, and premature debate ensue before due opportunity had been afforded for deliberation. If this latter is actually the true construction of the present rule, he thought it ought to be repealed; if not, it had better stand as it is.

Mr. ARCHER was of opinion that the rule ought not to be altered. The House, as a Parliamentary body, could not, he said, act by any individual member, but must act by a committee, and contended that, under the rule as it at present stood, no bill could be introduced except by a committee. Mr. A. stated the two modes by which a bill could now be brought in, either by leave granted, or by an order of the House. In the former case, the committee had discretionary power over the bill; in the latter, it has none whatever. But if a mere member of the House may, on leave, bring in any bill which suits his particular views, and that bill must of necessity pass immediately to its first and second reading, all sound legislation would be at an end. He thought the amendment of the rule was not only superfluous, but would be positively injurious. It would take away one of the modes at present open for the introduction of bills, and leave but one only. If it was to be adopted, he hoped the mover would adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. S. Wood] with which modification the two modes would still remain as at present.

Mr. BARTLETT said, if he had not before been convinced of the expediency of the alteration, he should now be so; for, of the four gentlemen who had spoken in reference to the present rule, no two agreed in their interpretation of it. Here Mr. B. recapitulated, and compared the views which had been advanced, and insisted on the expediency of the alteration he had proposed.

Amendment to the Rules.

He was entirely opposed to the introduction of bills "by order of the House," and contended that if such mode should ever be necessary, it must be rarely, when the rule might, for the occasion, be suspended. Mr. B. stated his precise object to be, to get rid of all modes of bringing in bills but one only.

Mr. MARVIN, of New York, opposed the adoption of a new rule, but contended that neither of the gentlemen had stated with entire correctness the true construction of the present one. The rule was copied almost verbatim from that adopted by the British House of Commons, and had found its way into almost every legislative body in the Union, and time sufficient had elapsed to establish a just construction of it. The ordinary mode by which a member introduces any matter to the notice and consideration of the House, is by asking that it may be referred to one of the committees, to report on the expediency of introducing a bill. This request is ordinarily granted, almost as a matter of course, the House relying on the judgment of its committees, who exercise a discretion in the matter. This was the ordinary mode; but that provided for by the standing rule, is extraordinary. It is adapted to extraordinary cases which may arise: for it might happen that a member was desirous of submitting some matter on which he was confident of having a majority of the House in its favor, although a majority of the regular committee to which it would have to be referred might be opposed to it. This was a case for the operation of the rule. In this case the member gives notice that he will, on a day certain, ask leave to introduce a bill on that subject. If the House grants the leave, it takes the discretion out of the hands of a committee, and assumes it for itself; and the understanding is, that the bill shall in its scope agree with the leading views of the member who introduces it. That member does not, ordinarily, bring in a bill written out at length, but merely gives an outline of what he desires. Of an advantage like this, he would not have members deprived, as they must be, if the new rule prevail.

Mr. MERCER thought the gentleman last up had mistaken the provisions of the rule for the practice of the House. The latter he had correctly stated, but the rule as it stood did not sanction such a procedure. Mr. M. here recapitulated the only three cases in which this rule had been called into operation for these ten years past, and contended that the preservation of a rule of so little practical use, could not be a very important matter. Mr. M. then went into an argument to shew that a bill, introduced by leave, was to be referred to a committee, and that such committee possessed discretionary power over it, and insisted that, in practice, there was no difference between this mode and that of referring a resolution to a select committee. There was no advantage gained by it to the member asking leave, and it was in effect useless.

Mr. M., after a courteous compliment to the Speaker, referred the embarrassment which had taken place a day or two since, in the application of this rule, to the Speaker's familiarity with the practice in the Virginia House of Delegates, where any individual was permitted to introduce a bill on his own responsibility; but such was not the practice of this House. If the rule were abrogated, and any pressing case should occur, a committee might be raised to meet it.

Mr. BUCK thought the rule ought to stand. He did not understand the gentleman who had advocated it, as giving different constructions of the rule, but only different reasons for the same construction. All seemed to agree that a bill ought always to be referred to a committee, to be by them digested, and that it should receive the first action of the House as reported by them. In the late case, this doctrine was virtually sanctioned by the House, which, on discovering that a bill had been twice read without going to a committee, reconsidered its proceedings, retraced its steps, and ordered the bill to be first prepared by the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. B. was friendly to such a construction as permitted a member to present his views in detail, if he wished, and the best way of doing this was in the form of a bill. If the rule must receive a construction which forbade this, it ought to be abolished.

Mr. TAYLOR was of opinion that rather more importance had been given to this matter than it really deserved. There seemed to be a general mistake prevailing, in the apprehension that, when leave was granted under the present rule, it is granted to an individual member, that he may bring in a bill. The fact was not so. Leave is granted, on the request of that member, that a bill may be brought in; but not, certainly by him, individually, but by a committee of the House. It was, indeed, true that, from courtesy, it was always customary to place that member at the head of such committee as was raised at his request; but this was of courtesy, not of right—by practice, not by the rule. When such a request is made, the House expects to hear the reasons why it ought to be granted; and, when it is granted, the proceeding is only equivalent to the raising a select committee to consider the subject, and report a bill upon it. The only difference lay in this: that it afforded the mover an opportunity of being placed on somewhat more conspicuous ground as the father of the measure proposed by him. If such was at any time an object of ambition, (which it might very innocently be,) he thought a member ought not to be deprived of the gratification. Mr. T. here took occasion to observe that formerly it was a rare thing to instruct the committees of this House in the discharge of their duty: it was then believed that the committees had some little share of intelligence as to what that duty was, and some desire of properly discharging it; but, of late, the committees were dealt with as if they really had not an idea of their own—as if they knew nothing, and could do nothing, save as they were instructed by the House. Hence the floods of resolutions which every day inundated the House; and hence the contests whether one of these resolutions did or did not contain precisely the same idea, or the same number of ideas with another resolution on the same subject, moved by some other gentleman—how far it went—and whether it had any new idea in it. Of all this, Mr. T. said he did not mean to be understood as complaining; he merely stated that it was a novel mode of doing the business of the House. When he first had the honor to serve in this body, the instructing of a committee was a thing which took place very rarely, and only on matters of very grave and serious moment; and the resolution for so instructing a committee, was sometimes the subject of earnest debate in Committee of the Whole House. And it would still be in order to refer a motion for leave to have a bill introduced to a Committee of the Whole. At present there were three modes by which a bill might be got before the House. The first was by a resolution directing a committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting such bill. This mode had become very common. Every week the House passed such resolutions—should he say without understanding them? He would say, without giving them that attentive and serious consideration which the importance of many of them deserved. It would be easy to adduce instances in proof of this remark. He would merely ask whether such resolutions were not often adopted directing a committee to inquire into the expediency of doing what every member, when adopting such resolution, knew to be impracticable? During the short portion of the present session which had elapsed, resolutions had been passed in reference to the relief of individuals in their private affairs, for which no one member of the House would so much as think of voting. These remarks he made without intending the slightest disrespect to the House; but they were elicited by a course of proceeding which has grown more and more common, and which he, for one, could not think was a proper one.

The second mode was by moving that one of the standing committees be directed to report a bill, or that a select committee be appointed to do the same thing. There was but little difference, in practice, between this mode and that permitted by the rule in question—which was the third mode. For his own part, he could see no great reason for a change. Let those who had devoted themselves to a particular subject, by attention and study, and were desirous of being placed in a prominent light, as the parent of certain measures which they deemed important to the public good, be indulged in this desire, by being permitted to have their bills introduced on leave. Yet, from what had already transpired, it must be apparent to all that there was much which might be said on both sides of the question. The rule had stood for many years: he believed it was among the earliest adopted by the House: and, in order to allow time for more mature reflection before it was abrogated, he would move to lay the resolution proposing a new rule, for the present, upon the table.

The motion prevailed, and it was laid upon the table accordingly.

Mr. STORRS rose for the purpose of making a motion in relation to a bill which had been introduced on leave, by a gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. LITTLE] in reference to the apportionment of representation under the next census. That bill had been twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House. He was desirous of giving it some other disposition than such as would occasion it to have its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole. He therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from its consideration, and that it go to a select committee. Should this motion prevail, he was desirous that the select committee should consist of a member from each State in the Union, as the subject was one in which all the States were equally interested.

The motion prevailed, and a select committee was ordered, to consist of twenty-four members.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1827

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia moved the consideration of the following resolution, offered by him some days since, and now lying on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of that portion of the Stock of the Bank of the United States, which is held by the Government of the United States, and the application of the proceeds thereof to the payment of the public debt."

The motion prevailed, and the resolution having been read at the Clerk's table,

Mr. BARBOUR rose, and said, that, at the time he had had the honour of presenting this resolution to the House, he had accompanied it by some general remarks, intended only to convey an outline of those views in which the resolution was founded. Having since understood that it was desired, by many gentlemen, that the policy of the measure it recommended should be discussed without delay, and presuming that the opinion which the House might express at this stage of its consideration, was to be received as decisive of its future destiny, it was his purpose now to go somewhat more at large into the reasons which had induced him to offer this proposition for consideration. But, before he presented these views, he would take leave to make one or two passing remarks, which he owed in justice to himself. He had heard it pretty clearly intimated, since the presentation of this resolution—nay, he had seen it so intimated—that this might possibly be what was denominated a measure of the Opposition in this House. Some ambiguous voices had reached his ear, which seemed to imply that, in bringing forward this proposition, he had been influenced by some motive, and had cherished some purpose, other than those which had been avowed; and that the measure he advocated, was itself the result of concert, and of an understanding among those who were denominated the Opposition members. It was but an act of sheer justice to himself to declare, that, while, on every proper occasion, in relation to measures which might be viewed as affecting what were called party politics, he should openly, frankly, and fearlessly express the opinions which he really entertained, and should, as openly, as frankly, and as fearlessly, pursue his convictions, whether they did or did not coincide with those of others. It never had been a part of his character, or his course, and it never should be, to approach any object he had in view by indirection; his motives he would openly avow; the opinions he held he would frankly express; what he did he would ever do in open day; he trusted he never should learn, as he had not hitherto learned, the by-paths of either moral or political obliquity. He disdained to be influenced by considerations which he was ashamed to avow. He despised the idea of getting at the object he might have in view, in any way but by meeting it in the face, and stating his opinions or his purpose just as it really was. Under the influence of such feelings, he now utterly and positively disclaimed any such motive, purpose, concert, or understanding, as that which had been attributed to him. So far was he from this, that, as far as he had received any intimation of the opinion of those gentlemen, with whose general political principles he agreed, as to the proposition he was about to offer, he knew that some of them were opposed to it. It was no more than justice to himself to say, that the measure proposed by the resolution, be it right or wrong, whether salutary or pernicious in its tendency, was the offspring of his own mind. He had not mentioned it to more, in all, than half a dozen of his friends, and out of this number two disapproved of it.

We shall have fallen on evil times, indeed, said Mr. B. if a member of this House might not, in the integrity of his heart, rise in his place, and offer for consideration a measure which he believed to be for the public weal, without having all that he said and did imputed to some hidden motive, and referred to some secret purpose which was never presented to the public eye. He again solemnly disclaimed all such motives, and every such purpose. To what he had already said, he would go so far as to add, that, even in the last annual report received from the Secretary of the Treasury, there was an allusion to the very subject which he had brought forward. As a proof of this, he begged leave to read a short extract from that report:

"The sum of seven millions, subscribed by the Government to the Bank of the United States, is, in effect, destroyed as debt, by the United States owning an equal amount in the shares of the Bank. So far is this sum from being any charge upon the Treasury, that the Treasury is annually receiving interest for it, in the dividends upon the shares. Whenever the latter are sold, they may at least be expected to replace the sum that was invested in them."

Here was certainly a pretty distinct reference of the honorable Secretary to the same subject as was embraced by his resolution; and yet, he presumed, it would hardly be inferred that motives such as he had found it necessary to disavow, had influenced the author of that report. With these prefatory remarks, which he conceived were demanded by a just regard to his own character, Mr. B. said he would now pass to the immediate question to be considered.

My proposition, said Mr. B. is to sell out the stock at present held by the Government in the Bank of the United States, amounting to the sum of seven millions of dollars. When I first introduced this subject, I stated to the House that the existing price of this stock in the market was understood to stand at an advance of twenty-three and a fraction per cent. on the nominal amount. It is plain, that if the Government could sell out its whole amount of stock at that price, it would realize a profit to the whole extent of this advance of twenty-three per cent. on seven millions of dollars, amounting to about one million six hundred thousand dollars. No proof will be required that this would be a very advantageous transaction, provided it were attended with no injurious consequences, sufficient to countervail the amount of profit. To add such an amount to the available funds of the Government, without laying any additional burthens upon the people, fiscally considered, must be a beneficial operation. Would such an operation, Mr. B. asked, be attended with those injurious consequences which have been anticipated, and which have been urged as objections to it by gentlemen on this floor? It would be now his endeavor to show that it would not. We have been told, that the very instant such a measure was resolved upon in this Hall, a very large deduction would take place in the present advance in the market price of the stock, and that the greater part, if not the whole of the twenty-three and an half per cent. would suddenly disappear, on the mere mention of such a thing as being seriously intended. We have been farther assured, that the suddenly throwing of seven millions of dollars worth of this stock into the money market at once, would present an amount that could not be purchased by the capitalists here, and that, consequently, an alarming depression of the price would infallibly ensue.

In reply, I might remark, in the first place, that the mere matter of detail, as to the time, the manner, and the different sums, in which this stock is to be introduced into the market, would be subject to arrangement in the bill reported in pursuance of this resolution; and that, by a judicious arrangement of them, much, if not all, of this consequence might readily be obviated. The whole amount need not be thrown into market en masse, but successively presented in broken sums. With his present view of the fact of the case, Mr. B. said he could not and would not say that there was no possibility of the smallest depression taking place, and he certainly was conscious that, if there should be any fall in the price, it would, at the utmost be very small. Bank Stock is a commodity in market; and there is one principle of political economy, so well established as to be universally received as an axiom in that science, that the price of every commodity, (not excepting even gold and bullion) is regulated in all cases by the proportion between the supply of, and the demand for it. There may occur occasional fluctuations and irregularities in this general state of things, but these, like the alternating vibrations of the pendulum, still tend to quiescence in the centre. Now take this universal and well settled principle and apply it to the existing situation of this country—to the stock in question—to its character—to the quantity proposed to be sold, and to the demand for it.

It will not be denied by me, said Mr. B., that a state of circumstances might be conceived to exist, in which an attempt to sell this amount of United States' Bank Stock, would be productive of very considerable depression of its market price. But the question now to be considered by the House is not what might happen under a given posture of conceivable circumstances, but what is likely to happen in the actually existing state of things. The only ground of such depression, if any, must be the large increase of supply, while the same demand, and no more, continues to exist. Such a state of things would impinge upon the general principle I first stated, by altering the proportion between demand and supply. But no such state of things will exist, should the present proposition prevail: for there is, and has been, for these three years past, a diminished quantity of Government stock to be sold, and an increased amount of means to buy it, both occasioned by one and the same cause, namely: the paying off of large portions of the public debt by the redemption of United States' Stock.

During the year 1825, we paid of the principal of the public debt more than seven and a half millions; in 1826, more than seven millions; and, during the present year, 1827, we shall have paid more than six and a half millions more; making, in all, an amount of twenty-one and about a quarter millions. The Secretary of the Treasury, however, informs us in his report, that five millions of this debt has been paid by the issue of a new stock. It will therefore be proper to deduct this; and the result will be, that, in these three years, there have been actually paid off more than sixteen millions of the public debt. To this let me add, that, according to the statements relative to the sinking fund, and the present condition of the funded debt, there will be paid, in the year 1828, seven millions more; and in the years 1829 and 1830, an amount even beyond this (being enlarged by the increased activity of the sinking fund, from the circumstance of a large amount now devoted to interest becoming applicable to the principal of the debt.) Reckoning, then, that, during the years 1825, 6, and 7, sixteen millions have been paid, and that, in 1827, 8, and 9, twenty-one millions more will have been paid, here will have been an amount of thirty-seven millions of the public debt of the United States paid off in six years.

Have any violent shocks been produced by this operation? Has any derangement resulted in the financial arrangements of the country? Has United States' stock fallen? I apprehend not. And why? For the reason I have stated, and which I now apply to the proposition before us, and from which very extensive consequences necessarily follow, going to shew that the effect of the payment of very large amounts of the public debt is not to diminish, but to increase, the price of the residue. When, in the British Government, their sinking fund was established, in the year 1786, it was held necessary to fix a maximum for its operation, lest too great an amount of money should thereby be thrown into the market. It will be my endeavor to shew, that, with us as with them, the effect of paying off the debt produces an abundance of money, and therein an abundance of the means of purchasing the bank stock which the same operation has thrown into the market. While the former owners of the public stock have in their hands money which seeks investment, the sale of the bank stock will furnish an admirable mode by which this may be accomplished. Applying the principle with which he set out, Mr. B. remarked, that it would be apparent that, if any depression was to result, it would rather be produced by paying the debt in money than by exchanging it for bank stock. By redeeming the national stock, money, which was before safely invested, is thrown into the market, and naturally seeks some new employment. Now, I propose, said Mr. B., while this is done, to carry into the market an equal amount of stock in which that money may be invested again. Do gentlemen apprehend a depression in the price of stock? Why? Because, say they, there will be too large an amount of it for the money which is prepared to be invested in it. But my proposition, to its whole extent, goes to pay off so much of the public debt, and thereby to furnish the means of purchasing—in addition to which, seven millions more will be derived next year from the operation of the sinking fund. The conclusion, from a view of these facts, would seem to me to be, that it is next to impossible that a depression can be produced in the price of bank stock by an operation which, while it exposes that stock to sale, supplies, at the same time, the means and the inducement for purchasing it.

Bank of the United States.

[Dec. 20, 1837.]

I do not mean to advocate the old, and what I understand to be now an exploded doctrine, that the payment of the public debt is an addition to the actual funds of the nation. The effect of that payment is only to let loose so much capital from a permanent investment: it creates no new capital, but it adds to the amount of capital seeking investment. Here, then, there will be a combination of the very two circumstances which operate to increase the price of commodity, viz: increased demand and diminished supply—the one created by paying off so much of the public debt, the other by diminishing so much of the public funded stock.

Mr. B. here presented the result of some calculations which he had made, with a view to show how far facts went to justify the principles he had laid down. But, before he exhibited them, he wished to premise, that they had been made from the best information he could obtain; that they did not aim at mathematical exactness, fractions, and even small sums not fractional, having been discarded. (For example, he had taken no notice of the difference resulting from the receipts of dividends from the bank, being half yearly, while the payments of interest on the public stocks were quarterly.) His object was to approximate the truth in its great outline, without attending to its minutest parts. He would first endeavor to shew what was the present average rate of profit on capital in the United States. The 3 per cent. United States' stocks are at this time selling at 87 per cent. of their nominal amount.

Taking them at 87 per cent., the actual annual profit realized by the purchaser, was about  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. But as this description of stocks were redeemable at par at the pleasure of the Government, he had not included them in the statement he was about to submit. Of the  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. redeemable in 1829, 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34, there were, he understood, but one kind now in market; which kind it was he could not say, but he presumed that soonest redeemable. The 5 per cents. ranged from 7 to 8 per cent. advance—he would take the medium at  $7\frac{1}{2}$ , but as this included the dividend of the present year, that amount must be deducted, which would leave them at  $6\frac{1}{2}$ . He that purchased this stock at that state, would receive an annual income of about \$3 33 cents on every \$100. The 5 per cent stocks of 1831, were at from  $8\frac{1}{2}$  to  $9\frac{1}{2}$  advance—he would take the average, 9 per cent.—he who laid out \$107 75 cents in this stock, would receive an annual interest of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the stock until its redemption. Mr. B. said, he introduced these quotations of prices to shew that other stocks than bank stock now yielded an average profit of from  $3\frac{1}{2}$  to  $3\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. only. If the House was surprised at this low rate of profit, he would proceed to show why the investment of money in these stocks could be afforded by the capitalist. He had been told, from the highest authorities, and among others from that of the first Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Hamilton,) in his celebrated report on the funded debt, that any stock which was well and securely funded, which enjoyed the public confidence, and which was transferrable, became, in a great measure, a part of the circulating medium of the country.

In England, stock of this description, as was well known, entered largely into the circulating medium of the Kingdom, and, in this country, the credit of our public stock being high, it is, in general, transferrable as a circulating medium, and loans on the security can at all times be easily effected. Now, if a capitalist does not invest his money in a permanent stock of some kind, so long as it remains idle he loses the interest on it entirely: but if he invests it in stock, even at a low interest, yet he is receiving something for it, though the profit may be but moderate; and, whenever he wishes to make use of it for business or speculation, he has a control over it almost as efficient and certain as if it were on deposit in one of the banks. Hence arises such a state of things that the capitalists of the United States, as the fact proves, find it to their interest to invest their money in the public funds, at a less rate of interest than that money might command by other investments.

If he was accurate in the result to which he had arrived by his former calculation, Mr. B. said, then he was prepared to show, by another statement, (which he offered with the same explanation, as to its degree of correctness, which he had made in relation to the former,) that he who now pays the market price for stock of the United States' Bank, would receive about  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. for his money, during the period of time which would elapse before the expiration of its charter.

Now, Mr. B. said, when gentlemen anticipated so great and sudden a depreciation in Bank Stock from offering a large amount of it for sale, they might allay their apprehensions by looking at the profits of other stock in the market. Stockholders, as was universally admitted, well understood what was for their own interest, and were able to calculate with accuracy what would be the value of any contemplated investment of their capital. But, if it was a fact that in other kinds of stock they received a profit of from three and a quarter to three and a half per cent. (as was before shewn) it now appears that they would receive nearly the same profit upon the purchase of United States' Bank Stock, at its present advance.

The existing charter of the U. States' Bank extends to the year 1836. The stockholders know this, and have, therefore, precise data from which to calculate the continuance of their investment in the Stock, and, allowing the present rate of dividend to be kept up, they may very accurately estimate the value of their investments. Now, of the various kinds of United States' Stock there is not one which is not redeemable before the year 1836: some kinds are to be redeemed in 1829, some, in 1830, and the following years, the maximum being 1835. The Bank Stock is therefore more permanent by a whole year (and a fraction longer) than any of the other Stock in the market; and, I need not, said Mr. B., remind gentlemen that the holders of Stock, whether they intend merely to live on the annual proceeds, or to use it for purposes of business or speculation, attach the greatest value to that Stock which is irredeemable for the longest time, and to the rest proportionably.

The longest date of the Stocks created to pay the debt of the last war was twelve years.

[Here the SPEAKER interferred, and reminded the gentleman that the hour allotted to the consideration of resolutions had elapsed, and that he must postpone the residue of his speech; whereupon, Mr. McDUFFIE moved that the rule on that subject be for this day suspended.]

After some remarks from Mr. BURGESS, (which were declared not to be in order on this motion) the question was taken, and the rule was suspended accordingly.

Mr. BARBOUR then resumed, and recapitulated the points of his argument, having, as he hoped, satisfactorily shown that no depression of the price of Bank Stock was to be feared, because the payments of the public debt already made, and shortly to be made, would furnish a fund that naturally sought investment, while at the same time the amount of United States' Stock was thereby diminished; and because Bank Stock, even at its present advance gave as good a profit as any other Stock.

He had thus far considered the Stock of this Bank as stock merely, and had gone on the presumption that the charter of the Bank was certainly to expire at the limit of its present term, in 1836. But this was by no means certain: on the contrary, there was every probability that the charter would be renewed. The probabilities of this event could as well be judged of by the stockholders as by him, and probably much better. Their calculations of that probability had united with other considerations to produce a market price much advanced beyond the nominal value of the Stock, and this he had endeavored to show was not likely to be diminished.

He now proceeded to inquire if any other evils were to be apprehended from the proposed sale? It had been said, that the moment such a proposal should pass the House, all public confidence in the character of this stock would be at an end; and as its price depends on the compound considerations of its security, its profitableness and its hold on the public confidence, if this last should be destroyed or greatly shaken, a sudden fall in the price of the stock must inevitably follow.

But, he asked, why must the public confidence be diminished? The charter of the bank would still remain; (for he presumed no member of this House thought of laying so much as a finger on that instrument.) All the funds of the bank would continue, its debts receivable would continue; the profits of its operations would remain untouched; its discounts would go on; it would have the same direction; it would continue to be the depository of the funds of the United States, (which constituted of themselves an enormous amount.) In short, not one of its circumstances would sustain any change which could impair the confidence of the stockholders. Why, then, must it be impaired? Suppose, for illustration sake that any other large stockholder should sell out his stock; suppose a canal company, for instance, or any other wealthy association, chose to part with their stock in this bank, because they deemed it most for their interest to use the money elsewhere, would such a sale affect the credit of the stock? Not at all. And why must the mere fact, that, in the present case, the seller happened to be the Government of the United States, produce such an effect? The Government also ceases to be a holder of stock—it does not touch the charter of the Bank—all other operations of the Institution go on as before—except that the United States Government owing a debt, and not having cash funds to pay it, chooses to part with some portion of an investment, and change it for another—it exchanges the advantage of holding of bank stock, for that of paying a debt it owes. So long as the present charter continues, all the remarks founded on its continuance apply. Of its probable renewal, it is perhaps scarcely proper to speak in this place, at this time. Yet I must be permitted to remark, that I cannot concur with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. GOSSETT) in his opinion, expressed when this resolution was introduced a few days since, that the stockholders in a Bank of the United States have a right to expect the renewal of its charter. They, like others, may indeed calculate the probabilities of such an event, but, in the mean while, they have a precise period fixed by the charter for its termination, and on that alone they have a right to reckon. For myself, if I were to speculate on the probabilities of the renewal of the present charter of the United States' Bank, I should, I confess, say it was highly probable it will be renewed. It is true, I did not vote for the charter, and personally, I should vote against its renewal; but, on other grounds from those on which I should act, the subject assumes a very different aspect.

The old bank was indeed suffered to expire: but, in a very few years, public opinion called decidedly for its renewal; and, if we may conjecture the future from knowing and remembering the past, it appears probable that the same views which resulted in the present charter, will prevail for its renewal. The prominent considerations urged by gentlemen in its favor, were, so far as I recollect, the effect of the bank in equalizing exchanges; in keeping up a currency at par value; in transferring with facility, balances from one part of the United States to another, and in its furnishing a safe depository for the funds of the Government. These reasons will probably be as operative in 1836, as they were when the present charter was granted.

A farther objection to the proposition I have submitted was the consideration that it would be wrong in itself, and in the eyes of the American People, that Government should continue its control over an institution which, in that case, would be private property. And certainly, were it true that the Bank of the U. States, as soon as the Government should sell out its stock therein, would become merely private property, there would be much strength in this objection. But, will it not be remembered that the paper of this bank comes to a vast extent, instead of the previous circulating medium of the country? That its paper displaces specie, and transfers it to the vaults of the Bank? While this is the case, can it be said that the country has no interest in that bank, and ought to have no concern with it? The whole funds of the United States are there deposited: can it be possible that the Government has no concern in a bank that holds its whole moneyed capital? What if the Government does sell out its stock, has it not still five Directors out of the twenty-five, who manage its concerns? And ought it not to have them? It has the privilege of knowing and examining the state of the bank's affairs. Is not this just and right? seeing that all its funds are deposited there? Suppose the bank should, from any pressure of circumstances, be induced to violate its charter; the case is provided against: but how? Is the violation to be judged of here, or in the other branch of the legislature? No. It is to be declared by the Judiciary: it is there that the facts are to be judged, and the declaration made. It is not, then, a true proposition, that the Government will retain its control over a mere private institution.

These considerations, however, are urged merely as a collateral and auxiliary part of the subject. My great view and main argument has respect to the pecuniary advantage to be gained by the measure I propose. But there are other views of it. I have already said, on a former occasion, that, in my judgment, it is not proper that Government should be a stockholder in the bank, and that, by the very fact of being so, it is exposed to the influence of interested motives. Let me, for a moment, illustrate this position. By the present charter of the bank, the interest receivable by the institution is limited to 6 per cent. When I look into futurity, I can suppose that a proposition shall be made to Congress to increase this rate of interest; and can it not well be imagined, that men of the purest integrity, then in this House, may, insensibly, and without their own knowledge, be, to a greater or less degree, influenced by a calculation on the receipt of this rate of interest? Let me suppose another case, and such an one as has actually happened elsewhere. It is admitted, that paper, in order to constitute a sound currency, should at all times be convertible into specie. Now suppose a state of great public difficulty, and, in this emergency the bank steps forward to the relief of the Government, might not government in such a case, be induced, by a regard to its own interest, to pass an act suspending specie payments?

During the last war, there were banks in this country who were compelled, by the pressure of the times, to suspend their own specie payments, and what was the consequence? Such an enormous and overwhelming issue of paper was poured out on the community, that the value of all kinds of property was deranged, and consequences of the most distressing and ruinous character necessarily ensued. The then Secretary of the Treasury estimated, I think the total amount of the circulating medium, at one time, at the enormous sum of one hundred and fifteen millions of dollars, and this vast amount was, in the course of four years, reduced down to forty-five millions; the contracts and speculations of the former years were swept away by the retiring ebb, and thousands and tens of thousands were brought to utter ruin by the change.

A remarkable instance of the same kind happened in England. In the year 1797, Parliament authorized the Bank of England to suspend specie payments—they were induced to adopt this measure, because the Government needed the funds of the Bank to subsidize their Continental Allies in the great struggle which then convulsed Europe. But while the Bank was compelled to pay specie for its notes, this could not be accomplished. The act was then passed. But no sooner was the Bank released from the necessity of paying in gold and silver, than its paper suffered a depreciation of from 15 to 20, and, I am even told by a gentleman near me, (and who is more versed in these matters than I pretend to be) to 33½ per cent. I mention these matters as having only a collateral bearing on the subject—but they tend to show the danger of placing the Government under temptation to a measure thus fraught with evil. I am therefore fixed in the opinion that the Government ought not to continue to be a Stockholder in this Bank; but I think I have shown that the People would have no just reason to complain that Government should, notwithstanding, retain its present measure of control over the institution.

This, however, is a subordinate consideration. My main argument rests, as I before observed, on the pecuniary advantage to be realized by the sale of the Stock. No member on this floor calculates, I presume, to impede the operation of the Sinking Fund; yet that fund will throw into the Stock market seven millions of money the next year, and this will produce far more injury than throwing into the market the same amount of Bank Stock. But, while the redemption of the debt will throw so large a sum afloat, the sale of the Bank Stock owned by the U. States will meet and absorb it.

Such are the general views by which I have been influenced to offer the present resolution. I am well aware that difference of sentiment exists upon the subject, among gentlemen for whose talents I have the highest respect. They will no doubt bring forward their views and support them with their accustomed ability. I shall hear them with the deepest attention; and now beg leave to conclude, by expressing a hope that the House will pass on this measure in its present stage, as deeming its present decision, in effect, to be final.

Mr. BARNEY next rose. He said, that, emulating the example of the gentleman from Virginia, he would take occasion at the threshold of this discussion to disclaim the influence of all party considerations. The only banner he was prepared to rally under, was that of his country, whose best interests he considered deeply involved in the decision that shall be had on this important question—the agitation of which had already created a strong sensation, much increased by the high reputation of the honorable mover, who, distinguished as a politician, occupied a large space in public esteem; and the ingenious, eloquent, and imposing argument he had just addressed to the House, could not fail to increase its effect. When it is recollected that the resolution now under consideration affects an Institution, whose capital of thirty-five millions of dollars is used as a circulating medium among the respective states, and between these U. States and Foreign Countries, it cannot create surprise that an universal panic should pervade our commercial cities: for, until this question is decided, United States' Bank Stock is valueless as a means of remittance, more especially to Great Britain, where as exchange fluctuates, large portions of it are frequently transferred. The argument, based on the supposed profit to be realized by this sale, will be found to resemble statues of marble resting on pedestals of ice—the moment it is ascertained that the Government has dissolved its connexion with this National Institution, by the transfer of its stock, it is perfectly immaterial what amount of capital may be set afloat by the extinction of the public debt—that confidence which we shall have withdrawn from it, will pervade all money lenders, and, before a sale of one share can be effected, the market price will fall to par. The honorable mover of this resolution frankly avows, that he was originally opposed to the charter, and that he still continues hostile to its renewal; if his proposition is adopted, will it not be fairly inferred, that the policy which dictated the sale of the Stock, is to be maintained by a refusal to renew the Charter, and, consequently, the value which the Stock in the market derived from an impression that the Government, having an interest in its prosperity, will be favorable to a prolongation of its existence, ceases the moment that sale is decided on. It is asserted that, at the present selling price of Stocks, money really produces but 3¼ per cent. per annum; admit this position, and then United States' Bank Stock, producing 6 per cent. on its cost of $100, ought not to be sold under $180 per share. Mr. B's impressions were, that as it is desirable to pay off, forthwith, the loans paying 6 per cent. interest, the amount consequently, can readily be obtained at 4½ per cent. As the Bank divides 6 per cent., a sale of its Stock under $133½ per share, would be so much lost in its real value. Mr. B. here asked if the exigencies of the nation required any extraordinary effort to pay off the National Debt, the amount of which was nominally 67 millions, in reality but 47? For this identical 7 millions of Bank Stock, which we hold in exchange for 7 millions 5 per cents. issued to the Bank, is a set off against that portion of the debt. And 13 millions 3 per cents. (which under no circumstances, was it probable the Government would pay off, while a single Internal Improvement remained unexecuted, or any taxes were levied upon the People,) there remains but 47 millions to be discharged, which, by the regular operation of the Sinking Fund, would be extinguished in less than seven years; and, it is not desirable to the creditors of the Nation, or to the Nation itself, that it should be paid off more rapidly.

Mr. B. could not coincide in the opinion, that continuing to hold this stock could have any influence in increasing the rate of interest by legislative enactment. As individuals, a large portion of the members composing the Congress of the United States, had occasion to become borrowers of money, hence they could have no inducement to raise the rate of interest; as politicians, they could not be so short sighted as not to foresee, that, in a Government constituted like ours, the moment the national debt was extinguished, the duty on imports, which constituted the revenue of the country, would be so much reduced as merely to meet the current expenses of the nation, consequently the slightest speck of war in the political horizon would require increased expenditures, which could only be met by temporary loans, when we must again become payers of interest, the increase of which would react on ourselves. He must confess this argument had no weight with him.

Mr. B. remarked, that it might not be deemed irrelevant to recur to the financial situation of the country at the time this Institution was called into existence. An irredeemable paper currency flooded the Union, circulating within a few miles only of the bank which issued it, and valueless for any purpose of exchange beyond the limits of the State which authorized it. If the Treasury required any portion of the revenues collected South of the Delaware to meet its expenditures in the Eastern States, they had to encounter a premium of twenty per cent. which, at one period, was the actual rate of exchange between Baltimore and Boston.

What are the beneficial changes which have been produced by the establishment of this great national institution? Your currency, no longer tainted with suspicion, circulates freely throughout this wide extended empire; a specie basis regulates this prominent feature of commercial intercourse, and all balances of public and private funds are transferred from Florida to Maine without expense or risk. One million five hundred thousand dollars has been received into the public Treasury as a bonus for a charter. At least one million will be gained by the difference between the dividends on Bank stock held by the United States and the five per cent. stock issued to the Bank.

Should the average dividends be six per cent. per annum for the term of its charter, it will amount to one million four hundred thousand dollars; but four hundred thousand is deducted as a large allowance for contingencies. The saving of salaries and expenses of twenty-four loan offices in the respective States, whose duties are now gratuitously discharged by the Bank, will, in twenty years, amount to a little short of another million, thus exhibiting the enormous sum of three millions and a half of dollars, clear gain to the Union, during the continuation of the present charter. Does not the goose lay golden eggs fast enough, that we are thus invoked to do a deed, which, if it shall not jeopard her existence, must, by infusing doubts and mistrust abroad and at home, materially circumscribe the sphere of her usefulness.

Mr. B. concluded, by remarking, that he considered this institution as entitled to the fostering care and paternal protection of the constituted authorities of the nation. France, England, and other commercial countries, had found it indispensable to cherish and protect a system which fixed the circulating medium on a firm basis; and, although we should even realize the profit of sixteen hundred thousand dollars, which was the inducement held out by the calculations of the honorable member, he would esteem it a slight equivalent for the loss of national reputation we should sustain by presenting ourselves to the world as a Congress of stock-jobbers, anxious to avail ourselves of any rise in the shares of our national Bank, which the dictates of sound policy had called into existence, and which, in his judgment, ought to be perpetuated. Aware of the importance of an early decision of this momentous question, Mr. B. said he would forbear intruding any further remarks on the attention of the House.

Mr. BARBOUR, with a view to obtain a direct decision upon the principle involved, now modified his resolution so as to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill to authorize the sale of the stock of the Bank owned by the United States.

Mr. McDUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, expressed his thanks to the gentleman from Virginia for his fairness, in proposing this modification. He thought, with the gentleman who had preceded him, that it was important the question should be decided on its merits, and all-important that it should be decided as soon as possible. He thought that, in a fiscal view of the question, the gentleman from Virginia, in laying down his premises, had overlooked the well established principle, that, even in individual competition, where a market is more than supplied with any given commodity, the price of that commodity always falls in proportion to the excess of the supply. He had clearly shown that there existed a surplus capital in the United States, from the Government having paid off sixteen millions of the public debt. This very surplus of money in market, Mr. McD. argued, entered into the price of the stock. If, on the contrary, there was a scarcity of cash in the market, the stock would not bring its par value. As to the fact demonstrated by the gentleman's calculations, that the real value of money in the United States is at present not more than three and a half per cent.; it had no bearing at all on the present question. Whenever the Government comes into the market, all the principles resulting from the relative state of demand and supply, operate with tenfold power. The Government is a mammoth seller, or a mammoth buyer. When the Government comes into market as a buyer, it raises the price of stock beyond all proportion, as, when it comes in as a seller, it depresses it beyond proportion. It was upon this principle, that, though money be actually worth, as the gentleman says, only three and a half per cent., the Government when it passed a law to exchange its six per cent. stock for a stock of five per cent., irredeemable at a later period, could not get it; whilst, if the Government were to go into market and borrow, to-morrow, the whole sixteen millions it has paid off, the stock it would issue, would, in two days time, be at eight or ten per cent. advance.

Mr. McD. said that it was, therefore, always to be regretted that Government should come into market, because its presence there involuntarily produced a great effect upon the market in every way.

Mr. McD. then made some statements to show that refined arithmetical calculations were not proper data in all cases to legislate upon. He presumed that it would be admitted, as a general proposition, that the stock of the Bank of the United States is certainly worth as much to Government as it is to individuals. To the latter, its value, regulated upon principles which cannot err, is now twenty-three per cent. above par. If it is of that value to individuals, it is, upon the same principle, of the same value to Government. Why? The Government receives six per cent. interest upon the stock in the Bank, whilst it pays only five per cent. on the same amount of its own stock. The difference, therefore, is one per cent., or, on the whole amount of its interest in the Bank, seventy thousand dollars per annum clear profit, besides its interest in the balance, which the Bank always reserves to meet contingencies. If, then, you sell your stock in the Bank, supposing you can sell it at the present market price, you make, according to the gentleman's calculation, a present gain of one million six hundred thousand dollars, whilst you annihilate a capital which will produce, to the end of time, if the Bank continues to exist, a revenue of seventy thousand dollars a year. But, so far from being able to dispose of the stock at the present advanced price in the market, Mr. McD. believed, that, if this resolution were now to pass, the stock of the Bank would be at once reduced to par, in the market, upon mere pecuniary calculations: And why? Mr. McD. here entered into calculations to shew the effect, upon the value of the stock, from any intimation of a disposition on the part of the Government to restrict its existence to the duration of its present charter, and traced its present high price in the market to the general confidence that the charter would be continued. The effect of bringing the Government shares into market, Mr. McD. resumed, would be to reduce the price of the stock to par, if not below par. What, then, would be the effect of this measure?

We sell our stock at par, said he: do we enable ourselves, by doing so, to pay off, as the gentleman supposes, any portion of the national debt? No: for the seven millions we should receive for our Bank stock would only go to pay to the Bank of the United States the seven millions we owe for that stock. The only operation which would really and effectually extinguish any portion of the debt of the United States, would be a sale at the profit of one million six hundred thousand dollars, which the gentleman calculates upon, under the erroneous notion that so large a portion of stock would command the present market price. But, if we sell the stock at its par value, as Mr. McD. had assumed that we should do if we sell at all, then, instead of gaining the sum calculated, we should actually lose the identical sum of one million six hundred thousand dollars. For the gentleman had himself shown that the stock was now worth twenty-three per cent. above par: and if it were so disposed of as to yield only its value at par, the difference would certainly be lost to the United States.

Mr. McD. said he should not pretend to follow the honorable member in his most ingenious argument, or in his calculations. But he would now call the attention of the House to a fact, by which it would appear that all parts of the United States were interested in this matter. It was a fact, of which he was apprised from various, and from the very highest sources, that at this time the stock of the United States Bank constitutes the medium by which the balance against the United States in our trade with Great Britain, to a great extent, is discharged, and the necessity of paying that balance in specie averted. What, he asked, would be the effect of destroying the confidence of the foreign creditor in the value of this stock? No gentleman, at all acquainted with the subject, would deny that the bare knowledge of the passage of such a resolution as this, would knock down, to a point much below par, the stock of the Bank of the United States in foreign countries. What, then, would be the consequence? Instead of using this stock for remittances, the balances due to the merchants of Europe must be remitted in specie. This specie must be paid from the vaults of the Bank. A run upon the Bank would inevitably ensue for millions upon millions. What would be the result? Every gentleman who knows the usual proportion between the paper of a Bank in circulation and the specie in its vaults, must know that there is no Bank capable of meeting a run of this kind. The Bank thus run upon must curtail its discounts; its paper must be called in, its debtors distressed. Who are, in this case, the debtors of the Bank thus obliged to call upon them? The State Banks! There is hardly one of them in the United States that is not completely in the power of the Bank of the United States, and that has not received from that institution (notwithstanding all the complaints against it) as much indulgence as that Bank can possibly extend. The local Banks will then have to press upon their debtors, and a general concussion and pressure will be produced all over the country.

A single fact would shew the effect of the passage of such a resolution as this. Supposing it would, as he believed it would, at once depress the stock to a par price in the market, that operation alone would be a diminution of the property of those who hold stock in the Bank to the amount of six millions and a half of dollars, being the amount of the present premium upon the twenty-eight millions of the stock held by individuals. A Government possessing the power to produce such sudden and injurious changes in the value of property, ought to be exceedingly cautious in the use of such power. If any great public object required, and duty called upon him, Mr. McD. said, let the injury fall where it might, he would discharge his duty. But he was happy to hear the gentleman himself, who had voted against chartering the Bank, say, that he entertained no doubt of the charter being renewed. He believed it to be the solemn duty of every statesman to impress upon the public that this institution is the only instrument, by means of which Congress can exercise the power of regulating the currency of the Union—by which it can prevent excessive issues of paper by the local Banks, so destructive, as the gentleman from Virginia had himself intimated, to the interests of the country. Without this instrument, Congress has not the means, though it is invested by the Constitution with the power, to guard against this evil. If you destroy this instrument, the value of every description of property will depend upon the greater or less discretion with which the numerous banking institutions of the country may regulate their issues of paper. He would not attempt to present the various views which urged the maintenance of the Bank of the United States, and had originally led to its establishment. Such, and so important were they, that, of those who still thought it unconstitutional, when the bill for establishing it was on its passage, some, convinced of its necessity, voted for it, and others left the House, that they might not be obliged to vote against its passage. An institution so important as this, ought not to be subjected to the fluctuations of party; and he did hope that gentlemen might be allowed freely to express their views on a subject of so great consequence, without being subjected to the suspicion of improper motives.

Mr. McD. said he felt himself here obliged to advert to the notice which had been taken elsewhere of the occurrences in the House in reference to this subject. The other morning, said he, as I stepped into the House, the gentleman from Virginia said, as I passed him, that he had a resolution, which he intended to present to the House, touching the finances, upon which he proposed to offer some remarks, to which he invited my attention. Not dreaming that the gentleman proposed to raise any such question as that embraced in this resolution, and being at some distance from him, I indistinctly heard his remarks, and rose immediately to present briefly the result to which my reflections instantly brought me on the subject. A very few days afterwards, never having exchanged ideas on the subject with any one, previous to its agitation, I saw my course on that occasion ascribed to the base and unprincipled motive of having first agreed to co-operate in the object, and then, finding the sentiment of the House to be against the proposition, of rising to break its effect. One word now said on this subject may save many more. I came here with the intention of doing the business of the nation, and doing it speedily; and, so far as it depends on me, and God gives me strength, it shall go on, and speedily. But if the Journals of the Administration at the Seat of Government are sanctioned in a course which will give to any measure, of whatever nature, a party complexion, the consequences cannot fail to be highly injurious. I think it proper to express my deep indignation, before the People of the United States, against this forcing of public men, whether they will or not, to imbue all public concerns with the bitterness of party. Mr. McD. added, that he had exchanged sentiments on this subject with very few individuals; but he ventured to say, that the vote on this resolution would not be a party vote. Every member will vote upon it on his honest impressions, which he will not suffer to be affected by his relations to any party.

Mr. McD. concluded by expressing the hope, that, on all sides, so far as the Journals around them were under the control of any party, they would be prevailed upon to permit this Congress to go on with the transaction of the public business, without imputing political motives to measures having no such origin.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New-York, after an observation on the importance of this question, demanded that it be decided by yeas and nays. The demand being sustained by the House, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. DRAYTON then rose, and expressed great reluctance to trouble the House, which he should not have done, had a few of the objections to the proposed measure, which he considered of the most weight, been advanced by either of the gentlemen who had preceded him. He agreed that the question was one of great importance, and that it should be speedily disposed of. The arguments of the honorable mover of the resolution were certainly very ingenious; but he had not adverted to what he thought ought to be the primary consideration in a discussion of this nature, and one which was of much greater consequence than any consideration merely pecuniary.

Bank of the United States.

The first question to be settled, was, whether or no the proposed scheme would redound to the pecuniary advantage of the United States? That it would do so, constituted, in point of fact, the only argument of the mover; and, if such were the case, and there existed no countervailing objection, the measure should doubtless be adopted. But if, on the contrary, it should appear that the plan was attended with no pecuniary advantage whatever, then, the honorable member himself would confess that it ought to be rejected. The gentleman had made some calculations of profit, which seemed to him, to be sure, very plain; but it would be found, on examination, that, instead of profit, the reverse would ensue. The present value of money is four per cent. The Government can obtain whatever amount it wants, at this rate of interest. He did not rely upon the fact that Government could get money at a cheaper rate than others; but Canal Companies had actually issued stock at  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per centum, and the premium on that Stock reduced the real interest to 4 per centum. This, then, he assumed as the interest at which money could be borrowed, where the security was good. Now, if the Government received, at this period, six per cent. on its stock in the Bank, it got an interest exceeding the common rate by precisely 50 per cent. Any other investment of its funds would bring only four per cent. This brings six, so that the Government gets the common interest of money on one hundred and fifty dollars, for every hundred dollars it has invested in this stock. By selling, the Government would lose the difference between twenty-three dollars and fifty dollars on every hundred, supposing the stock to remain at its present advance, so that, admitting the public faith not to be at all shaken by the sale, still a greater benefit would be realized by continuing to hold it. But there could be no doubt that a very great depression would be produced by the sale of seven millions of this stock. The honorable gentleman from Virginia says that price depends, in all cases, on the proportion between supply and demand. The principle, with some limitation, is, no doubt, correct; but that is not the question before the House. The question for us to weigh, said Mr. D. is, whether a stock, which now sells at one hundred and twenty-three per cent. in consequence of the confidence that the Government will continue to be a Stockholder, would remain at that rate when it was known that Government would not so continue. If that is the cause of the present high price, take away the cause, and the stock must fall. How low it would fall could not exactly be known; it might fall to par—even below it. The consequence of this would be to deprive the Government of a great amount of money, on which it now realizes twenty-three per cent. and by which it might pay a debt of eight millions, by an advance of only six and a half millions. It was perfectly well known, that, when once public confidence in any moneyed institution is shaken, the consequent depression is not governed by a settled mathematical rule, but by the feeling and fears of the holders, and it not unfrequently happened, that, by such a panic, the stock which had before been the highest actually became the lowest in market. Mr. D. said, that he thought he had satisfactorily shewn, that Government would not be a gainer, but very probably a loser, by the operation now proposed. But it ought to be demonstrably certain, that some gain will result, before we went into a moneyed operation of such magnitude and extent. What possible combination of circumstances could have a stronger effect in depressing the price of any public security, than that the Government, without any known or ostensible cause, should suddenly withdraw all its interest in it. It was a stronger case than had ever existed.

Yet the mere pecuniary calculation of profit and loss did not constitute the strongest objection to the measure proposed. It was a matter of far more consequence that the character of a nation for fidelity to its contracts, express or implied, should be sacredly preserved, than that it should gain any pecuniary amount whatever. He should not apply the strict rules of ethics, or the doctrines of the common law, to a case like this, but merely the rules of common sense and common honesty. When the charter was given, and the Government agreed to take seven millions (which was one fifth) of the Stock, to receive a bonus of fifteen hundred thousand dollars, to require an annual statement of accounts, to obtain very valuable facilities in the transmission and exchange of its funds, and have all the duties of twenty-four Commissioners of Loans performed gratis, it was surely by no means a strained, but on the contrary, a necessary and incontrovertible conclusion, that the Government was never to place that institution in a worse situation than when its charter was granted. It was under this impression, founded on the mutual advantages derived from the arrangement, both to the Bank and to the Government, that the stock had risen to its present price. If now the Government shall, by its act, shake the public confidence in this institution, it will virtually violate its pledged faith, for the problematical and doubtful purpose of gaining a trifling sum of money.

Mr. D. said, he was perfectly satisfied, that, if the gentleman from Virginia could think that such would be the result, he never would have introduced the present resolution. There certainly was in equity a contract between the Government and the Stockholders, that the Government would not withdraw its confidence from the Institution, except under the most extraordinary circumstances, and the most urgent pressure of necessity. If such necessity could indeed be made to appear, there might be some justification of this measure before the American People. But the necessity did not exist, and was not even pretended. The Bank had hitherto gone on under the support and confidence of the Government, and he hoped it would continue to do so, at least till its present charter should expire; but if not, the Government might in vain expect the same benefits from a renewal of the charter, which it had so long enjoyed under that which was soon to terminate.

Mr. BUCHANAN now moved an adjournment.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1827.

UNITED STATES' BANK STOCK.

Mr. BARBOUR'S resolution for instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill authorizing the sale of the seven millions of the United States' Bank Stock held by the United States, was again taken up for consideration.

Mr. BARBOUR rose with the purpose of offering a few remarks in reply to the observations which had been proposed to his resolution; but, perceiving that Mr. GORHAM had risen at the same time, he yielded the floor; when

Mr. GORHAM addressed the House. After promising as much brevity as the nature of the subject would permit, he said that it was possible his views of it might differ from some of those which had been submitted; but, whatever they were, he should not now have obtruded them upon this House, had not his situation, as the representative of a mercantile community, deeply interested in the result of the present motion, been such as forbade him to be silent. He agreed with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. M'DURRIS) in disclaiming the influence of any party considerations in the part he took on this occasion. He trusted the state of things in our country had not yet arrived at that point, that subjects of vital importance to the national interest and the general prosperity could not be discussed without subjecting every gentleman who took part in the discussion to the imputation of being governed by mere party views. He had no idea that such was our situation; nor should he have once thought of disclaiming such an influence, had not the gentleman alluded to conceived it necessary to make such a disclaimer.

The gentleman from Virginia, when first introducing his resolution before the House, had said, (if he rightly understood him,) that he had previously shewn it to him (Mr. G.) or at least given him notice of its being offered: in this, the gentleman must have certainly been under a mistake—he had indeed, made a number of inquiries of him, in relation to the prices of different descriptions of stock; but, when the resolution was read, he was taken completely by surprise, never having had the least idea that such a proposition was contemplated by any one. (Here Mr. BARBOUR, in an under voice, made a word or two of explanation, the purport of which was understood to be, that he had not meant to say his motion had been shewn to Mr. G.) The few remarks he had thrown out at that time, were, of course, unpremeditated, and devoid of the order and connexion which the subject's importance required. He now was desirous of presenting such views as he had taken of this matter, somewhat more at large.

The question now before the House had been offered and discussed by the mover mainly, if not solely, on principles of mere finance. It had been argued as a question of money—of national profit and loss. If this were all, it might soon be settled. But if, as it appeared not improbable, this motion was connected with deeper and ulterior purposes and views, of a political kind, it ought to be settled still sooner. If there was something more behind; if any purpose was cherished of making the present pecuniary proposition a mere introduction to a system of measures in relation to the connexion of Government with the National Bank, then the sooner such a purpose and such a system were met, the better.

The gentleman had, it was true, advocated the sale of this stock solely as a fiscal operation; but, from his acquaintance with that honorable gentleman's character, opinions, and previous political course, he could not but be strongly inclined to think, that the present measure had more of a political than a financial aspect, and looked toward a complete separation of the Government from the Bank, if not the total abolition of that institution. As, however, the question had been put on mere fiscal grounds, he would ask the attention of the House, while he offered his views of it, as a measure of pure finance.

The honorable mover of the resolution founded his argument on the fact, that the stock of the Bank of the United States stood at present in the market, at an advance of 23½ per cent. and he proposed to go into the market with the whole amount of the stock held by the Government, expecting to sell it at that price, wherever the requisite capital is to be found.

In order to judge the probability of his being able to do this, it was necessary to inquire, in the first place, what were the elements which entered into this advanced price of the stock? The gentleman had compared the price of the Stock of the United States' Bank with that of the stocks issued by Government for the payment of the public debt, and which bore the respective interests of three, four, and five per cent. and in this comparison gone on the assumption that the stock of the Bank, at the winding up of its present charter, would be worth its par value.

Mr. G. granted that, during the continuance of the charter, so long as all the operations of the Bank proceeded in their regular course, this basis of comparison was a fair one. But if, at the expiration of the limit of the present charter, the concerns of that institution must be finally concluded, it was wholly unfair and fallacious. Did the gentleman really believe, that, at the end of the eight years, (should the charter end, and not be renewed,) the holders of its stock would get the money for it? This was, indeed, the case with the Government Stocks; as soon as the period at which they were redeemable arrived, the holders received, in cash, at the Treasury, the full par value of whatever amount they might hold. But, when the vast concerns of such an institution as the National Bank were to be wound up, a very different state of things occurred. There would be, to be sure, a contingent fund for the payment of the Stock; but of what would it consist? Of cash? Far from it:—of debts, chiefly bad; of property, in short, of all sorts of shapes and which would require a Board of Trustees to settle it, after the Bank had ceased its legal existence. Long before such a bank reached the end of its charter, it must prepare for that event: it must curtail, and gradually terminate entirely, all its discounts, months before that time: and would its stock feel nothing of the effect of such a state of things? When the old Bank expired, were its Stockholders instantly paid? So far from this, it was ten years after before the final dividend was declared. And would any gentleman tell him that the Stock of such an expiring institution, was as good as Stock on which the holder was sure to receive the par value in cash the moment it was redeemable? True, the property, of every kind, held by a bank, belonged to the proprietors of the stock; doubtless it was theirs of right: but it was theirs, in fact, only when it could be collected: and experience proved that, at the winding up, there always occurred a great loss upon it—if not in money, at least in time, which, to most stockholders, was the same thing. It usually proved a mere wreck and remnant. And so well was this understood, that, when it was known that the charter of the old United States' Bank was not to be renewed, its stock, which had stood as high as 140 per centum, fell to 90 per centum in market. As to the conditions of the present Bank, Mr. G. said it was impossible he should know them: but one thing he did know, and so did every body else, that great mismanagement of its concerns had at one time taken place, and great losses had consequently been sustained. How such an amount of loss had been covered up, so as to admit of the present dividends, he knew not; but for one, he was inclined to believe that those losses had not, to this day, been recovered from, and that, on examination, it would be found there was still a deficit in the funds of the Bank.

From what he had stated, he thought it must appear that the present dividends made by the Bank did not constitute the only element of the price its stock at present held; but that there was another, and a very important element, that entered largely into it, viz. the expectation that the concerns of the Bank would continue to go on, and that, when the present charter should expire, the institution would still be continued under a new one. This was the general expectation of all who held its stock, of all who bought it. And why should they not, said Mr. G., expect this at your hands? Have you done nothing to create such an expectation? To answer this question, let us look for a moment at the past history of this institution. You have done, and you have undone; you have built up, and you have pulled down: you have made experiments on the want and on the possession of such a thing, until at length, I had believed that it was now a point conceded, an opinion, in which sensible men of all parties were agreed, that such a Bank was a necessary machine in the State—an engine which entered as an elementary part into the operations of a well ordered Government. I know that doubts are held, and have been loudly expressed, as to the constitutionality of a national Bank: I hold such doubts to be very unfortunate, and am myself free from the least share of them: but I did understand, that even those who believed no provision for such an institution to be contained in the Constitution, were themselves obliged, by the pressure of experience and of facts, to acknowledge, that it was an engine essentially and indispensably necessary to the application of the power of the Government to the public good.

In 1781, the old Congress, that feeble and flimsy association, so void of all energy, and so destitute of every thing like efficient control of the public finance, even that Congress ventured on a kindred measure, incorporated the Bank of North America, and took shares in that Bank, which was at the same time, a State institution. The experiment failed to produce any restoration of gold and silver, and Congress sold out its shares. No sooner did this take place, than the Government was pressed by the Bank, the Bank itself was pressed by the State of Pennsylvania, the Directors were harassed on every side, and then you did, through the State of Pennsylvania, what was afterwards done directly by the United States: under the inordinate fear of Banking institutions, the charter granted to the Bank, by the State of Pennsylvania was repealed. The effects of such a step were soon and deeply felt. Foreigners immediately withdrew their funds. Doubts were thrown out among capitalists generally as to the security and permanency of the institution, and such became the state of things, that the State of Pennsylvania found itself obliged to restore the charter; but it was under many limitations and restrictions. In 1790, you chartered the first Bank of the United States, limiting its existence to twenty years. This act was not passed without being warmly contested; it was then, as since, opposed on constitutional grounds: but the act passed, and the Bank was established. But the views and feelings in which the opposition originated continued to be entertained, and when the twenty years had run out, the charter was suffered to expire by its own limitation. Before it died, you sold out your stock; and then another state of doubt and uncertainty involved the capitalists of the country. But the want of a Bank was so severely felt by the Government, that, after having failed in the various expedients which had been tried as substitutes, in 1816 you once more incorporated a new Bank of the U. States. That act spoke a very intelligible language. It proclaimed to all the world that you had tried in vain to do without such an institution; that you had been taught by the best of teachers, experience; and had learned that a National Bank was not only advantageous, but necessary and indispensable. In the same year you funded the debt of the United States, and issued stocks not only at 3, 4, and 5 per cent.; but the greater part at 6, and even 7 per cent.; redeemable at pleasure. You next entered into an agreement with the Bank that, if it would take 7 millions of your stocks, you would take the like amount of the stock of the Bank. The agreement went into effect, and you became stockholders in the institution to the amount of seven millions of dollars. There was, I grant, no express agreement with the Bank that you should never sell out this stock; but there certainly was the fullest understanding that you were to be permanent holders of it. In a short time the stock rose very high; it reached even 150 per cent. But though you were then paying nearly double interest for money and a sale at that rate of advance would have been a very profitable operation, such an idea was never so much as heard of. As a mere speculation it would certainly have been attended with immediate advantage: but it would have aimed a blow upon the national credit such as no present profit could justify, or even tempt you to inflict. The inducement, at this day, is far less.

In contemplating this short history of your banking operations, will any one contend that one important element in the price of the National Bank is not the public expectation that Government will continue to be interested in the Bank? If it is in vain to argue that a mere withdrawal of the Government from a share of the stock, while all its other relations to the Bank remain unaltered, ought not, on principles of logic, to affect the price of the stock. The question is not what ought to be the effect, but what is the effect. Whether right or wrong, the fact is so. It is always so. I care not whether men ought, or ought not to reason, that the Government acts from merely selfish motives; if they do reason so, the effect on the money market is just the same as if they ought to reason so. 'Tis vain to fight against the uniform course of human affairs. It is especially so in all that relates to matters of money and of credit. When capitalists see you holding on as stockholders to the end of the time limited by charter for the continuance of the Bank, they naturally infer that the fact of your having an interest in continuing the Bank by a new charter, will have an influence on the probability of that event. But if they see you abandoning your interest in the stock on the ostensible ground of mere constitutional scruples, or on any other ground whatever, it will, it must, it does, affect the value of that stock. If you are owners, they conclude you feel differently from what you would feel, if you were not owners.

If at a time when you were under the greatest conceivable pressure for money, you continued, nevertheless, to hold on upon this Stock, when you could have sold it at a profit, and now, when under no pressure at all, you suddenly conclude to sell, and that with the prospect of a less profit, what will men, especially what will moneyed men, naturally conclude? Sir, it is utterly impossible that their confidence in this stock shall not be shaken. Many of its holders are foreigners, remote from your debates and your reasonings. They will look at the naked fact, and what their inferences will be, it is not possible to doubt. True, it may be, and I know it is, desired by many, that our Stock should not be held so largely by foreigners. But how will you prevent it? The capital of the world knows no such things as nationality. Capital, in all countries, is one and the same thing. What touches any part touches the whole. You can deal no blow on capital here, on which, will not rebound from all other moneyed countries. This is unavoidable. Things are so, whether right or wrong, and you cannot change them. You are, and of necessity must be, dependent on the opinions of capitalists abroad, in all your financial operations. This is inevitable, and so far as it goes, it is mutual. No financial operation can take place in Europe, which is not felt here; but, as the capital in Europe is, beyond all proportion, greater than that of the U. States, their effect on us is so much greater than our effect on them. Need I remind any one who hears me, of the effect which was felt in every corner of this country, from the embarrassments of the Bank of England a few years ago? No, Sir. Whether you will, or whether you will not, the thermometer which regulates your credit, and which affects every department of your financial means, hangs in the Royal Exchange; there it hangs, nor can you take it down. The adoption of such a measure as is now before us, would deal a blow which would be felt by every foreign Stockholder the instant the news reached him. Nay, the very discussion of it has, I doubt not, already sunk the stock at least five per cent. The gentleman who introduced it, with a frankness which certainly does him honor, has told the House that he did not vote for this charter, and will not vote for its renewal. I believe I know enough of his opinions, (having formerly heard him avow them in this Hall) to conjecture, with some degree of certainty, what is the real ground of his desire to see such a sale as he proposes take place. I cannot but believe that he is, at bottom, influenced by his constitutional objections to any National Bank, in any form: and I therefore feel warranted in the conclusion, that the present proposition is virtually an announcement that the same battle is to be fought again which took place at the granting of the present charter, so soon as its limit shall approach a termination. I deprecate such a contest. My own views of the Constitution on this matter, are firmly settled; and I am deeply impressed with the conviction, that the Government is under peculiar obligations to guard the credit of the Bank, and of its Stock, with the most assiduous care. It is by that credit that we are enabled to go abroad, to meet the Capitalists of the old world, and to obtain the funds which the country requires, at the cheapest possible rate. To do this, is not merely good faith. Your good faith alone will not enable you to procure money on easy terms. It is the steadiness of your financial system, which as much, if not more, renders this attainable. Sudden changes in your moneyed plans, have an effect to terrify the capitalist at a distance; he doubt understand them, and all his fears are roused at once. You determined, a little while ago, to exchange your 6 per cents. for a lower stock, and as, in doing this, all the holders could not continue, you made them draw lots to determine who should have the chance of holding on. As soon as this arrangement was known, it affected your character for permanency, for steadiness; and what was the consequence? The 6 per cents. are now at par, or thereabouts, while your 3 per cents. (because you tied the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund from touching but a small part of them) stand at an advance. Here your good faith was not in question. You preserved this as much to one one class of holders as you did to the other; but the permanency of the one stock was affected, while that of the other was not; so the one fell and the other rose. The holder did not doubt your faith, but he did not choose to be paid off against his will, when he would have preferred to remain your creditor.

And, sir, you must hire money: you have a deep interest in the rate at which it can be borrowed, because you must borrow. The condition of this country is a very peculiar one. In 1805, the Secretary of the Treasury (then Mr. Crawford) affirmed, in his annual report to Congress, that the United States had been in debt from their very origin; and he said truly. From the moment the feet of our ancestors touched this soil, to this moment, we have been in debt; we live and flourish by being in debt; it was the foundation of all our prosperity as a People. And why? Because, owing to our connexion with the greatest and most powerful nations of the old world, we were enabled to borrow money there at 5 per cent. which we could immediately invest here at 10. We could do this, because the country was in a state of safety, was a new country, and stood in need of all those improvements which call for, and which richly repay, the application of capital. So long as a country has the first necessities of a nation to provide, it must ever be its interest to borrow money. Roads, canals, public buildings—all the works of incipient industry, furnish a use for it, which will always justify the country in hiring; and will more than afford a moderate interest to be paid for it.

Here the great machine by which capital is to be created is only in a state of preparation; in Europe it is already prepared. Our capital, the capital of the whole United States, with all they contain, is, when compared to them, as nothing. I venture to say that the operations of the city of London, for a single week, exceed all those of the United States for a year. It is manifest, therefore, that our relation in respect to money is a relation of dependence, and that, of course, it is our most evident duty, in a fiscal point of view, to do whatever tends to preserve our credit, and facilitate our operations as borrowers. Believing that the measure proposed by the gentleman from Virginia was calculated to have a directly opposite effect, I am decidedly and wholly opposed to it. I believe that, as a financial scheme, it will prove wholly deceptive. If you wish to pay off seven millions of your debt, there are a dozen other modes by which you can do it better. I hope, therefore, that the House will not only reject the measure, but will do so with promptness and decision.

Mr. STEWART rose not to enter into the debate generally, but merely to present one or two objections to this measure, which had not been adverted to by other gentlemen. The great object of the proposition, as avowed by the mover, was, to hasten the extinguishment of the national debt, by selling the bank stock, and thus increase the means of the Treasury to accomplish it. If gentlemen will look at the effect of the sinking fund of ten millions of dollars on the national debt, it will be obvious to every one that, instead of increasing, we shall be compelled to diminish the present sinking fund, and arrest the rapid progress we are now making, which will shortly lead to great financial embarrassments.

What is the situation of the public debt, as exhibited by the Treasury Report laid upon our tables a few days since? And what will be the effect of this proposition upon it?

On the first of next month, the whole of the national debt will be - - - $ 67,413,000
Deduct the 3 per cents. - - - 13,296,000

Leaves - - - $ 47,117,000

Which could not be redeemed when above 65—they were now at 87, and would necessarily continue to rise in the market as the other stocks were absorbed, and the capital sent abroad seeking investment.

By selling the bank stock at its present value, $8,600,000, and applying the proceeds, with the annual sinking fund of ten millions of dollars, to the national debt, it will be found that, at the end of the year 1830, there will remain less than $2,600,000 of the public debt redeemable; consequently, there must remain idle in the Treasury, of the sinking fund,

In the year 1831,	a surplus of	$ 7,400,000
1832,	" "	5,061,000
1833,	" "	11,896,600
1834,	" "	18,931,000
1835,	" "	23,561,000

These large balances of the sinking fund will annually accumulate in the Treasury, there being no portion of either principal or interest of the debt to which they can possibly be applied. These sums must then remain idle and useless in the Treasury, unless, indeed, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BARNUM] will consent, as I am quite sure he will not, to apply them to the work of internal improvement—to the construction of roads and canals.

The gentleman [Mr. BARNUM] suggests, in an under tone, said Mr. S., the reduction of the sinking fund. This will be necessary whether the motion of the gentleman be adopted or not.

Excluding the Bank stock and the three per cents, it would be found that, by the operation of the present sinking fund, there would, at the end of the year 1830, be only $4,356,000 of the national debt redeemable; consequently, there would be—

In the year 1831,	a surplus of	$ 5,644,000
1832,	" "	3,304,000
1833,	" "	10,138,000
1834,	" "	17,173,000
1835,	" "	21,822,000

When the last portion of the debt will be paid off, and this vast balance of the sinking fund will be left on hand.

Such will be the result of the operations of the existing sinking fund, even should the proposition be rejected. These large accumulations of money in the Treasury must occur—it is unavoidable, unless you reduce the sinking fund to $7,000,000. He had made a calculation, by which it appeared that the whole of the public debt (the Bank stock and three per cents. excepted) would be completely extinguished in 1835, when the last portion of the debt became redeemable, by a sinking fund of $7,000,000, and leave a surplus at the end of that time of $185,000; in 1836 seven millions of the Bank stock could be paid off if deemed expedient.

By thus reducing the sinking fund to $7,000,000, $3,000,000 would be annually released from the public debt, which could be applied to a system of internal improvement, producing the most happy effect upon the national prosperity. It would not postpone the final payment of the debt, but only throw forward the surplus of the redeemable debt in 1828 and '29 upon the years 1831, '33, and '34, when very small portions of the debt would be redeemable; and thus the whole of the sinking fund would be kept actively and profitably employed until the final extinction of the debt in 1835. Hence, Mr. S. contended, whether the proposition be adopted or not, it was the dictate of a sound and enlightened policy to reduce the present sinking fund from $10,000,000 to $7,000,000.

But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] suggests to me the reduction of the duties. To this Mr. S. said he could not assent; the duties were imposed for purposes of protection, and not for revenue: they were imposed to protect our national industry—to protect domestic manufactures from the ruinous effect of foreign competition. He could not, therefore, consent to their repeal. He would collect the revenue for one important object—the protection of our manufactures—and send it back to the People who paid it, for another equally important object, the improvement of their country.

By adopting this policy, you will prevent, measurably, the exhausting and injurious effects of withdrawing annually from the pockets of the People ten millions of dollars, and putting it beyond their reach; by this means three millions of it will be returned to its ordinary channels of circulation, promoting, at the same time, the most important national purposes—the permanent improvement of the internal condition of our common country.

There were many other strong considerations in favor of the adoption of this measure, which it was unnecessary at this time to urge upon the attention of the House. Enough had been said, he trusted, to show that there was no propriety in adopting this measure to accelerate the extinguishment of the national debt, the great and principal object of the motion.

On the contrary, instead of hastening, it was evidently the policy and duty of the Government to check its too rapid march towards the final extinction of the National Debt. We are running far ahead of the National Debt, and shall, if we stop not soon, have, as appears, large sums in hand which cannot be employed. A motion, therefore, to reduce the Sinking Fund to $7,000,000, would be much more reasonable than the one now submitted, virtually to increase it. Besides, by reducing the annual Sinking Fund, we will not postpone the period of the final extinction of the national debt—but merely equalize the payments, by transferring the excess of one year to another, when little or nothing was payable: if the sinking fund were twenty millions instead of ten, the debt could not be paid before the year 1835, when the last portion became redeemable—the holders of the stock, it was well known, would not accept the payment as long as they could avoid it. It is not the public creditors, but the Representatives of the People, who are forcing them thus hastily to discharge the public debt. It appeared to him unjust that the whole weight of the debt should be thrown upon the shoulders of those who had to fight the battles and bear the burdens of the war by which this debt was created.

The strong argument urged in favor of the motion, that it would hasten the payment of the public debt, went, therefore, for nothing—it was unfounded in fact. If you had a hundred millions of dollars idle in your exchequer, you cannot pay the debt until 1835, when the last portion becomes payable, and this can be as well accomplished by a sinking fund of seven, as of seventy millions.

These were among the reasons which should induce him to vote against the propositions: he had thought it his duty to present these views of the real state of the finances, not merely in reference to the question now to be decided, but to prevent the idea from going forth to the country that we were obliged to sell our bank stock to pay our debts; that the Government was embarrassed and put to its last shifts to pay the public creditors, when, in fact, the financial concerns of the Government were never in a more prosperous condition than at the present moment. We are left free to appropriate liberally to objects of national importance, and it would be no apology to say, we cannot fulfil the public expectations because we are in debt. We are pressing our creditors, not they us. Mr. S. concluded by saying, there was no reason to sell this stock to pay the public debt, and it had been clearly shewn, by other gentlemen, that, in every other point of view, it was impolitic—he therefore hoped that this subject, and the public mind, would be put at rest, by a prompt and emphatic rejection of the proposition.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, said, that he had not risen to debate the question at all: for he believed that whatever other opinions might be held as to the resolution, all must unite with him in thinking that it was not at all well-timed. I was in hopes, said Mr. R. that we should meet, despatch the necessary public business, and return to our respective homes, for once, as early this year, as the Constitution will oblige us to go home the next. My object in rising, is to move, (and I hope my worthy colleague will excuse me) that the resolution lie on the table, with the view of not taking it up again at the present session. Mr. R. then moved to lay the resolution on the table.

On this motion, Mr. TAYLOR, of New-York, asked for the yeas and yeas, and they were ordered by the House.

The question was then put on ordering the resolution to lie on the table, and decided in the negative.

Mr. FORT said that there was no gentleman who had a greater desire than he had, that the time of the House should not be unnecessarily consumed, and that this question should receive a prompt decision. He could not however agree with the gentleman from Va. who had just taken his seat, that the resolution was ill-timed; he thought it well-timed—yet it was a question which ought to be settled as speedily as possible. He believed the general sense of the House was against the proposition. Nevertheless, the discussion of it was not useless or improper, as the nation would look to the debates of this House, as to a proper source from whence to derive information on the subject. He rose with a view to advocate the resolution, but in doing so, he felt great difficulty and great embarrassment, as he must follow the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who had given to the subject the investigation of a master, and had presented his view of it in so ingenious and eloquent a manner. He thought the argument of that gentleman had not yet been refuted; he had rested his calculations on a mathematical basis, but they had not yet been met: those who had attempted to meet them had not drawn their topics of argument from the deductions of arithmetic, that sure, unerring guide, which never deceives those who rely upon it, nor leads to a false conclusion. The gentleman, said Mr. F. has given a comprehensive view of the whole subject—he has treated it with the skill of a master, and who shall venture to follow him? The subject was confessedly one of great obscurity: it has puzzled the wise, and the fool need not be ashamed to confess his ignorance of it. Yet he thought it might be still farther simplified. What was the nature of this institution? when was it chartered? and for what purpose? and what was the condition of the national currency when it first went into operation? The currency was in a broken and confused situation—the various kinds of paper were made payable at short distances of time, and credit was very generally impaired. To remedy this state of things, and to aid the Government in its financial operations, a National Bank was created, with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars. This amount was thought to be very large, and fears were entertained that so much stock would never find purchasers at its par value. Those who felt these apprehensions reasoned from principles which had been now so ably laid down in relation to the proportion between demand and supply. To aid in the disposal of this stock, the Government took it to the amount of seven millions, and received from the Bank a bonus of $1,500,000. (On this subject some dispute had arisen, but it had finally been decided that the Bank had a right to give this sum.) What was the result of the experiment? Twenty eight millions of the Stock was thrown into the market in one day. Was there any difficulty in finding purchasers? Did the Stock sell? It was a time of great pecuniary distress: did this prevent the sale? The whole amount was bought up almost as soon as it was offered in market. What a comment did this fact furnish on the present fears of gentlemen! When it is proposed to sell, we are told the market will be glutted, and down goes the Stock. Nay, as soon as the proposal is heard of, down will go the Stock. But can you, at this time, glut a market with seven millions, which, so long ago, took twenty-eight millions without the least difficulty? We are told that the value of stock is a moral consideration—that its value depends much on whether the charter is to continue; and that, if this is not likely to be the case, it will be of the less value, because there is a difficulty in closing the concerns of the Bank. But if the holders of Stock are under an erroneous impression as to the probability of the charter's being renewed, the sooner they are undeceived, the better. Is it not due to them at once to say, that Government is under no obligation to renew it? Certainly. When the period for its renewal comes, those who shall occupy seats in this House will judge of the propriety of renewing; not from any obligation they are supposed to lie under to renew it, but from considerations drawn from their views of the good of the nation. The gentleman from Massachusetts has told us, that, before the old Bank expired, its Stock rose to 140 per cent. by the mismanagement of the institution. If this be so, what security have we, that the bubble will not again burst? What certainly have we, that the present advance of 23½ per cent, is not also the consequence of some mismanagement? Who are the dealers in Stock? and why does Stocks rise and fall, so that by their fluctuations whole fortunes are often swept away? The reason is plain: There are a few persons who know the causes of the changes in price, while the great mass of the holders know nothing at all of the matter, and are left to the mere mercy of events. But, if the Bank is really so situated that the nation can know nothing of its concerns, the sooner we get rid of it, the better. The nation is a mere Stockholder in the Bank. It has, as such, all the rights of any other Stockholder. And may sell out its interest whenever it may think it most expedient to do so. But, what right have we to suppose that the holders of the Stock do not themselves know its true value? The selling off of our portion of the Stock can have, if any, but a very trivial effect. Our selling out of our Stock cannot justly be interpreted as a proof that the Government have withdrawn their protection from the Bank; there is no gentleman here who thinks of touching the charter during the period it has to run—and the buyer of the Stock knows this. He goes into the market with his wits about him. Do gentlemen suppose that the buyer of this Stock is in ignorance of what is transacted here? And why do they suppose he will fear to purchase; if, while 7 millions of the Public Stock is taken out of it, by paying so much of the Public Debt, the same amount is thrown into it by the sale of our Bank Stock? Surely, by such a transaction, the market will virtually be left as it is at present. I am willing to allow that the Stockholders purchased with the understanding that the Government would continue to hold its Stock in the Bank. It certainly was not to be anticipated that the Government would sell out during the present year. But the question of its value is a matter of very simple calculation. According to the security of payment, and the rate of interest paid, so will be the price of the Stock in market. Our citizens are not going to be deceived. We have thrown enough into the market to test its value, and that value is well ascertained.

I have, however, no desire longer to consume the time of the House, nor should I have said what I now have, had I conceived that the same view of the subject had been given by others.

Mr. HAMILTON said that, after the discussion which the subject had received, and all that had been said, and so well said, he should not have been disposed to protract, in any degree, a debate, out of which little practical usefulness was likely to arise, if some observations, looking to ulterior consequences of no small moment, had not fallen from some of the gentlemen who had entered into the discussion, which he thought did not belong either to the crisis or to the subject itself. He should, otherwise, have contented himself with a silent vote in the negative, however highly he respected the motives of the mover of the proposition, and have rested the vindication of the vote he was about to give on the unanswerable argument which his colleagues and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. GONNIM) had presented of this subject.

But gentlemen had not stopped where this question properly ended; the course which they had taken in their argument, had seemed almost to imply, that the decision of the present question had, if not a direct, at least a remote connexion with a larger and more important inquiry in relation to the policy of a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States. Now, for one, he wished this kept entirely out of view; and he protested, in limine, against either the discussion or vote of the House on the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia being considered as an indication of the feelings, much less a commitment of the opinion of this body, to which no such question even indirectly belongs, and which the best interests of the country requires should be an open question, to be decided by those who are to come after us, with a knowledge amplified and corrected by the experience of eight years to come. He was aware that it would be a large, he might almost say a momentous question, perhaps in a period of peace the most so of any which was likely to agitate this Confederacy for the next quarter of a century. He was aware that this gigantic institution, the Bank of the United States, would be brought to a strict account; that it would be inquired how it had discharged the high purposes for which it was created; whether it had, indeed, given us a uniform currency, copious and healthful; whether it had equalized the exchange of the country, and had applied, at the periods it was most wanted, a remedy to one of the severest evils that can befall a community at all advanced in civilization and the arts—a decreasing circulating medium. These were questions, he, for one, was willing to leave with those who would be called upon to decide them, as well as the vast and complicated relations, constitutional and political, which belonged to the whole topic.

It was true that his colleague (Mr. McDuffris) had expressed his satisfaction that the gentleman from Virginia should have indicated his belief that the charter of the Bank of the United States would be renewed. He, Mr. H., would not say that such a sentiment was not founded on enlarged considerations of national policy, but he would undertake to say this, that, without public sentiment in the State from which they both came, underwent some change, before this question came up for consideration, if he and his colleague entertained such opinions then, he rather thought their constituents would be apt to depute some other agents than themselves, to represent their sentiments on this subject, however highly and justly the constituents of his friend and colleague appreciated his (Mr. McDuffris's) public services. The truth was not to be concealed, that in all those States in which the income of the Government vastly exceeds its local expenditures, the operation of the Bank of the United States is felt with more or less severity and inconvenience; on the other hand, in those States where the Government spends locally a greater part of what it collects, the operation of this institution is not only comparatively innocent, but beneficial. South Carolina happens, unfortunately, to be in the former predicament, out of that very condition of things which he had indicated, and, although the Bank of the U. States was a mere instrument, it was very natural for those who were writhing under the exhaustion, to find fault with the organ of suction itself, and in the agony arising from taking the medicament, not to be entirely satisfied with its sanative influence.

There was another point in this discussion against which he would enter his protest, and that was the influences that were employed from abroad, for begetting an extraordinary sensitiveness in this House that any allusion to the Bank of the United States, and the connexion of the Government with it, was a most serious derangement of the financial condition of the country. Some gentleman seemed to think this subject was only to be touched by the practised hand of a fundholder; that a man of plain sense and common honesty was not to approach it; and above all, it was eminently mischievous for the Representatives of the People to entertain such a discussion, or inquire into our interest in this co-partnership, forsooth, because the speculations on 'Change might be suspended for a day or two, and some over-grown stock jobber realize two or three per cent. less than he otherwise would. He knew well that a plethoric fundholder was one of the most sensitive mortals upon the face of the earth; that he considered the barometer of 'Change Alley, of almost as much value as the scriptures; and a fall in the price of stock nearly as severe a calamity as the entire loss of the sacred writings. Cobbett has humorously told us, that nobody can touch a ruffle in the brocade of the Old Lady in Threadneedle Street, as he calls the Bank of England, without giving her a fit of hysterics and setting the whole country in commotion. We seem to be coming to the same state of things. But this is not all: my friend from Virginia cannot introduce a matter involving a mere financial question of profit and loss, without being charged with a party plot of the worst omens.

Now, sir, although this gentleman has quite wit enough to contrive, and quite firmness enough to carry into effect, a tolerable conspiracy on all proper occasions, he has too much honesty to be engaged in any that are not in harmony with the purity and integrity of his whole life; and quite too much wisdom to undertake a conspiracy, without previously providing conspirators, which he seems to have overlooked in this matter; yet, depend upon it, that many an old fundholder, roasting his feet before the fire, will tremble in his flannel for his plum, and no doubt exclaim—there, you see how it is the moment these Jackson men have got possession of the House; away goes the bank of the United States "sky-high," and we shall next see the "military chieftain," after his election, making his way, sword in hand, into the vaults of the Bank, and seizing its coffers as his especial portion of the booty after the strife and victory. Be quiet, gentlemen. Be assured we do not mean to run our heads against the Bank of the United States—and this our vote will show.

But, sir, to be serious, I am far from thinking that it is an evil to those who permanently invest in the stock of the United States Bank, to know that the policy of that Institution may sometimes be discussed here, however prejudicial it may be to the interests of those who speculate in its scrip.

If our silence at any time when we ought to speak gives an artificial appreciation to this stock, it is the widow and the orphan, and those who are the victims of their own ignorance and the knavery of others, who suffer, and who will be sure to suffer, if any false deductions are made from the sentiments which the House is about to pronounce on the single proposition before them.

That I am opposed to the resolution of the gentleman, I need scarcely repeat, and for reasons which are at once connected with considerations that carry with them somewhat the force of a moral obligation; reasons which were stated with unanswerable force by my colleague, [Mr. DAYTON] which may be comprehended in a single sentence, to wit: that it entered into the consideration of the 1,500,000 dollars which the Bank paid the United States as bonus, that this co-partnership should continue during the duration of the charter.

Besides, on the ground of expediency, I am satisfied that the sale of that portion of stock which the Government holds, would be attended with a loss, not equivalent to the amount conjectured, but quite sufficient to render it an unthrifty operation. Not, indeed, that seven millions of stock of the Bank might not change hands in the course of the year, without a material depreciation; that is to say, through the transactions of private sellers; but the very moment the Government becomes a seller in the market, it would be taken not alone as a conclusive proof that the charter was not to be renewed, but the impression would be created that even the facilities which the Government gives this institution, in its various transactions, were in jeopardy, the very moment our co-partnership was at an end; from which would follow a ruinous depreciation of its stock.

I say, then, let this institution go on unembarrassed by either our fears or prejudices; let it enjoy all those advantages for which it has honestly and faithfully paid a full equivalent. And whilst we are provident of the present, let us be uncommitted as to the future.

Mr. WEEMS said, he had yesterday opposed the motion for adjournment from his anxiety to see the question disposed of, and had not intended to say a word in the debate; but since it had been discussed to day, it had presented itself to his mind in a double aspect. One of these views had been, in a great measure, anticipated, by the gentleman from South Carolina, who had just taken his seat; he would therefore curtail what he had intended to say on that head. He joined heartily in the protest against any pledge being derived from the decision of the present question, as to what this House would do when the question of renewal of the Bank charter should come before it. He held that the House would be under no obligation derived from this source, but perfectly free and unfettered as to granting or refusing. He was opposed to the resolution; not, however, because he held the sale of Stock to be any violation of a contract with the Bank. The contract of Government with the Bank contained two specific obligations; first, that the Government shall supervise the manner in which its affairs are conducted. This stipulation was separate and independent; it was introduced because the United States were to make all its deposits in this Bank. But a second stipulation was, that the Government should have a share in the direction, as it continued bound to superintend also the liberties and interests of the American People. Should a mammoth institution like this be left without any special guardianship or control, it might possibly become an instrument in the hands of some ambitious aspirant to put a crown upon his head and ruin the freedom and happiness of this People. The next stipulation was, that the United States should hold one fifth part of the stock of the Bank. As a stockholder, however, she has clearly a right to sell out whenever she shall deem it expedient for her fixed interest to do so. We are told in the volume of truth, "all things are lawful to me, but all things are not expedient." The sale was lawful, but he was opposed to it as not being expedient—and of this he did not despair to convince the gentleman from Virginia from the arguments he had himself employed. That gentleman had shewn that the price of the stock depends upon the abundance of the means to purchase it, and the difficulty of other investment, and had correctly insisted that if, while United States stock is diminished by redemption of the Public Debt, the means of other investments are supplied by throwing so much Bank stock into market, no great difference in the state of the market was justly to be apprehended. There might perhaps be a temporary depression in the price of this stock, but it would be only temporary and transient; so much of the gentleman's argument he entirely agreed. Another point of the argument was, that, in proportion as the Public Debt was paid off, the opportunities of investment enjoyed by the public creditors, ought to be increased. This also was true as a general position. But were they not abundant, and daily increasing? This was a moment of vast speculation in undertakings of all sorts. The stocks in market were almost innumerable: Manufacturing associations, canal companies, road companies, &c. &c., were all competitors for the loose and floating capital of the nation. This was, therefore, a most unpropitious moment at which to offer our stock for sale. The modes of investment were already possessed—and, according to the gentleman's own doctrine, in relation to demand and supply, the stock could not be expected now to hold its price. But should Government wait till these several stocks were in a good degree taken up, the United States' Bank Stock might be offered with much better prospects of a profitable sale. Instead of 23 per cent., it might then bring 50, and even 60 per cent. advance.

This view of the subject was, he thought, sufficient to show that it would be bad policy to adopt the resolution. He had ever been a friend to the Bank, but he did not, nevertheless, believe that Government were at all bound to hold the stock any longer than it might be for its pecuniary advantage.

Mr. S. WOOD, of New York, next addressed the House in opposition to the measure. After recapitulating the fiscal calculations on which the mover placed the expediency of the sale, Mr. W. proceeded to show that the supposed gain of 1,600,000 dollars would not be realised. The gentleman had stated only the credit side of the account, and seemed to forget that, by selling out our 7 millions, we parted with a capital which would continue to yield an annual interest of 70,000 dollars. Here Mr. W. went into a long calculation, the result of which was understood to be, that, allowing the stock to retain its price at 23 per cent. advance, the United States would gain by the sale only 453,000 dollars, instead of 1,600,000 dollars.

He then proceeded to consider the probability of the stock's retaining its price, and contended, that such a supposition was disproved by the gentleman's own principles. He said, that the stock derived its value principally from the permanency and security which belonged to it. The 3 per cents. were high, because they had long to run, but the United States' Bank stock, instead of being secure for even eight years, might be redeemed to-morrow. He denied that the price of this stock presented any strong temptation to capitalists. It was worth, by the gentleman's own shewing, but about 4½ per cent. but there were steamboat and canal stocks in abundance, almost any of which offered a more inviting prospect. But, besides this competition for investment, the gentleman had not warranted his wares; he had also prudently shielded himself from any liability to which he might have been subjected, by a concealment of their defects; he had put the purchasers on their guard against ascribing too much value to the stock, from a hope of the extension of the time of redemption, by apprising them of his hostility to the renewal of the bank charter; that this was honest and honorable, although not calculated to enhance the price of the article. Many other stocks, while they yielded a larger dividend, promised a much better prospect of permanency.

Mr. W. next dwelt on the probability of the price being purposely depressed by the combination of money dealers, and went into a series of statements, going to shew the prospects of profit under various supposable degrees of depression. He concluded this calculation and the arguments connected with it, by shewing a strong probability of loss, instead of gain, by the operation of selling.

He then went into some observations of a more general character. The first had reference to the probability of the charter being renewed. He regretted this topic had been introduced at all; it was calculated to affect the national credit, than which nothing was more delicate or more easily injured. He adverted to a saying of Mr. Crawford, that there never had been an instance, in which a legislative body attempted, by legislation, to regulate the national currency, in which they had not completely failed. In this matter, mere theory was ineffectual and deceptive; experience alone could be relied on.

He then drew a striking picture of the gloomy state of the public resources during the late war, and the contrast produced in two years by the operation of the National Bank, during which time the amount of paper currency had fallen from one hundred and ten millions to fifty three millions. He enlarged on the salutary influence of this institution, in regulating the issues of the local banks, and yet in treating them with all reasonable indulgence. It was not, he insisted, in the power of this Bank to be oppressive in its operations; the Government had a complete and constant control over all its proceedings, and could, in a moment, correct any abuse, should it ever be attempted. He paid a merited compliment to the gentleman who presides over the exchequer, (Mr. McDUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means,) for the honorable sentiments he had expressed in relation to the introduction of party bitterness into such a discussion as this. Such sentiments were worthy of the station he occupied, and added, that he should as soon have expected that a reversioner, who had obtained possession of the estate before the expiration of the term of the tenant for years, would commit waste, as that that honorable gentleman would lay violent hands on any of our national establishments. He gave the mover of the resolution. (Mr. BARBOUR,) full credit for the purity of his motives, but proposed other modes, which he thought preferable for accomplishing the object he professed to have in view; and went into a calculation to shew the rates of profit which might be made by the issue of a new stock, supposing it to bear 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. interest. He concluded by expressing his hope that the resolution would be rejected.

"The Question" was now loudly demanded from all sides of the House; when

Mr. BARBOUR rose to make some concluding remarks in reply. He was not, he said, in the habit of intruding himself upon the attention of the House, after hearing a general call for the question, such as had just been made; but he would, on this occasion, ask leave to offer one or two observations, and to present some accurate calculations, by aid of which the views of the gentlemen who had opposed the resolution might be traced to their actual results. As to the great alarm which seemed to prevail, in regard to the depression in the price of the stock, it might at once be obviated by introducing in the bill which provided for the sale a limitation of the price at which it should be effected: a minimum, which would effectually guard against any depression below that point.

[Mr. B. then went into a calculation, the object of which was to obviate the positions taken, with a view to shew that no profit would result from the sale. But as we should do injustice to his statement, by giving it in an inaccurate or partial manner, and as it is next to impossible to give a perfect report of arithmetical statements from the ear alone, we must omit this part of his remarks.]

As to the general principles which had been advanced on the other side, he would not detain the House save by a single remark; and that was, that if he could for one moment believe, that, by introducing the present measure, he was in the remotest manner touching the pledged faith of the Nation, the resolution would have fallen still-born from his hand. That faith which holds together the moral as well as the political world, he would never violate. Complaints had also been made, that, by effecting such a sale, the Government would treat the Bank unjustly. This, also, was what he would never be guilty of; but was this complaint well founded? Gentlemen spoke of the great advantages conferred by the Bank on the Government, and speak as though we were under obligations of gratitude to that Institution. Obligations of gratitude! And are we, as stockholders, to be bound on this consideration? The benefits have at least been fully reciprocated. Nay, the deposits alone of the immense funds of the nation were an abundant compensation. We place in the hands of this institution an annual amount of twenty millions of dollars. Now, it was perfectly well known to all persons conversant in banking operations, that cash in the vaults of a bank forms almost as efficient a fund on which to proceed, as the stock itself. It is true this amount is liable to be called for by its owners at any moment: but it generally happened that, while sums were drawn out by some, they were deposited by others, and that one so nearly balanced the other, that the specie in the vaults had very truly been said to change its owners much more frequently than its place. The Government, too, can borrow money at five and four and a half per centum, and might even get it at four per centum. The Bank had secured by its charter the important privilege of receiving six per cent. interest on all the notes discounted by it, which privilege was secured for twenty years.

And though the rate of stock may be diminished by the mismanagement of the institution, that is not to be charged to the Government, and does not enter into the consideration of gratitude. Besides, this Bank is a kind of monopoly of the advantages derived from Government: for the Government is bound to charter no other Bank within the United States, unless in the District of Columbia. Mr. B. concluded, with declaring that though he would never be the conscious instrument of violating in any manner the faith of the Government, he did not think that the Bank could make any just complaint so long as it continues to get more than an equivalent for all the advantages ever derived from its institution.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, by Yeas and Nays, as follows:

Old Sedition Law.—Revolutionary Land Warrants.

[Dec. 24, 27, 1827.]

So the resolution was REJECTED.
The House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, DEC. 24 1827.

OLD SEDITION LAW.

Mr. HAMILTON submitted the following:

Whereas a law was passed by the Congress of the United States, approved on the 14th July, 1798, entitled "An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;" which said act is commonly known by the name of the Sedition law.

Be it resolved, That the said law was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, by "abridging the freedom of the press."

Be it further resolved, That, as several persons were indicted, convicted, and suffered in pecuniary penalties under this law, that the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to report a bill which shall make full provision for refunding to the said persons the amount, with lawful interest, of the fines which they may have paid to the respective Marshals of the District Courts empowered to levy and receive the same. And in case of the death or the absence from the United States, of any of the said parties, then to their legal representatives, or such person or persons as may be duly authorized to receive the same.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of asking the House to consider, at the present moment, the resolutions which he had just had the honor of submitting. His object was rather to indicate the time at which he should ask such a consideration: for he was aware that the resolutions covered too much ground, and involved too many delicate considerations, both of principle and expediency, to be precipitately discussed.

He hoped that, as an act of justice which he owed to himself, he might be permitted to avow, that, in moving in this matter, he was influenced by no desire to make the past subservient to any purpose of contemporary excitement. The resolution were introduced because he believed that the parties who had suffered in pecuniary penalties under the Sedition Law, were just as much entitled to have the fines which they had paid refunded to them, as an ordinary suitor in a Court of Justice was to have a sum of money refunded to him which he had paid, either through fraud or mistake, and, in his humble opinion, the only effectual mode of offering a fit atonement for the violation inflicted on the Constitution, by the passage of the Sedition Law, was to make full indemnity to those who had suffered by its enforcement.

The question was one purely of abstract justice and constitutional law, and, as such, he desired to present it. He challenged the fullest discussion and freest opposition, and had no hesitation in declaring that, if, in the light which the debate was calculated to elicit, he should be convinced that he was sustaining, on principle, an untenable position, he would be the first to relieve the House of all further trouble in regard to the resolutions, by moving to withdraw them. But, believing precisely the reverse, all he asked was an equal frankness on all sides of the House, that the question might be met, not blinked or shunned, and finally, openly, and manfully, set at rest forever.

He would, therefore, for the present, move that the resolutions be printed, and lie on the table, and would further give notice that, on the second Monday of January next, he would respectfully ask of the House their consideration.

The resolves were ordered to lie on the table accordingly.

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, DEC. 27, 1827.

REVOLUTIONARY LAND WARRANTS.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. MINER, on Monday last, was taken up and read.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the number of Military Land Warrants due to officers and Soldiers of the Revolutionary War, which remain in his office uncalled for, designating the number of warrants and quantity of land due to the line of each State, respectively. And that he also state what number of such warrants have issued from the War Department within the last five years."

Mr. CONDUCT suggested a doubt of the prudence of such a measure as the resolution proposed. If the information sought for was to be published, the interests of those whom the gentleman wished to benefit would be exposed to injury, and a scene of speculation take place such as every one would deprecate.

Mr. MINER observed, that the names of persons entitled to Military Bounty Lands were not asked for by the resolution, and would not, of course, be given. The information sought was, the number of warrants due to each Line on the Continental Establishment, and the number of warrants issued during the last five years. At the last session, Mr. M. said, he had taken occasion to draw the attention of the House to this subject; and on his motion a resolution was adopted, authorizing a committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for soldiers to apply for their warrants. A bill was reported, and a law passed for that purpose. At that time he learned and stated the extraordinary fact, that there were no less than six hundred land warrants due to the Pennsylvania line alone. The presumption was a fair one, that there was a proportionate number due to the line of every other State, existing at the Revolution; in the aggregate making some thousands of warrants, embracing some of the first lands in Ohio. In this point of view, it would be seen to be a matter of considerable importance. My purpose, said Mr. M. in asking information in this precise form, was to attract the attention, and awaken the interest of many members, to the subject. Each gentleman, from the old thirteen States, seeing the number of warrants still due to his own State, would, of course, feel a more lively interest in the matter, than he would do to learn, merely, the aggregate number of warrants due to the whole army. As it regarded Pennsylvania, he felt a deep interest in the subject; six hundred military land warrants, distributed among her old soldiers, or their representatives, would carry comfort to many a cottage. It was their due. It was the price of their toil and blood, and ought not, in his opinion, to be withheld from them longer. No private individual would feel justified, if he had title papers, or property of another in his possession, of which that other person was ignorant, in remaining silent, and keeping possession, because the owner did not ask for that which, though his own, he was ignorant of. No, sir, an honest man would take pains to inform the rightful owner—to bring home to him a knowledge of his rights. Mr. M. thought it our duty to do so. It could be rationally accounted for, that such a large number of land warrants remained due, only on the supposition that the persons owning them, were ignorant of their just claims: near half a century had passed away; the soldiers living were old and poor; it was time knowledge, and thereby justice, should be brought home to them. That it was ignorance of their rights prevented application for their warrants, was partially proved by a fact which had been stated to him. A gentleman in Maryland, highly respectable and intelligent, did not obtain a warrant due him, ever since the Revolution, until within three or four years, accident having brought to him a knowledge of his right. If intelligent men were ignorant, the poor and unlettered soldier might be presumed also to be uninformed of his just claims. Should this resolution pass, said Mr. M., and the information sought be obtained, it was my intention to propose another measure, that is, to give information in every State of the names of persons entitled to land warrants. But heretofore the War Department had, and very wisely, kept such information to itself, lest speculators should purchase up the soldier's rights for a mere trifle, and obtain all the benefits themselves. If information should be publicly given, this must be effectually guarded against. To provide such safeguard, at the same time that information, without which the soldiers could never obtain their rights, was a part of his plan. He would provide by law that no transfer should be valid for five years, nor then, unless approved by the Governor of the State where made, as the guardian of the soldiers' rights. With such provision, he thought the name of every person entitled to a warrant might safely be made public. But this was matter for future consideration. No such publication was now contemplated—no such information was now asked for. The information sought by the resolution could neither benefit the speculator, nor injure the soldier. It would be general, and of a character he thought useful and proper.

Mr. MCCOY opposed the resolution, as likely to be productive of more harm than good. Should the Secretary of War publish the names of these warrantees, it would lead to something worse than speculation: it would produce fraud and forgery. He could not see the use of calling for such a list. It may be inspected by any member at pleasure, on the books of the Department. Let gentlemen examine it there, and if they found the names of any of their own constituents, they would convey the information to them in a private manner, and thus avoid the dangers which would necessarily attend a publication of the names to all the world.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, presuming the gentleman who moved the resolution was not aware that a similar call had been made a few sessions ago, called his attention to that fact; and, referring him to the documents then received from the Department, moved that the resolution lie on the table, at least till the gentleman could have an opportunity of examining them.

The motion prevailed, and the resolution was laid on the table accordingly.

PROTECTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

On motion of Mr. MARTINDALE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Buildings be instructed to inquire and report to this House, whether, any, and, if any, what provision it is expedient to make by law, to place the public buildings and paved walks, constructed at the National expense, under the supervision and protection of the permanent police of the city; or whether it be necessary and expedient to create a separate and distinct authority, whose duty it shall be specially to watch over the National property in this city, and to maintain the buildings and pavements in a state of constant preservation and repair, and in a condition suited to the purposes of their original construction; or whether these duties have already been devolved upon any agents of the Government, and how they have been performed.

In supporting this resolution, the mover said, that it could not have escaped the observation of every gentleman who was in the habit of walking on the Pennsylvania Avenue, that the intention of erecting and paving the side walks of that Avenue, and of various parts of the public ground, was almost, if not wholly defeated. In saying this, it was not his intention to cast censure on any individual, or on any public body, (for he did not know himself, under whose charge these works are executed,) but merely to bring the fact, as it existed, to the notice of the House. It was a fact, that liquid mud, to a considerable depth, covered many parts of these pavements: by which, the very end for which so large an expense had been incurred, was lost. It must, he said, have struck the feelings of all those gentlemen who had visited the other cities of the Union, when they passed, from the neatness, cleanliness, and comfort, exhibited in the state of their streets, to the public Avenues of a City, placed by the Constitution under the immediate care and inspection of the Government. In these cities, the walks were kept in a state of decency, and comparative neatness, by some process of cleansing—and it was certainly very desirable that a similar system should be introduced here. With this view, he had introduced the resolution just read.

The resolution was agreed to.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1827.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

Mr. MALLARY, Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, rose in his place, and said, that, by direction of that Committee, he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be vested with the power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. McDUFFIE made some inquiry as to the object of this motion, when

Mr. MALLARY observed, that, in submitting the resolution, he had discharged a duty which he owed to the committee. He must now discharge another, which he owed to himself, in declaring that the resolution was not one which expressed his own views on the subject. He had opposed it in the committee, and should be equally opposed to its adoption by the House.

Mr. STRONG said, that the resolution struck him as of a very extraordinary character. His impression, with regard to it, might be erroneous; but it presented itself to his mind in such a point of view that he thought the House had a right to expect that some member of the Committee would at least state the reasons of asking a power so great and so unusual. He presumed there must be the most urgent reasons to have induced the Committee to request of this House authority to bring any citizens of the United States before them whom they might choose to send for, and compel them to give answers to every inquiry which should be addressed to them. If such reasons did exist, he hoped they would be stated.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked that the resolution might be again read, and it was read accordingly.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said he agreed with the gentleman from New York (Mr. STROWE) that the resolution proposed by a majority of the Committee of Manufactures, was one of extraordinary character, and required serious consideration. He was not aware that a demand for the like powers had ever been made in Congress by a Committee whose duties were similar to that of the Committee on Manufactures, since the organization of the Government. Propositions for a grant of power to a committee to send for persons and papers, had, he thought, hitherto been confined to committees exercising the judicial power of the House; others might have been introduced, but, if so, they had escaped his observation. He wished to vote on the question understandingly, and was desirous of hearing from the majority of the committee the reasons which, in their opinion, rendered the proposition necessary, and what object was to be attained. The Chairman had avowed his opinion that it was unnecessary, and his determination to vote against it. The gentleman from New York (Mr. STROWE) had called for information from the majority of the committee, but no response had been given to the call. He (Mr. W.) seconded the call of the gentleman, and would unite with him in the effort to obtain a response. He could not vote for any proposition of so novel a character without being satisfied of its reasonableness and expediency. Sir, said Mr. W. what object is to be gained by conferring the power sought by the committee? Does the committee want information? If so, on what particular subject connected with its duties? If the House is informed of the specific subject, probably some gentleman on the floor may supply it, or refer to some document where it can be had. Is it desired to ascertain if it be expedient to encourage the manufacturing industry of the country, if in our power? On that subject, the committee are not, surely, destitute of information. Is the information sought connected with the propriety of protecting any given article manufactured in the country? What article is it? The House, before it grants the extraordinary power asked for, has a right to know. It is no new thing to enact tariffs, either for the purpose of revenue, or of affording protection to our own manufactures. Questions of that kind had been agitated in the country, from the time of the adoption of the present Constitution, and many of the most important articles, now sought to be protected, agitated the last Congress and the preceding one, and had attracted the attention and investigation of the whole community—had elicited much light. Shall we now be told, said Mr. W., we have no information on these important subjects? The facts disclosed throughout the country on these subjects, were numerous and important, and, he should suppose, sufficient to enlighten the Committee on Manufactures. He would again ask for the reasons, on which the proposition was predicated, and until he heard some satisfactory reason, he could not consent to vote to confer so extraordinary a power.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, said, as one of the Committee of Manufactures who voted with those who, in committee, proposed the resolution before the House, he would, in reply to the call that had been made by several gentlemen on the committee for their reasons for recommending this resolution, assign the general considerations that induced its adoption.

The memorials on the subject of a reform of the tariff of 1824, which have been referred to the committee, are in many instances opposed to each other, and contradictory as regards facts. Assertions are made and contradicted, but data not furnished on which the committee can decide. From Boston a memorial, signed by 1546 persons, many of whom are alleged to be manufacturers, assert that the duties on woollens are sufficient, and that the establishments are flourishing. Others complain of the languishing condition of these manufactures. Information is desired on this and one or two other subjects, so as to establish the facts as to the necessity of protection, such as shall not merely satisfy the committee, but the House. We are also desirous to ascertain the extent of protection necessary, and the best mode or manner of ensuring the protection required. Our information is not as satisfactory as it might be rendered by investing the committee with the power which would be derived from the passage of the resolution. The committee wish authenticated information, in order to do justice to the manufacturer and to give him due protection with justice to other interests. The committee feel no solicitude as to the passage of the resolution. They are willing to act with what light they have, if the House requires it. They point to the means by which they can obtain further, and, as applies to one or two subjects, more accurate information than they can now command. Should the House not grant the power requested, we shall cheerfully agree to their being responsible who refuse. The committee have no feelings other than a desire to faithfully discharge their duty. But they deem it proper to obtain information in the manner pointed out, unless declared otherwise by the expressed opinion of the House. The committee submit the proposition, and devolve upon the House the responsibility of declining to authorize the committee to obtain information in the manner proposed. Should the House refuse, the committee will be exonerated from any errors into which they may fall by want of attested facts.

Mr. STEWART, of Pa. rose, not for the purpose of discussing the resolution in its present form, but of proposing an amendment, which he would offer after a few remarks. The course pursued by the Committee was, he contended, novel and unprecedented, and one which, whatever might be the motives of those who had introduced it, would have in practice the effect to postpone indefinitely any measure for the protection of manufactures. It would not only put that measure off for the present session, but for the next also: as that would be the short session, and there would be no time to consider a subject of such extent. The House was now advanced nearly a month in its present session, and now, at the end of a whole month, the Committee of Manufactures come forward with a request, that, in order to enlighten their judgment, they may have power to send into all parts of the United States, and bring up the citizens of the country to testify before them. We are to send our Sergeant-at-Arms, (said Mr. STEWART) to New England, to Pittsburgh, to Charleston, to New Orleans. Manufacturing merchants, and all others who may be summoned, must come forthwith at the call of the House; and if they refuse, an adequate posse must be summoned to bring them, and all this at the public expense. At the session of 1823-4, when the general tariff was enacted, the bill for that purpose was reported to the House on the 9th January—it was taken up on the 10th February following, and its discussion occupied the House until the 16th of April—it was then sent to the Senate—and was not disposed of in that body until the 19th of May. Owing to a difference of opinion in the two Houses, a Committee of Conference was appointed, and the bill did not finally pass till the 24th day of May, which was within three days of the adjournment of Congress. Thus nearly five months were occupied on that bill, though it was reported on the 9th of January. The House had been repeatedly told, since the opening of the present session, that it was expected they should go home by the 4th of March—if this expectation was to be fulfilled, what would become of a measure so loudly demanded, and on which it had been expected the committee would, by this time, have reported a bill? Any bill they might report, must necessarily share the fate of that of last Session. That bill embraced a single item only, viz. the article of wool and woollens—it was reported by the 10th of next month, and taken up on the 17th, yet it failed for want of time. If the Committee, at the present session, are to send all over the country for persons and papers before they can so much as determine what articles are to be included in the Bill, it must certainly operate as an indefinite postponement of the whole subject. It inevitably put an end to it for the present session, and the session following was too short to admit any hope of better success. Under these impressions, he considered it his duty to press for a decision as early as possible, and with that view submitted the following amendment, to come in after the word Resolved:

“That it is expedient to amend the existing Tariff, by increasing the duties on the following importations:

- 1st. On raw Wool and Woollens.
- 2d. Bar Iron.
- 3d. Hemp and Flax.
- 4th. Foreign distilled Spirits.
- 5th. Fine and printed Cotton Goods.

2d. Resolved, That provision should be made by law, to prevent, as far as practicable, defrauds and evasions practised by Foreign importers, to the injury of the revenue and American manufactures.

3d. Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be instructed to report a bill, or bills, conformable to the foregoing resolutions.”

Protection to Manufactures.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. FLOYD, of Va. suggested that the amendment was not in order, and the Speaker decided, that, by the 40th rule of order, it was inadmissible.

Mr. STRONG said that he had listened attentively to the remarks made by the honorable gentleman (Mr. STREVENSON, of Pa.) on the other side of the House. As the gentleman was one of the members of the Committee, he supposed the reasons he had offered in support of the proposition were those of the majority of that committee. They did not, however, do away the impression upon his mind, that the proposition was of a most extraordinary character. What are these reasons? Why, that the committee want information to enable them to make up their judgment whether the duty on a yard of cloth, or a pound of wool, shall be a few per cent. more or less; and if the power of compelling the attendance of persons and the production of papers be not granted, that then the responsibility of acting without information will no longer rest upon the committee, but upon this House.

What is the state of the matter, in regard to which information is sought, and to attain which this compulsory power is demanded? The attempt to protect the domestic industry of the country is not new, it has been often made, and has often failed. It has for many years past agitated the whole nation. In 1816, '20, '23, '24, and '26 the question of revising and increasing the tariff was before Congress, with a view to protection. A great mass of facts and information was collected, and may be found in the records and proceedings of this House, in the shape of memorials and reports of debates. The people are still alive upon this subject, and every thing seems to have been elicited in relation to it which can be of any practical utility.

But if this enormous power of sending for persons and papers be given to the committee, what will be the progress of its execution? Will the committee confine its exercise to the District of Columbia? No. To gain all the information which the Committee seem to want, they must send to Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Boston—nor is this all—they must also send to Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans. Can they perform their duty without collecting all the facts within the scope of this power, from Machias to the Gulf of Mexico? And when they have done, what have they but the disagreeing opinions of men? But, sir, can the information be obtained in the extraordinary way in which it is asked for, in twenty, or thirty, or even sixty days? Why incur this delay? If the power be exercised, there will not be time to report and pass the bill during this session. The tariff will not be revised. The industry of the country will not be protected against the ruinous effects of foreign competition. This proposition, if adopted, will delay, and probably put off altogether, the question of protecting the great agricultural, manufacturing, and navigating interests of the nation.

But, Mr. S. said, there was another objection, which he thought of some weight. What is the nature of the power proposed to be given to this committee? It is to send out the Sergeant-at-Arms, clothed with all the power of this House, to summon persons in any and every part of the nation, and to compel their attendance here, in this Capitol. There is no dispensing power. Whoever is summoned, whether he live in Maine or in Louisiana, must come, or be guilty of a contempt of the authority of this House. And for what purpose is this fearful power to be given to this committee? Is it to elicit fraud or crime, in order that the offender may be convicted and punished? No, sir—But it is to enlighten the judgment of this committee, as they say, upon a mere matter of ordinary legislation. Sir, the rightful exercise of this power is confined to a few cases. These are, where frauds or crimes are imputed, and where the sole object is to detect, expose, or punish the guilty. There is no instance under this Government, within my recollection, where this power has been given for the mere purpose of enabling a committee of this House to adjust the details of an ordinary bill. What, sir! is this enormous power to be given over into the hands of a committee, of a tribunal of seven men, in this land of freemen, to drag before them, by force, if need be, the citizens of this Republic, to instruct the members of that committee, or of this House, in the common and ordinary duties of legislation! Mr. S. said he hoped not, and he trusted the House would reject the proposition.

Mr. STORIS said, that he had heard this proposition from the Committee on Manufactures with some surprise. He had hoped that, instead of asking for the aid of the House to obtain information, they would, by this time, have reported a bill that should give the farming and manufacturing interests of the country effectual protection. We have, said Mr. S., been in session nearly a month, and seem to have only discovered, at this day, that the Committee on Manufactures need this extraordinary interposition of the power of the House before they act at all on the numerous petitions and memorials already before us from our constituents. The power they now ask has not heretofore been thought necessary to enable that Committee to acquire correct information of the depressed state of our woollen manufactures, or the necessity of protecting them. At other sessions, and for successive years, this subject had been considered by the Committees on Manufactures in both Houses, and bills have been reported and passed without this appeal to us for our interference to coerce our constituents to come here and inform us, in person, of the ruinous condition of their interests. The representations made to us in the memorials on our tables, I believe to be true, and that we can draw from them, and other sources within our reach here, abundant information to enable us to act on the question, so as not to disappoint the just expectation of the country. It is unnecessary to vest the Committee with this power of issuing the parliamentary process of the House. There can be no difficulty in obtaining the attendance of the manufacturers, at this city, if the committee requests it of them. So far as we desire to know the opinions of the wool growers and manufacturers of the country, they have already anticipated us. Their petitions are daily furnishing us with all the information that can be necessary to satisfy us that it is our duty not to let this session pass without doing something to convince them that we are looking after their interests. Instead of waiting to be brought here by compulsion, our tables are groaning under the weight of their petitions. I believe, for one, that we can find all the information we want, as to the details of any measure the Committee will report to us, without first resorting to this legislative chancery process, and bringing the petitioners here, to be personally subjected to a catechism from the Committees of the House. They will answer interrogatories truly if gentlemen wish them to do so, without asking that the Committee shall delay acting at all, until they can send to Boston or New Orleans, or any where else, to ascertain if they sincerely believe the representations they have themselves made on the thousands of sheets that are spread out before us. It may be that the committee, or some one of its members, may desire information even from New Orleans; and we all know that, if nothing is to be reported until they can bring witnesses from that quarter, we may not expect to hear of any bill until towards the first of March. We are not so destitute of information here, in my opinion, said Mr. S., from other sources, too, than the memorials of our own constituents. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury has presented us with a body of valuable information on the principal subjects that we shall act upon, if we do any thing at this session. It furnishes such a mass of useful facts, and presents to us, in such clear and convincing lights, the necessity and policy of sustaining, by an adequate increase of duties, the manufactures which he recommends to our protection, that we can hardly expect to be better satisfied than we must be, if we candidly examine it. With all the means in our hands that we may have, if we prosecute this subject diligently, the vesting of this unusual power in the Committee is, in my opinion, useless. The Committee may differ essentially in their view from others in the House who are friendly to the system of protection. They may come to a conclusion on general principles of policy widely different from the House, as to the particular interests that need protection. On the question of a general policy, I hope they will not differ from us. But, before I vest them with the power of calling my constituents here, to be subjected to their interrogations, I should wish to know with certainty that they have made up their minds to report some bill at all events. We may then be acquiring some information for ourselves, if we desire it, beyond what we now have. As soon as we can ascertain what particular articles the Committee will recommend to our favor, we may easily settle the degree of protection that will effect the object. I thought that there were certain articles about which the friends of the system could not differ, and that, by this time, we should have had our attention called to some specific proposition in the form of a bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. STEVENS,) informs us, that one object of vesting this power in the Committee is, that they may not incur the responsibility of any inadvertent errors that may find their way into their reports, and that, if the House deny them this power, that responsibility will then be upon the House. I am willing, said Mr. S. for one, to take upon myself my full share of any such responsibility, and if the Committee should err in any respect for the want of information, will most cheerfully acquit them. But there is a responsibility of another kind that I am not prepared to take, and that responsibility is the defeat of the whole measure, by the delay that must unavoidably succeed, if we adopt the proposition now before us. In my opinion, said Mr. S., the passage of this resolution will produce the defeat of the Tariff. Whatever the intentions of its advocates may be, the necessary effect of it will be to procrastinate the whole subject to so late a day, that it must at last go over the session; and if it now fails, it is in vain to expect its revival hereafter. We are now at the end of the first month of the Session, and have already heard the hope expressed openly, in the House, that we shall adjourn by the fourth of March. The bill of last year was not even acted upon in the other House for want of time, and we are now at the commencement of a new and unusual mode of proceeding, that must consume several weeks, if the examination which the Committee seem to propose is thoroughly made. I infer, too, from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Committee have not yet prepared a bill of any description. They ask for this power, that they may determine, in the first instance, what articles need protection, as well as the amount of it. If they cannot, in their own opinion, discreetly act, without this power from the House, then it is to be presumed that they have not yet prepared any measure; and if we grant them the power, we shall not expect to hear from them till all their examinations of the manufacturers have been completed, and till they have afterwards matured some project, to be founded on the information which they propose to acquire in that way. It requires no great share of sagacity to perceive, nor much temerity to foretell, that, if this proposition is adopted, and the Committee undertake to perform a duty commensurate with its full import, we may dismiss the whole subject from the House, as a defeated measure. I shall not be disappointed if those who are opposed to any increase of duties, should support the resolution: for I believe that it will prove, in the end, to be the most effectual way to defeat all the petitions before us; but I hope that the friends of the farming and manufacturing interests will not sustain a proposition that must, by its necessary operation, indirectly disappoint their constituents. I consider that in voting on this question, I am virtually deciding whether I will act on the subject at all; and, in this view of it, the present proposition shall receive no favor from my hands. If the Committee intend to offer us any measure for the protection of the interests of those whose petitions have been referred to them by the House, (and I hope we shall soon have it before us,) I am willing to trust to the information already in their power. I hold their intelligence in too high estimation to doubt that they can offer us a bill that shall leave no doubt of our intention to meet the full expectation of the country.

Protection to Manufactures.

Mr. OAKLEY said that the resolution, as moved by the chairman of the committee, appeared to him to be couched in too general terms. It did not shew with sufficient clearness the object for which the proposed power was asked. That object, as he understood it, was, that the committee might be enabled to examine witnesses on the subject submitted to them, and thus get at the facts calculated to enlighten the judgment, not of the committee merely, but of the House. That this was the object of the resolution, he thought was manifest, and he therefore proposed to amend it by inserting, after the word "papers," the following: "with a view to ascertain and report to this House such facts as may be useful to guide the judgment of this House in relation to a revision of the tariff duties on imported goods."

Mr. STEVENSON thought the amendment ought not to prevail. Gentlemen had deprecated the delay which would result from adopting the resolution. The evident effect of the amendment would be, by requiring a detailed report, to delay the bill. The committee had a due reference to time, when they agreed to the resolution. The committee will not retard the report of a bill, so as to be too late for legislation. The argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STONAS] is, therefore, fallacious. It is founded upon error. The committee have determined to report in reasonable time. The authority asked, it is not too much to presume, will be used with reasonable discretion. It is not intended to send to Orleans, Missouri, or to Maine, for information; much of it is at hand, even here, but it is wanted in an unquestionable form, and there is no power to command it.

Mr. S. said the committee possess sufficient information on several of the subjects referred, but want it on others. He would not dwell on the arguments of gentlemen who urged that the adopting the resolution would delay a report; it was argument against fact. The committee had determined to report in January, and will do so. He again stated, that the committee were not solicitous on the question of passing the resolution, but would prefer it without the amendment, unless the committee would be sanctioned in extending the report to a later day. He was averse to the report and passage of bills without due examination of facts. For want of due reference to facts, this House last Winter passed a bill, apparently, in part, for the benefit of our farmers. Its operation, as may be now seen, by reference to the imports of the year, would have been a fraud upon the hopes of the wool-grower—so in effect, if not in intention. The bill seemed to increase the duty on imported wool, but was so worded as to add nothing to the duty on wool costing not more than ten cents. It left an opportunity to invoice the great part of the wool imported, at or below that price. To shew the facts, in part, if the House will pardon me, I will state the importations into the collection district of Boston, for the last three years.

From October 1st, 1824, to October 1st, 1825, costing above ten cents, $157,424. Not over ten cents, $40,143.

Dec. 31, 1827.]

Protection to Manufactures.

[H. OF R.]

From October 1st, 1825, to October 1st, 1826, costing above ten cents, $118,801. Costing not over ten cents, $54,980.

From 1st October, 1826, to 1st October, 1827, costing above ten cents, $93,273. Costing not over ten cents, $132,450.

The quantity of wool imported into the Boston district for the year ending October 1st, 1827, costing above ten cents, was three hundred and fourteen thousand six hundred and ninety-six pounds. Of that costing not over ten cents, one million four hundred and seventy three thousand two hundred and ninety pounds. Here, then, you have brought into one port alone this enormous amount, and that costing not over ten cents, would, under the fallacious provisions of the woollens bill, have paid no additional duty. The present duty of fifteen per cent. on the cost of the above, is an average of about one penny per pound. A vast protection to the wool-growing farmer, indeed. The woollens bill would not have increased this. Sir, I am the friend of the farmer and of the manufacturer, and seek information in order to do their interests justice. The agriculturist and manufacturer of Pennsylvania are willing to be judged by facts, and will not suppress inquiry.

I have pointed out what would have occurred, in part, under the provisions of the woollens bill, in order to shew how necessary it is to do something more than to cry tariff: we prefer information from the first sources. The committee will not delay their report beyond January, and it is better to so frame their bill, and arrange its provisions to existing exigencies, than to cast it crude and indigested into this House, founded in error, and fraught with discord.

The amount of wool imported into Boston, costing over ten cents, has been diminishing for three years; that stated as costing not over, has been greatly increasing. The revenue may be suffering, and the farmer too, by the great advantage of invoicing wool not over 10 cents.

Mr. MALLARY said that the reasons which induced him to oppose the resolution had been stated by him when last up, and he should not have risen at present, but for the last remark of the gentleman who had just taken his seat. Mr. M. was here proceeding in a course of general remark, by way of reply, when—

Mr. OAKLEY suggested that it was not in order to go into the merits of the resolution itself, when an amendment to it, only, was under consideration.

The SPEAKER pronounced the remarks of Mr. MALLARY to be not strictly in order.

Mr. MALLARY then resumed, that he could not perceive that the amendment varied in the least the principle of the resolution. It rendered it, indeed, somewhat more specific, but the same reasons which applied to the one, applied with equal force to the other. His objection to the amendment, like that to the resolution, was, that the People of this country have already acted on the general subject with full knowledge and great intelligence. Their wishes had been explicitly stated; and, if they were all summoned here to testify, the committee could get no more, in substance, than they had already. If gentlemen wished to know the actual condition of the various branches of manufactures throughout the country, they had already all the requisite information to guide them. Did the committee want light on the general question, whether farther protection was needed on our woollen manufactures, or did they doubt that those of hemp and iron ought to share in a system of protecting duties?—Surely not. Such knowledge as they had, was all they needed as practical men, and was sufficient to enable them to come to such a result as would answer the public expectation. It certainly looked very much as if the object of the gentlemen, in introducing such a resolution as this, was merely to produce delay. The committee had been in session nearly four weeks, and now the gentleman first perceives the want of information as to the objects to be protected; and, in order to get it, asks for the power of sending for persons and papers. But all that was now known, was equally well known weeks ago, and every reason that operates now, operated then.

The committee, said Mr. M., had before it the testimony of some of the most respectable men in the United States—most of whom are personally known to many of the members of this House. But if we had all those before us whom the People of this country sent to represent them in the late convention, and could examine them from this New-Year to the next, we should get but few new facts, and no new views on the general subject. We have abundant information to enable us to judge whether it is not important that something should be done for the benefit of this branch of the national interests. The gentlemen of this House are well acquainted with the interests and wishes of their constituents; nor have they derived that knowledge from examining the price current of one or of two years, which had been calculated, he would venture to say, for the express end of producing an effect. The gentleman from New York, opposite, for example, [Mr. STORRS] knew, as well as any one could inform him, what was the state of the manufacturing interests in the county of Oneida. Other gentlemen had the same knowledge in relation to their respective districts; and, if the committee wanted light, they had only to come to the members of this House and they would obtain it. Such were some of his views in opposing the resolution.

As to the bill of last session, Mr. M. said, the gentleman had certainly gone to the tomb for the subject of his remarks. What was done in the last Congress could not be brought forward as of much avail on the present occasion. That bill, the gentleman says, operated as a fraud on the agricultural interests of the country. It was reported, it seems, by the committee, from a want of knowledge, and its passage by the House was an egregious blunder. Now, what was the real history of that matter? The committee were informed, that, in laying the protecting duty, it would be productive of injurious consequences, if they made the duty on the raw material and on the manufactured article to commence at the same time. It was shewn to them, by satisfactory evidence, that there was an immense capital which had been invested in the manufacture of woollens, and was then idle; and that unless some time were suffered to elapse before the duty on raw wool should be enforced, serious injury must necessarily ensue. Such were the views under which that bill was passed. If they were erroneous, it certainly was not for a want of knowledge of the facts. Does the gentleman suppose that the committee stand in need of having the farmers of this country coming to their committee room to see they are not cheated by the measures of this House? Was it necessary for them to testify in person, before the committee could determine whether the duty on the raw material and on the manufactured fabric, should or should not be simultaneous? The gentleman's whole argument from that bill was inapplicable and out of place. The question which the committee had to decide, and on which the House had afterwards to pass, was a question of expediency. The House did pass upon it, and they fully knew what they were doing.

Mr. M. said that, from information, he was satisfied that the stock of domestic wool was not now sufficient. He had no doubt but that there were spindles enough now idle that could be put in motion, in a short period—perhaps in twenty-four hours—to use an amount equal to the foreign supply. The farmer could not furnish the additional raw material for some time; the manufacturer could put his machinery into immediate operation, &c.

As to the statements which the gentleman had quoted, with regard to the importation of the different qualities of wool, in two successive years, he did not see what it proved, nor did he distinctly understand for what purpose it was introduced. Gentlemen all knew that much coarse wool had been imported, and much of it under the value of ten cents.

[At this point the debate was arrested by the Speaker, who announced that the hour allotted for reports and resolutions had expired.]

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, however, the rule on that subject was for this day suspended, two-thirds of the House sustaining his motion to that effect.

Mr. MALLARY then resumed his speech, and was proceeding to make some remarks on the effects of the provisions of the tariff bill of 1824, when he was called to order by Mr. INGHAM, of Penn., on the ground that these remarks had no necessary connexion with the amendment.

The SPEAKER so decided: when

Mr. MALLARY observed, that the gentleman on the other side, had not, he believed, been checked in a course of pretty general remarks on the same subject, and he had supposed that he was at liberty to follow his example: but he should certainly submit to the decision of the Chair; and Mr. M. then took his seat.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, two objections had been stated to grant the power requested by the resolution. First, that it is unnecessary, inasmuch as the House and the committee are already possessed of all the information which can be produced by the examinations which the resolution authorizes. Secondly, that the inconvenience attending the delay necessary to procure the testimony will more than counterbalance any advantage we might expect in obtaining it. If the first suggestion be true, there is an end of the question: it will be nugatory to give the committee power to examine witnesses, to procure evidence which we already possess; but the manner in which the objection is made, I fear, will show conclusively that we are not quite so well informed as those who urge it would have us believe. But, however gentlemen may be satisfied with the extent of their own knowledge, we owe something to the respectable committee that has asked us for this delegation of power. They tell us that there are material points of the subject on which they desire to be informed before they can present us such a bill as they can recommend to be passed, and they ask the means to procure it. What answer shall we give them? Shall we say, we understand the subject perfectly; bring in your bill as well as you can; we want no information from you? Shall we reverse the rule of business in this House, and, instead of employing a committee to state facts, and give us their deductions from them, shall we oblige them to bring in a bill without any knowledge of the subject, and supply the gross deficiency by our superior knowledge? But, before we take this course, it is worth enquiry whether we ourselves possess this knowledge, and to what extent? We will take this from the gentlemen who oppose the resolution, if any member in the House possess the information. They have it, and they have not left us in doubt as to the kind of evidence on which they rest their belief. What more, say those gentlemen, can be desired? Have we not memorials from all the manufacturers? Do not our tables groan with the weight of their complaints? What more can be desired? Something more, in my opinion: and if this is the best evidence—and it must be supposed to be such, for it has been relied on by all who spoke against the resolution—it is the strongest argument that could be used in favor of the measure proposed. I will believe that many of these memorialists are very respectable people; but are they disinterested? Their object is to obtain a protecting duty amounting to a prohibition of all foreign manufactures. And to persuade us to tax the whole community to the amount that such a measure necessarily involves, they tell us that, with the present protection, high as it is, their establishments cannot exist; that it is a losing business; that they are obliged to discharge their workmen; but that, if we will agree to tax the rest of the community, to enable them to become rich, as soon as this object is attained, their prices will fall, and we shall obtain their manufactures cheaper than we can import them now. But, sir, before I yield to this fine reasoning; before I agree to impose this tax upon my constituents, I must be permitted to say that I want evidence; that my duty will not permit me to rely on the bare assertion of any one, much less on that of interested persons, be they ever so respectable. I want to know whether it is true that the manufacturers of wool are really going to ruin with a protecting duty of more than fifty per cent. I want to know the reason of this, if it be true; and I want to know from what facts the conclusion is drawn that the same manufacturers which cannot exist now, as we are told, with this enormous protecting duty, and the corresponding price it produces, will be enabled to sell their goods cheaper, at a future date, than they can be imported without that duty? A long professional practice has taught me the danger of relying on the testimony of interested witnesses, and has also shown me the great utility of cross examination. From disinterested witnesses it is calculated to elicit truth; but it is invaluable, for the detection of all those subterfuges to which interest resorts, in order to hide the truth, or give a false color to a true statement.

The manufacturers say that their present profits are an insufficient inducement for carrying on their business. They have told us so for years; yet they carry it on. They told us they must cease to exist, if we did not increase the duty; yet they still exist. Yet they increase; and we do not hear that one million of dollars that we were last year told was invested in the business, has been withdrawn. Nay, I have been informed, (but do not vouch for the fact,) that, during the last session, at the very moment we were told that the manufacturers were discharging their hands, preparatory to their dissolution, at that very moment, I have been informed, that several new incorporations were made, with very large capitals, for carrying on the same business. Be this as it may, there is certainly some inconsistency between the allegations of impending dissolution, and the actual existence of these valuable establishments; it is this that I wish to penetrate by evidence, by publicity. Let us examine these manufacturers, and know what they mean by a fair profit. If it should appear on this examination that they make ten per cent. clear profit, but do not think that a sufficient encouragement. I should be glad to know whether the House would coincide in that opinion and go on protecting until they can make 15 or 20—not I for one; I will never consent that my constituents shall pay such a tax in order to produce such an enormous profit. It may be, sir, that the representations are true: if they are, it is to the advantage of the manufacturer that the truth should appear by such testimony as will give it credence. Now, sir, how is it proposed to legislate? On our own information, and that which we may chance to obtain from interested sources. Gentlemen give us their opinion. I have the utmost respect for it, but I want to know on what it is founded; it cannot be from practical knowledge, it must be therefore from information; but I want that information on oath; I want it in the shape of evidence; and as much as regular judicial testimony is superior to hearsay, so much is the evidence which the committee desire to obtain, superior to that which the House now possesses.

The bill which passed this House, the last session, strongly shows how useful this mode of obtaining information would have been. Wool under ten cents cost was left untaxed, because it was supposed that little of it entered into the fabric of cloth; yet the information given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, shows, that the quantity imported of that species, the last year, was more than four times that of the higher priced. Then we acted from general information, perhaps from the allegation of those interested to deceive us. If we had tested this by a cross examination on oath, the truth would have appeared, and we should never have passed a bill so ungenerous to the farming interest.

DEC. 31, 1827.]

Protection to Manufactures.

[H. OF R.]

As to the delay, I do not apprehend it. All the information wanted can be procured in a few weeks; but were the delay greater, the advantages to be obtained from it would more than compensate for any disadvantage attending it.

But the practice is new! Too new, sir! Too rare in our legislation. All our laws, particularly those for the protection of commerce or manufactures, would be better, more stable, more wise, if we had sooner resorted to it. But, though new to us, we knew its effects. The Parliament of Great Britain, sitting in the most commercial town of Europe, where information may be procured on every subject by every member, at his will, does not rely on that information: they pursue this course. Not an alteration is made in any department until witnesses have been examined and cross examined before an open committee, and their examinations reduced to writing and submitted to the House. We have in our library forty or fifty folios filled with these examinations. If found necessary there, how much more so here, where we are shut out from all information but that which we can procure by letters from a distance, without the sanction of an oath, frequently from interested persons, and without the advantage of cross examination, to elicit the truth. Suppose, as may be the case, that the representations we have received are true; certainly the truth will appear, and the more convincing, when supported by legal proof, than by loose opinion. If this resolution do not pass, it will be said that the truth was concealed; that the parties feared to be brought to their oath. But, if it pass, and the statements should prove correct, we may then vote conscientiously, because we shall vote with a knowledge of the facts before us.

For these reasons I give my support to the resolution.

Mr. OAKLEY now expressed his apprehension, that the House was in danger of being prematurely involved in the discussion of the general subject. The question now to be decided, was on the adoption of the amendment, and, on this point, he had supposed, when he offered the amendment, that there would have been but one opinion. If, said Mr. O. you grant the power asked, shall or shall not the object of granting it be expressed in the resolution? That is the question, and the sole question before the House; but, as the amendment I offered appears to involve some gentlemen in difficulty, and is especially disapproved of by a member of the committee opposite, (Mr. STEVENSON,) I will now withdraw it, and if in order, will move another in its place. Mr. O. then moved to strike out the whole of the original resolution moved by Mr. MALLARY, after the word "Resolved," and in lieu thereof, insert the following:

"That the Committee on Manufactures be empowered to send for, and to examine persons on oath, concerning the present condition of our manufactures, and to report the minutes of such examination to this House."

Mr. STEWART thought that this amendment was substantially the same as the other. As a friend to the policy of protecting the home interest of this country, he had hoped that the House would, by this time, have received from the Committee of Manufactures, a bill, rather than a resolution for enquiry. He had hoped so especially, when he perceived the anxiety manifested on this subject, by so large a portion of this community.

[Mr. STEWART was here called to order by Mr. McDUFFIE, on the ground that he was discussing the original proposition on a question of amendment, when, admitting that the amendment did not go to change the character of the original resolution. The CHAIR did not sustain the objection of Mr. McDUFFIE.]

Mr. STEWART then proceeded to observe, that the power asked by the committee was not only novel and extraordinary, but wholly unnecessary. The honorable gentleman from Louisiana, had asked, with much emphasis, whether the House would deprive its own committee of information which they considered necessary to a right discharge of their duty? To this question he answered No; but he would in turn enquire whether this committee had not all the ordinary means of obtaining such information as was indeed necessary? Had they not the same means that all other committees had, and might not every other committee of the House ask for this power with equal reason? Did they not possess more information on the subject of manufactures than had ever been accumulated before? Had they not all the facts which had been collected by their predecessors? Certainly. But he would ask further, what has this committee done? If they want further information, have they addressed letters to such persons as are able to furnish it? Could there be any doubt, that if they did this, full and correct answers would be received? For himself, he had none, but would be glad to know if the letters had been written. The committee, said Mr. S., have the reports of those who introduced the tariff bill of 1816, that of 1821, and that of 1824, which was reported by the committee on the ninth day of the next month. My colleague [Mr. STEVENSON] says that he wants information, and has referred the House to certain facts in a statement relative to the importation of wool: but where did the gentleman get that statement? He got it from the Treasury report. Does he want the committee to be clothed with power to send for Treasury reports? Sir, before I confer such a power as is now asked for, I should be glad to know how it is to be exerted, for what end, and to what extent? For whom are these gentlemen going to send? Is it for the manufacturers? If it is, will they not also send for the various Chambers of Commerce in our Atlantic cities, (for I presume witnesses are to be heard on both sides,) and, sir, must they not send to the South? Must they not bring Governor Giles and Doctor Cooper to enlighten them on the constitutional question? Nay, sir, will they not have to send for the farmers of the United States to testify as to the effect of the tariff on agriculture? Sir, we shall want a whole regiment of Sergeants-at-arms to carry their warrants into effect. But, for my part, I want no information from the manufacturers. I am not now legislating for them, I am legislating for the farmers. I have nothing to do with the manufacturers. I repeat it, I am legislating for the farmers, I am trying to build up a home market. I am endeavoring to provide for the farmers of the United States peace markets for their raw materials, for their flour, for their pork, for their corn, for their beef, for their butter. And this measure I cannot consent to see delayed by what amounts, in my judgment, to an indefinite postponement. I want to see neither our manufacturers, nor our Chambers of Commerce, nor our farmers coming before this committee. They have all told us what they want. I do not wish to see them brought from their various homes—and, sir, I ask at whose expense? Certainly at their own, for it is they who at last must pay for it.

[Here Mr. S. was called to order by Mr. CAMBRELENG: but the CHAIR pronounced him not to be out of order.]

Protection to Manufactures.

Mr. S. resumed his speech, and further insisted on the impropriety of conferring a power so great as was now demanded, and so novel in its character, without some very extraordinary reason for its exercise. His objections to the grant was, that it was unnecessary—as all needful information was within reach of the committee without it. He hoped the committee had at least made the trial of obtaining this information by correspondence. If they had done this, and failed to obtain it, they would come before the House with a better grace. The House was now within a few days of the time when the former bills on this subject had been reported. To begin at such a period of the session, to send for persons and papers, was virtually to postpone, and certainly to defeat the whole measure.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, as my colleagues [Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. STEWART] have expressed opinions directly at variance with each other, I shall state my reasons for the vote which I intend to give. I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OAKLEY]; not because it varies in principle from the resolution reported by the Committee of Manufactures, but because it expresses more fully and distinctly the objects which that committee had in view.

It has been stated and urged by gentlemen, in this debate, that the vote which may be given in favor of the resolution, ought to be considered as a vote against the policy of protecting domestic manufactures. I protest against any such inference. It is at war with the fact. It assumes the principle, that, because the friends of the resolution wish to cast all the light which can be shed upon the subject—because they wish to act with knowledge and deliberation—that, therefore, they are opposed to the protection of domestic manufactures. It assumes the position that the desire to obtain information concerning a measure, necessarily pre-supposes hostility to it. This is a singular mode of argument. I feel confident, that, when the House shall have acquired a knowledge of all the facts—and when they shall be spread before the nation, in an authentic form, we shall pass a bill much more satisfactory to ourselves and to our country, than we can do without the information.

But, it has been stated that the delay which must follow the adoption of this resolution, will defeat the bill, at the present session. I have been astonished to hear this argument urged, after the explicit declaration of the Committee of Domestic Manufactures. One of its members [Mr. STEVENSON] has solemnly declared, that delay has not been the object, nor will it be the effect of the measure. They have determined to report a bill during the next month, and hope they will be enabled to do so, some time before its close. After such a declaration upon this floor, will any gentleman again repeat, that the intention of the majority of the committee is delay? I trust not. Upon the ground of delay, therefore, there is no reason for voting against this resolution. Much as I desire more information concerning the manufacture of woollens, if I could, for one moment, believe, that the passage of this resolution would prevent us from acting efficiently upon the tariff, during the present session, I should vote in the negative. I apprehend no such result.

Gentlemen have argued, that the power to send for persons to testify, which the respectable Committee of Manufactures desire to obtain from the House, is dangerous and unprecedented. What a mere bug-bear is this argument! If two of your citizens engage in litigation, no matter how contemptible the subject in dispute may be, your laws will compel the attendance of witnesses, whatever may be the individual sacrifice. Justice must be done between them. And shall it be said, that, when a measure, deeply affecting the interest of every man in the United States, is before the Representatives of the People, that it is the exercise of extraordinary power, to compel the attendance of witnesses who can give us practical information upon the subject? This power has never before been questioned, since I have been a member of this House.

For my own part, I am a sincere friend to the Tariff, and have no doubt that the manufacture of woollens requires additional protection: the great question is, in what degree? We must know the extent of the evil, before we can proportion the remedy to it. Upon this subject, my principles have never changed. I have ever been in favor of affording such protection to our domestic manufactures, as will enable them to enter into fair and successful competition with foreign manufactures, in our domestic markets. If you go beyond this point, you reach prohibition; and thus afford an unnecessary and unjust protection to the manufacturer, at the expense of the consumer. On the other hand, if you fall short of it, you disappoint the just hopes of the manufacturer, and withdraw from him the foundation on which he has a right to expect that he shall stand. It is not easy to determine the precise point to which we ought to go. To err on the one side, will injure the manufacturer—to err on the other, will injure the consumer. The woollen manufacturers themselves differ, as to the degree of protection necessary. How, then, can we decide between them, without calling them before us, and ascertaining the facts upon which their respective opinions rest? My colleague [Mr. STEWART] may know the precise degree of protection necessary. I confess I do not. Even the Committee of Domestic Manufactures are in the dark upon this subject.

Who are the manufacturers, that we dare not approach them? Shall we be so careful of their accommodation, that we must act blindly, rather than send for them to give us information? Shall we run the risk of injuriously affecting the agricultural interest, and all the other interests of the country, rather than send for a few of those gentlemen who are our petitioners, to inform us as to the degree of protection which their establishments require? This would be ill-timed and injudicious kindness. If we send for them, their expenses must be paid by the House. It certainly cannot be a very grievous matter for them to spend a few days here, during the fashionable season, at the public expense, when so many of our citizens visit Washington voluntarily, at their own private cost.

I confess I did not understand by what authority my colleague [Mr. STEWART] undertook to propound the questions which he has done to the Committee of Manufactures. They are not now upon their trial. They are not bound to answer such interrogatories. They have exposed their reasons for making this request before you, and they merely wish to obtain your advice upon the subject. They will rest satisfied with whatever may be your determination.

Before I sit down, I must say, I am glad that my colleague [Mr. STEWART] and myself at length agree upon the articles proper to be embraced in the Tariff. The abortive attempt which he made to amend this resolution, shews, that he is now willing to protect other interests besides those contained in the Woollen Bill of the last Session. Since that period, new light, from some quarter, has beamed upon his mind; and who can, therefore, tell, but that the information sought to be obtained by this resolution, may illumine the minds of others? At the last Session, when I proposed to include in the Woollen Bill several of the articles enumerated in the amendment which that gentleman has this day offered, he voted for the previous question, which was carried; and thus my purpose was defeated.

Mr. BUCHANAN here yielded the floor to Mr. STEWART. Mr. STEWART rose to explain. He had, at the last session, voted for every proposition the object of which was to protect either manufactures or agriculture. He had never voted against a Tariff question, and never would. He had never voted against a single proposition in any shape, which, in his judgment, was calculated to protect domestic industry. He had voted for the woollens bill of last session, not as being all that he wished, but as being all that he could get—and on this ground only.

Dec. 31, 1827.]

Protection to Manufactures.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BUCHANAN said, I cannot be mistaken in the fact, that the gentleman [Mr. STEWART] did vote for the previous question, upon the occasion to which I have referred. It will be for the House and the country to decide, whether the explanation of that vote which he has now given, be satisfactory or not.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose. His object was, he said, barely to offer a single suggestion, in addition to the very judicious and valuable observation which had fallen from the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and one which, considering his professional experience and eminence, he wondered he should have overlooked. It was that this resolution proposed to give to the committee the great benefit of viva voce testimony in contradistinction to that which was written only. He was not himself a professional man, but he would leave it to those who were of the profession, and understood the difference between examinations and cross-examinations, and depositions in Chancery, to how much more a viva voce examination was calculated to extract the truth from a witness whom one could see and hear, than that of a bill and answer in Chancery, where the witness is absent, and can be neither seen nor heard. The difference between these two modes of examination amounted, in most cases, to the difference between arriving at a true or a false conclusion. One word more, and he had done. It was not his place, he said, to interfere to settle the difference between the two Representatives from Pennsylvania—"Non nostrum tantas componere lites." This debate had, however, had the effect to disclose that something, of which the wisest man living had denied the existence—which was "something new under the Sun." For, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEWART] had discovered that a committee of this House, some years ago, did make a report upon a certain day in the next month. Now, if facts like these can be brought forth upon the testimony of members of this respectable House, said Mr. R., there is no knowing what may not be elicited by a personal examination of those intelligent persons whom the committee propose to summon before them.

Mr. WOOD, of New-York, said, that his objection to this resolution rested on none of the grounds which had been stated. I doubt, said he, the power of the House—that is my difficulty. It has been once decided, at least as I understood, that the whole judicial power of this House related to two classes of cases only. The one is, that of contested elections; and the other respects cases of malversation in office. Such has ever been my opinion. This, therefore, is a novel case for the exercise of such a power. The manufacturers apply to us for an increase of duties. Does this differ from an ordinary application for relief? Not at all, as to this principle. I therefore think it a case where we have no power. Every committee clothed with such a power is constituted a judicial tribunal. Where do we get the power to do this? I deny that it exists. The facts which bear on a petition must be substantiated by the petitioners in their own way. If their allegations are believed to be false, it is the duty of the committee to report against them; but if they believe them true, and the request reasonable, it is the committee's duty to report in their favor. If the petitioners volunteer, without any compulsion from us, to submit affidavits, and to exhibit their accounts, their allegations may be thereby confirmed; but this is a matter which must be left entirely to themselves; and when they have produced such evidence as they think fit, it is then for the committee to judge of its credibility, and report accordingly.

Mr. BURGESS, of R. I., said, that he did not rise, at this late hour, to discuss the merits of the resolution, or the amendment, but to move a postponement of the whole question till Wednesday next, and that, in the meanwhile, the SPEAKER should examine the records of this House, to discover whether any precedent exists for the grant of such a power, in a case like that now before the House.

The question being put on the motion for postponement, it was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. WRIGHT, of N. Y., then addressed the House, and said, that, as he had been honored with a situation in the Committee of Manufactures, he felt the more entitled to ask the indulgence of the House, in offering a few statements and explanations, in reply to what had been advanced on the other side; and he would first remark, that it was three weeks, and not four weeks, as had been said, since the members composing that Committee, had been announced to the House. For some days after their appointment, not a single memorial, either for or against an alteration in the present tariff of duties had been laid before them. Then a few petitions, very briefly and generally expressed, were received from two or three of the States; and, if the gentlemen who seemed to censure the Committee for negligence, had had an opportunity of examining these documents, they would have found that they all had relation to what had been denominated "A National Convention in Pennsylvania." Petitions of this kind were all that the Committee had before them for a considerable time. When he said this, he meant officially before them, in such a manner that the Committee could act upon them. He admitted, indeed, that the members of the Committee had, individually, seen a pamphlet which had been very freely circulated, and which had respect to the doings of that Convention. But it was never placed officially before either the House or the Committee, until about ten days ago. This was all the time the Committee had had to deliberate on several distinct propositions submitted to them, and he might be permitted to refer to the proceedings of this House, and to its progress in business, as an answer to the imputations thrown out as to the industry of the Committee. The resolution which had been this day offered, had been resolved on, in Committee, some days ago, and it was presented to the House on the very first opportunity that offered. He had been an advocate for its adoption, and he would now briefly state some of the reasons that had influenced him. It had been said, that all the information, necessary to a right decision on the general subject, is already before the House and the Committee. This might be true, for aught he knew. His own experience in legislation had been very short, and he was unable to say what amount of knowledge might be possessed by others, but for himself, from the industry which he had been able to bring to bear within the short time allowed him, (and he had examined diligently all the public documents and reports of former Committees which were said to contain this species of information) he found himself still greatly at a loss, and in want of much information, of which the public documents were destitute. The whole subject stood in need of the exhibition of more precise detail. Two questions had been submitted to the committee; the first was, are any alterations at all, in the existing Tariff at this time necessary? It had been said, that on this point the public mind had been deeply interested, and the public sentiment expressed with sufficient clearness to authorize the Committee in coming to an affirmative decision. Should this be admitted, another question arose, and that was, to what extent is this alteration necessary, in order to attain the ends in view? On this question, gentlemen might examine all the memorials of the Manufacturers, all the reports of the Committees of Manufactures, as well as the Executive communications, (at least as far as he had been able to investigate them) and they would not discover any thing to inform them whether five, eight, or fifty per cent. was to be added to the present rate of duties. Now this was precisely the kind of information of which he stood in need; he meant to be understood as referring to some particular branches of manufacture; and there were others of a similar character, on which other petitions might yet be presented. There were, however, some branches to which these remarks did not apply.

H. of R.]

Protection to Manufactures.

But one chief subject on which he felt this want of information, was the manufacture of woollens. The Harrisburg Convention, had, on this subject, proposed a series of minimums, to constitute a scale of duties which, according to their judgment was requisite and proper for the protection of that manufacture. But, had the members of that Convention given to the world any facts, calculated to shew that the rates they proposed were such as precisely to furnish the degree of protection required, and neither to fall short of, nor to exceed it? He could not find this in their pamphlet.

In what situation then did he stand? As a servant of the House, he was commanded to examine a certain subject, to bring his mind to a conclusion with respect to it, and report a bill for the action of the House. The House had a claim upon him for the performance of this duty, and he was unwilling to be compelled to report upon the subject, when he was not in possession of the facts requisite to form a decision. If, indeed, the House should say to him, go on, and do as well as you can, with such lights as you have, he was perfectly willing to obey them. All he wished was to express the difficulty under which he labored in the discharge of his duty, and to ask the House to assist him. If they should be of opinion that it was improper to do so, he was entirely willing to proceed with such means of knowledge as were in his power.

To the questions whether this was a novel case, and whether the power now asked resided in the House, he did not profess himself able to decide; his parliamentary experience had not been such as to enable him to do so. He would, however, suggest to his colleague [Mr. OAKLEY] who had offered the amendment, that, as it now stood, it did not require the witnesses who might be summoned, to bring with them any papers. Supposing, then, that the committee should send for the agent of some manufacturing establishment, for the purpose of examining him in relation to its concerns, would not the witness, in order to give precise replies, want the books of the establishment? By referring to these, his information could be rendered specific. He suggested, therefore, whether the amendment ought not to be so modified as to attain this object.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed himself in favor of the resolution. He said he had occupied himself during the Summer in collecting what information was in his power, on the general subject of the woollen manufactures of this country, and he had obtained from different quarters statements directly the reverse of each other. He had found that some fabrics yielded the manufacturers 25 and others 50 per cent. upon their capital. As an instance of the contradiction to which he had referred, Mr. C. stated one case. A memorial, received at the last session from one of the New England States, declared that the capital employed in a certain manufacture had suffered a reduction of more than 10 per cent. He had happened, in the Summer, to fall in with one of the proprietors of the very establishment to which that memorial referred, who told him that on the 1st of April they had taken one account of stock, and on the 1st of October another, and that the difference was such, that, during those six months they had been enabled to divide 10 per cent. profit upon their capital. Mr. C. said that he was anxious that the committee should be enabled to decide between conflicting statements of this description. For this end there was no need of sending to Machias, or Missouri, or New Orleans. He had no doubt that his colleague was correct in saying that the gentlemen concerned would of themselves be very willing to come here and testify. He knew of one gentleman from New York, who was shortly expected here: he was an extensive manufacturer, and had lately been enlarging his establishment. When that gentleman arrived, Mr. C. said, he should wish to go before the committee and examine him for himself, and he thought that every other member of the House ought to do the same. Sure he was, he said, that if they did not do so, they would not do their duty. One gentleman had expressed great surprise that such a resolution as this should be offered, and another had doubted the power of the House to grant such authority. It had been called an unprecedented measure. For himself, he believed it quite unprecedented that any party or combination, of whatever name, whether friend or enemy to a proposed measure, should attempt to stifle information, and keep the House in the dark. Gentlemen ought not to depend on the statements of any memorials whatever, but ought to adopt the practice of the British Parliament, and bring the manufacturers before them, take minutes of their examination, and publish them to the nation. Some of the memorials, Mr. C. said, intimated that their business was a losing one. The statement of others was very different. They professed themselves satisfied with the tariff as it now stood, and able to do a profitable business without further protection. If, however, this interest is really suffering, let that suffering be made clearly manifest, and then let the friends of the manufacturers introduce and carry through this House such relief as their situation may require.

Mr. OAKLEY said, that almost every gentleman who had spoken, seemed to misunderstand his amendment, and he began to think he misunderstood it himself. One of his colleagues had started a doubt as to the power of the House to grant such authority as was now asked. For himself, Mr. O. thought, it was founded on the common law of Parliament. The Legislature must possess all that power, which was requisite to procure the information necessary to its acting understandingly, on every subject which came before it. But it certainly did not follow, should this resolution pass, that the committee must, therefore, resort to coercive measures. But if the House should doubt its power to authorize them to do so, nothing was easier than to modify the resolution, so as only to invite voluntary attendance. He did not, however, believe there was the least occasion for solicitude on this subject. The manufacturers, instead of needing to be compelled, would eagerly embrace the opportunity of attendance.

The gentleman who had just taken his seat, Mr. O. said, had alluded to an individual residing in the district which he represented, and who had been delegated by the People of the county, to attend to their interests before this body. He is (said Mr. O.) a man of great experience and of great intelligence. He is not only willing, but anxious, to testify under oath, before a committee of this House, and there to show why it is necessary that further protection should be extended to the woollen manufacture; and I venture to predict that the result of his examination will be of ten-fold more advantage to a right understanding of this subject, and to the interests of the manufacturers, than that of all the gentlemen on this floor. It need not be apprehended that witnesses are going to be dragged before this House by any oppressive coercion. If the manufacturers have truth on their side, they will promptly and anxiously disclose the real state of facts; and our calling them will, in my judgment, be a means of bringing this matter to a close in a much shorter period than any other measure that could possibly be adopted. Gentlemen seem to apprehend not only delay but defeat to the general measure, should the resolution pass. I, on the contrary, do verily believe that, if the committee shall exercise their power with discretion and in good faith, instead of retarding, it will greatly expedite the passage of the bill. I have, to be sure, no personal experience in legislating on this subject, but I have had occasion to remark, while observing what has been passing here, that much of the time of the House has been lost, owing to the difference of gentlemen as to the real state of facts. One has declared it to be in one way, another in another; and thus, day after day has been wasted in getting at the facts with which the discussion ought to have started. My pursuits in life have been such as to preclude me from all practical knowledge, on the subject of manufactures; and if, to supply my own deficiency, I look to the members of this House, on whom am I to rely? On the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEWART?] Certainly I should fully rely on any fact he would state from his own knowledge; but his facts are derived from others! On my colleague from New York, [Mr. STOWES?] For his opinions I have the highest possible respect; but his opinions in the matter rest on the facts as he learns them from others. On what, then, can I rely? I am reduced to the necessity of acting by faith. Now I am unwilling to do this, unless it is absolutely necessary. If, indeed, I am driven to the necessity, I must give my vote by the best lights I can obtain, but if I can get better, as I believe I can, through the medium of this resolution, I shall certainly be desirous of so doing; and surely the gentlemen themselves must be satisfied, that such a course will conduce to the promotion of their own views.

From the course of the discussion, which had taken place, Mr. O. said, he rather thought, that the idea would be held out, that all those who advocate the proposition now before the House, are opposed to manufactures. Mr. O. protested against any such inference. He stated that he was himself a decided advocate of domestic industry. He was desirous to give it such encouragement, as should enable it successfully to compete with foreign manufactures. In one word, he would encourage our own manufactures, but he would not force them. Shew me, said he, that further duties are necessary, to enable the domestic manufacture to compete, on equal terms in our market, with the foreign, and I will go as far as any gentleman in this House to do what is necessary for its protection. On this subject, Mr. O. said, his information was by no means of a decided character. Some manufacturers have said, that they can get along very well without any additional protection; whilst others maintained directly the contrary. Now, Mr. O. asked, is it not due to the People, before we impose upon them any additional burthen, to ascertain whether it is necessary to do so, in order to obtain the object, which they themselves have in view? We are informed, said he, by the members of the Committee of Manufactures, that even the memorials differ, as to the facts of the case which they present to Congress. If they thus differ in their statements, how is the committee to determine between them? If the authors of the memorials were here to be personally examined, the causes of the difference could be easily ascertained. Nor did Mr. O. suppose, that the measure, if it succeeded, would lead to any material delay: nor did he believe, that it would be necessary for the committee to send to remote parts of the country for witnesses. He believed, that if it was known, that this House wished persons to appear before its committee, they would have before them, in a very few days, as voluntary attendants, more persons than they wished to examine. For, if the manufacturers, in their allegations, have truth on their side, they will be glad to disclose it; and, if they have truth on their side, they will be glad to disclose it under oath. If there should be any unreasonable delay of a report on this subject, it will be the fault of this House: for, if the committee show any disposition to evade this duty, and delay a report, on the ground of the examination of witnesses, it would be competent to this House to withdraw the authority it had given, &c.

Mr. O. proceeded to answer the objections to the exercise of the power, from which, in the modified form proposed by his amendment, he contended, no inconvenience was likely to be experienced.

Whether this resolution should be adopted or not, Mr. O. said he had his views in relation to the general policy of the protection of manufactures; and, when necessary or proper to express them, he should do so. But before he came to the application of his general views to the business of legislation, he wished to have more definite information as to facts. He wished to have it ascertained, for example, by a careful examination of testimony, whether a man of sufficient skill, capital, and economy, cannot now manufacture woollen cloths, and make upon that business, in competition with the foreign manufacturer of the same article, a reasonable profit. If so, was there any gentleman in this House who wished to go further in the protection of that manufacture? Surely not. Now, on this point of fact, Mr. O. said, some gentlemen were satisfied. He was not so. If the result of the proposed examination were to make it apparent that further protection was necessary, then let it be given; but let the truth be ascertained, to whatever conclusion it might lead.

In reference to the remark which had been made, that the information already before the House on the subject, came from an interested quarter, Mr. O. said, it does so; and to be correct, it must come from such quarter, because those only who are interested are qualified to testify on the subject. He did not object on that account, therefore, to the testimony on the subject before the House, but only wished an opportunity to examine and cross-examine the witnesses on the subject, to obtain a view of the truth in all its bearings, &c. He wished to know the amount of capital employed in particular branches of manufactures; the expense of such manufactures; the annual profit upon the capital, &c.—particulars which could not be obtained with certainty in any other way than by oral testimony, &c. &c.

Mr. BURGESS now moved an adjournment, but withdrew his motion at the suggestion of

Mr. BARTLETT, who moved to lay the resolution on the table, with a view to take it up on the first succeeding hour of business.

The motion was negatived, without a division; and the question on Mr. OAKLEY'S amendment being about to be put,

Mr. CONDUCT asked that it be taken by yeas and nays, but the House refused to sustain this request.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, said he was not satisfied with the answer of his colleague. The power of the House of Commons, and the power of Congress, were very different things. Parliament had no written Constitution to control it; and its members are in the daily habit of doing what would here be considered as unconstitutional, and highly improper. He believed, however, that even in England, in examinations had with respect to the corn-laws, and some other subjects, those who testified had gone voluntarily before the House. No compulsory process had been resorted to. He repeated the declaration of his opinion, that the only cases in which the House has a right to send for persons and papers, are those of impeachment, and of contested elections. The power to be exercised was a very high and awful power, and, with all humility, he might be permitted to say, the House, in this case, cannot exercise such power. When an individual comes before you, and asks relief, you have no right to compel him to declare, upon his oath, on what ground he rests his claim. It is an imposition to attempt it. To do it, would be tyrannical in the highest degree. If the committee sends for a person, it must send a warrant, or a subpoena, and the individual sent for must come, and must answer. If not, you commit him for a contempt, and, when he has come, and stands before your committee, what are the rules to govern the committee in their examination? Courts have rules to restrain them. A committee has none. They are left to their mere discretion, and the individual must bring all his books and papers, if required. *Sir, this is an inquisition, which every Court of Law abhors. It is odious, and oppressive, in the highest degree, and I, for one, will never consent to it. *

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, now called for the reading of an extract from the Journals of the House, which had respect to the granting of similar power, to a committee who were ordered to investigate the sale of lots belonging to the United States, in Washington City.

Mr. SPRAGUE next addressed the House in reply to (Mr. OAKLEY,) whose argument, he said, had proceeded on the ground that there was no need to compel the attendance of witnesses, inasmuch as all the persons interested would flock to this city, to give, of their own accord, the required information. All, then, that was proposed, was, to authorize their examination when they should come. Now, I, said Mr. S. had always thought that the committees of this House possessed this power already, and this opinion has been confirmed by a recent statement of the Hon. Speaker. The resolution, however, says, that the committee shall have power to send for persons to testify. My answer, then, to the gentleman from New York, rests on the ground which he has assumed. If these witnesses will come voluntarily, the power proposed to be granted is wholly unnecessary, and I for one never will clothe any individual or collective body with unnecessary power, especially when the power asked for is both great and unusual. That now asked is such a power, and, by the gentleman's own showing, it is unnecessary. But I go further, and say, that if the committee shall propose an oath, and the witnesses shall decline it, the inference to be drawn from their refusal is, that they suppose the information they are required to give is contrary to their interest, and that the representations they have submitted in their memorials is not strictly consonant with truth.

I agree with the gentleman from New York, in the opinion, that so soon as the wish of the committee shall be publicly known, the manufacturers will instantly flock to this House; but the granting such a power as is expressed in the resolution, will naturally infer that the committee are to exercise it, and to delay their investigation till they can do so. The amendment of the gentleman changes the whole ground at first taken. He asks the information for the House; but the committee ask it for themselves.

Mr. OAKLEY here explained, and acknowledged that if the committee was already possessed of power to examine witnesses on oath, the resolution would be unnecessary. On that point, however, he was desirous of information; the practice was different in his own State. He presumed, from the form of the resolution, the committee intended to ask for this power; and he now heard it said on all hands around him that there could be no doubt about the matter, and that no such power was in the committee until granted by the House. He concluded, therefore, that the gentleman from Maine must have been under a mistake.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said, if he understood the question before the House, it presented itself in this aspect: 'The Committee on Manufactures ask of the House to confer upon it power to send for persons and papers, without specifying any particular object for which the power is sought. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. OAKLEY,] proposes to grant the power to examine witnesses, on oath, touching the present condition of our manufactories, and to report their testimony to the House. I sought, said Mr. W.; in the inquiries I before directed to the majority of the committee, information which would enable me to discharge the duty devolved upon me, that I might vote understandingly on the proposition. I do not desire to withhold any information that can be obtained, bearing on the subject before the committee. I have listened, sir, attentively, not only to what has been said by the two gentlemen who are members of the committee, but also to what has fallen from all the other gentlemen who have addressed the Chair, in the hope of learning the specific beneficial object to be attained by agreeing to the proposition of the committee, but have listened in vain. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENSON] from the committee, informs you he wants the power to send for persons and papers, in order to obtain information that will reconcile the contradictory statements in the memorials sent to the committee; that will advise him what subjects require an increase of duty, and the quantum of increase; that will remove the committee from any imputation of error; and that will devolve upon the House the responsibility of refusing the information sought. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who is also a member of the committee, wishes the power granted that the committee may ascertain what subjects need protection, the quantum of increase in the duty that will attain the prudential point, and to enable the committee to sustain their bill or report when before the House. It will be seen, sir, by any gentleman, who will advert to the inquiries made, that the information given by the committee does not touch the subject, and is not satisfactory. After all we have heard from different quarters of the House, who can say to what point the inquiries of the committee will be directed? Do they want information of our capacity to manufacture woollen goods, or iron, or any other article? Or whether either of those articles are protected? We are not told, and we know not, only from conjecture. It is true, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENSON] speaks of the quantity of wool imported into Boston for the three years past, showing a constant decrease in the quantity of fine wool, and a corresponding increase in the quantity of coarse wool imported; but I am not able now to see how that fact affects the question, or, if it does, the gentleman seems informed on the subject. He has already the information he desires.

In discussing this subject, it is proper to inquire if this House is possessed of the extraordinary power sought to be conferred on this committee, and, if it is, whether it is expedient to exercise that power on this occasion? I will not affirm, sir, that the House has not the power: for I am ready to confess, that, on that subject, my mind is not free of doubt. I am aware that the power is exercised by the Parliament of England; but I cannot admit that every thing that has been done by that body, may be done by this House. The power is exercised in Parliament under some limitations and restrictions, which I am not now prepared to particularize. I may be permitted to say, however, that a strong argument against the existence of the power in this House is found in the fact that, from the adoption of the Constitution until this period, during all the different subjects discussed in Congress, during all the former animated and warm discussions on the Tariff question, it has never been sought to confer this power on any committee of the House, except on subjects connected with the discharge of its judicial functions; and no such committee has ever before asked to have this power conferred. I do not say this is conclusive that we have not the power; but, I think it well worthy of serious consideration.

But, sir, if we have the power, is it expedient to exercise it on this occasion? Gentlemen are desirous of obtaining evidence of facts: are they within their reach? Can a knowledge of them be obtained through the medium proposed? The memorials, we are told, present conflicting opinions and statements, leaving the committee in doubt and difficulty as to the truth. Will the exertion of the power to examine witnesses, on oath, remove the difficulty? You desire to know the state of your manufacturing establishments, the amount of protection required, if any. This depends on matter of opinion, not of fact. When you have examined your witnesses, and obtained their opinions, as to the cause of the depression of the manufacturing interest, you will find them variant, like all other human testimony, conflicting and contradictory; and then will devolve upon the committee the performance of the very same duty they wish to avoid, by their application to the House—the task of reconciling, if in their power, contradictory statements and opinions, and eliciting the truth from the whole mass of evidence. This will be the case, in a greater or less degree, whether you have one witness or many, and is well known to all in the habit of searching for truth in the testimony of witnesses. No good, then, will result from conferring this power. Gentlemen certainly do not wish to falsify the custom house entries, abstracts from which are annually laid before us. In relation again to the article of wool that has been mentioned, the custom house entries show the quantity and kinds imported; and if there be any information back upon that point, or any showing whether the increased importation of coarse wool is owing to the employment of false invoices, reducing the price of the wool abroad, to defraud the revenue, I suppose that can be obtained from the Treasury Department upon an ordinary call of the House, without the power sought to be obtained. The proposition is inexpedient, on other grounds. As a precedent, it is exceedingly dangerous. Should the grant of such a power become common, it would lead to the exercise of inquisitorial powers. The gentleman from New York (Mr. WRIGHT) has told us that, if the proposition of his colleague obtains, it will fall short of his object in one particular. He adverts to the possible necessity of examining an agent of some manufacturing establishment, and objects that the power is not given to compel the production of the books of the Company before the committee. Are gentlemen prepared, sir, to establish an inquisition in this country, that shall pry into the business concerns of individuals, upon common subjects of general legislation? I hope not. The delay attending the exercise of this power, if granted, will, in my opinion, inevitably defeat any efficient legislation, having, for its object, protection to our manufactures during the present session. I do not mean to say the committee so intend; but, I do mean to say, such is the natural tendency of the proposition, and such, I think, will be its result. It is singular, sir, that at this particular time, when the country is alive to this subject, it should be thought advisable to introduce this proposition. Are gentlemen prepared to say to those who have so long asked our protection, go your way, we do not understand your claims? I have felt it to be my duty to present these considerations to the House. It is not my object to consume time. I am not satisfied with the reasons given for the proposition. In any and every aspect in which I am able to view it, it appears to me inexpedient. I am not able to see any possible good that can result from it; on the contrary, I fear much evil.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that of the existence of the power in the House to examine persons upon oath, and consequently of the power to delegate it, there had never been, during thirty years that he had had the honor of a seat in Congress, a shadow of doubt. It had been exercised ever since he was a member of the House, and long before. It was now within six weeks of being thirty years since the following act was passed.

[Here Mr. R. quoted an act giving the power of administering oaths to the Speaker, to the Chairman of Committees of the Whole, and the Chairman of the Standing Committees of the House.]

This law, said Mr. R., supposes there may be occasions requiring the exercise of this power by the Standing Committees of the House. My recollection on this subject is very different from that of the gentleman from Ohio, who has just taken his seat. I know that such powers have been given by this House to committees, and that committees have required from the House, on different occasions, the power to send for persons and papers. This same law was re-enacted in 1817. It was first passed in February, 1798. I acknowledge that those were hard unconstitutional times, and ought not to be drawn into precedent; but this law has since been re-enacted, in other and better times.

Mr. SPRAGUE now made some observation, which was not distinctly heard by the Reporter, but was understood to be, in substance, that Committees of the House do possess the power to take testimony on oath, without being specially authorized.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, true, sir, they do possess that power, but not to send for persons.

Mr. SPRAGUE resumed. The gentleman from New York says, that the manufacturers will come willingly, and of their own accord, and he also said, that if the committees already possess the power to take testimony, this resolution was unnecessary. It is now admitted that they have that power; my proposition is then fully established, unless the granting of a power to send for persons implies that such a power is necessary, and must be exercised. I hope it will not be contended, that the power of the committee depends on the question, whether the witnesses will have to be brought forcibly or not. The power is in the committee by its organization.

Mr. OAKLEY said, in reply, that he had not been aware, when last up, that a power to take testimony on oath was vested in the committees of this House; but since such appeared to be the fact, he hoped the Committee of Manufactures would avail themselves of it. Should any of the witnesses called before it refuse to testify on oath, the House could then exert its power to compel them: if, however, they will attend and testify voluntarily, said he, I shall be content. If any gentleman shall wish to coerce their testimony in any case, he will have an opportunity of applying to this House for the power to do so. Mr. O. felt satisfied, therefore, that the committee would, in one way or the other, attain the objects in view, and he, therefore, now felt very indifferent whether the resolution passed or not.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, that it seemed to be thought by some gentlemen that these manufacturers would come voluntarily before the House, and give any testimony that was required. I, said Mr. F., am of a different opinion. I believe that the time has come when Congress is bound to present to the country some authentic data on this subject of protection. I have been a member of this House when the former Tariff Bills were passed, and was once a member of the Committee of Manufactures, and I well remember that, from the very first Tariff down to the last which passed this House, the same cry was constantly repeated, "Give us but this, and we will be satisfied." The gentleman from Pennsylvania has told the House, with very great emphasis, that he never voted against a tariff bill in his life, and never will vote against one. Almighty God! And are we come to this state of things? A gentleman from New York informs us that we have, already, information in great plenty; that the reports made when the last tariff bills were before us, contained all that we need to know. Unluckily, I was in the minority when that bill passed. I happened to come from the country that was to be squeezed, and I well remember the manner in which that bill was got up. At one time it was asked, in the Committee, Shall we put iron wire into this bill? And, at another time, a handful of wood screws was laid upon the mantelpiece of the Committee room, to give the Committee ocular demonstration that we could in this country, make wooden screws: (nay, it was but the other day when a petition on this very subject of wooden screws, was presented to this House.) As an instance of the impropriety of listening to such petitions, I will just state one fact. Some gentlemen took it into their heads that we could, in this country, manufacture umbrellas to great advantage, (and it is true enough that we can make fine umbrellas in great numbers,) and they prayed this House that the importation of square wire might be prohibited, because that kind of wire was employed in making the stretchers of the umbrellas. Well, the House granted the petition; square wire was prohibited; and what followed? These umbrella makers were obliged to import the stretchers ready made, because they could not make them of our own wire, and the importation of square wire had, at their own request, been prohibited. On the subject of iron, we had a low and whispering voice from Virginia. In consequence of this, I made inquiry of one of the principal iron masters in that State, whether any further protection was indeed necessary to that branch of manufacture, and I found that this man had been asked to sign the petition that came up to this House, but had positively refused, saying, that he could not, in conscience, ask for the additional duty; but, if Congress would force it into his pocket, he should certainly be very well satisfied. I farther found, that the Manufacturers are in the habit of selling their iron to their own neighbors, at a certain price, and after carrying it eighty miles by land, they will sell it at twenty dollars per ton less. Now, who pays for this? Another thing I have observed is, that whenever there happens to be a surplus in the National Treasury, these people immediately ask for new duties, because they can then urge that these duties will not injure the revenue. During the present session we have been told in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, (who seems on this occasion to have acted the part of deputy President, for who empowered him to recommend measures to this House?) that we shall have a surplus of five millions in the Treasury. Immediately, these Gentlemen Manufacturers congratulate one another, that now is a fine time to get a new Tariff. But, if the Committee shall be empowered, as it is now proposed, to send for persons and papers, their contradictory statements will be exposed to the public, and the truth will come out. And is not this a consideration which deserves our serious regard? Besides, I would ask if one man sets up a manufactory in a country where provisions are cheap, where the population is abundant, and the people poor, where he has a great water power, and where he can bring the raw material to his very door in ships, whether he cannot afford to sell his manufactures cheaper than another man, who is obliged to transport his materials far into the interior, and there to pay from thirty to forty thousand dollars for a steam engine? One of the gentlemen from Pa. (Mr. STEWART,) has told us that this measure is all for the benefit of the farmers. Sir, I am a farmer; I hold an estate in Virginia; and while members of this House were voting a Tariff to protect the suffering manufacturers, I was selling corn at ten cents a bushel. The gentlemen, though they were importuned not to insult the agriculturists of the country, put into their bill a duty of twenty-five cents per bushel on imported wheat, while flour is now selling in Virginia at three dollars and fifty cents a barrel.

Now, I appeal to this House whether it is not time to take some step to put a stop to this eternal cry about protection. From 1818 to this hour, the manufacturers have been continually telling us that they would be satisfied. But are they satisfied? If the Committee shall be clothed with the power they now ask, they will, of course, be bound to use it in a prudent and proper manner. If they shall transcend their authority, and attempt any oppressive measures, they will offer contempt to this House, and any individual on whom they may make the experiment will find prompt and ample protection at its hands. The committee must exercise so great a power on their own high responsibility, and I, for one, have no fears that they will abuse it.

The question was now taken on the amendment of Mr. OAKLEY, and carried in the affirmative—ayes 100, noes 78.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved to lay the resolution upon the table: whereupon, the question being taken, it was negatived without a division.

Mr. HOFFMAN then said that, in relation to the subject which had been referred to the Committee of Manufactures, he desired and needed information, as much as any one. He represented, indeed, a district which was not specially interested in the protection of the manufacturing interest: had it been otherwise, he might have sought, with more diligence, to inform himself on the subject; as it was, however, he had sought information with some care, but without success. Yet, anxious as he confessed himself to be, to get further light, he was not willing to hazard what had been said, and, perhaps, with some justice, to be the destruction of the proposed grant of protection, by delay. He had hoped to have obtained the information he desired in an authentic form, by testimony under oath. The allegations of the petitioners would then have been supported by something that could with certainty be relied on. It was certainly very desirable to dispense with long arguments to determine matters of fact. Those gentlemen, however, who are most interested in the general question, distinctly tell the House that the adoption of such a resolution as is now proposed, will, in its effect, be equivalent to an indefinite postponement; and I feel myself, said Mr. H., induced by their arguments to vote with them. I do this, however, on the ground that they speak in good faith when they assure us that they have all the necessary knowledge of the facts. I know that good accounts are kept by those who conduct our manufacturing establishments. The price of the raw material is recorded, and an accurate account of all the subsequent expenses attendant on its manufacture, so as to enable the owners, after a proper allowance for the interest of their capital, to fix on a price yielding them a reasonable profit. When, therefore, gentlemen tell us that they have all the knowledge of these matters which the question requires, I expect them, of course, to be prepared with extracts from the books of the manufacturers, shewing the prices paid by them for materials and workmanship, and those received for the manufactured article. We shall then be abundantly able to judge of the degree of protection they require. I am the rather induced to take this course, from having observed, that, while cottons are exported by us to foreign countries, no woollens are exported. I feel, therefore, inclined to allow some farther protection on the latter. On these two grounds, I am disposed to vote with those who oppose the present resolution. I feel indebted, however, to the Committee on Manufactures for having brought forward the measure at this time. It will be immediately promulgated, and the country will be apprised of the information which that committee feels a need of. The manufacturers will, therefore, have an opportunity of shewing the truth and sincerity of their representations to this House. If, therefore, after the lapse of a few days, they do not present themselves here with the fullest evidence in the case, the conclusion drawn inevitably by all men will be against them. But if the manufacturers shall come before us with such precise and detailed statements as shall substantiate the declarations made in their petitions and memorials, then all that will remain for us to decide upon, will be the principle itself of granting protection: and, with respect to that as a general principle, I confess myself to entertain little doubt. They have now been fairly and fully notified of what we want, and I hope they will come forward with promptitude and furnish it. The only objection which, in my mind, remains unanswered, is, that, if the resolution is rejected, the manufacturer is to be left to come here at his own expense. This, I think, will not be treating him so well as he ought to be treated. The resolution in its present form does not propose any tyrannical compulsion, but merely offers an invitation to those gentlemen to come here, at our expense, to give us the knowledge they possess, and which we require. However, as the friends of the manufacturing interest appear decidedly to disapprove of the resolution, I have concluded to vote with them.

The question was then taken upon the resolution as amended, and decided as follows:

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1828.

NAVY HOSPITAL FUND.

Mr. McDUFFIE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bill:

A bill making an appropriation to the Navy Hospital Fund.

Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of forty-six thousand two hundred and seventeen dollars and fourteen cents be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to the Navy Hospital Fund, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay the same to the Commissioners of the aforesaid Fund, upon their requisition:

The bill was twice read, and committed for to-morrow.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, made a report, accompanied with a bill to amend and explain an act, entitled "An act confirming an act of the Legislature of Virginia, incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company," and an act of the State of Maryland for the same purpose. Which bill was twice read and committed for to-morrow.

Mr. MERCER also reported the following bill:

A bill authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to subscribe in the name, and for the use of the United States, for ten thousand shares of the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, and to pay for the same, at such times, and in such proportion, as shall be required of the stockholders, generally, by the rules and regulations of the Company, out of the dividends which may accrue to the United States upon the Bank Stock, in the Bank of the United States; provided, that not more than one fifth part of the sum, so subscribed for the use of the United States, shall be demanded in any one year, after the organization of the said Company; and provided, moreover, that, for the supply of water to such other Canals as the State of Maryland, or Virginia, or the Congress of the United States may authorize to be constructed, in connexion with the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, the section of the said Canal, as leading from the head of the Little Falls of the Potomac River, to the proposed basin, next above Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, shall have the elevation above the tide of the River, at the head of the said Falls, and shall preserve throughout the whole section aforesaid, a breadth, at the surface of the water, of not less than sixty feet, and a depth, below the same, of not less than five feet, with a suitable breadth of bottom.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Secretary of the Treasury shall vote for the President and Directors of the said Company, according to such number of shares as the United States may at any time hold in the stock thereof, and shall receive upon the said stock, the proportion of the tolls which shall from time to time be due to the United States for the shares aforesaid; and shall have, and enjoy in behalf of the United States, every other right of a stockholder in the said Company.

This bill was committed to the same Committee of the Whole, as the preceding.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The following resolution, offered some days since by Mr. MAXWELL, was taken up and read :

“Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the report of the Engineers employed to examine and ascertain the practicability of uniting, by a Canal, the waters of James and the Great Kenhawa rivers.”

And the question being on its adoption,

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, that he was not altogether satisfied with the resolution. He believed they had got all the information they wanted in Virginia on the subject of it. We, in Virginia, (said Mr. F.) have some feeling as to the conduct of the Administration on that point. The late Governor of that State seemed to think that the Engineering performed there by order of the General Government, was merely a bribe for her good opinion; and Mr. F. did not know that his opinion on that subject was very different from his own. Why the United States' Engineers should have been employed for so many months in surveying this route between the James and the Great Kenhawa rivers, (said Mr. F.) I cannot myself very well understand. But this I know, that all the money of the United States would not make a canal between those two rivers. Between the James river and New River, which is a branch of the Kenhawa, I grant it may be done, but not between James River and the Great Kenhawa itself. Why is this survey pressed upon us, when our own Legislature has long ago caused the same route to be examined by an Engineer who was the master and instructor of this very brigade which has been engaged so long in the survey, and which, I understand, is to be employed there again next season? It has greatly the appearance of a political design on the part of the Administration. In indulging such an opinion, I hope I do them no injustice; I would not willingly do this, for they have sins enough, God knows, to answer for, without being charged upon suspicion. Entertaining these views, I have prepared an amendment to the resolution, which I now offer to the House.

“That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, the instructions given to the Engineers who have been ordered to examine the passages through the mountains of Virginia, with a view to the location of turnpike roads, railroads, and canals. Also communicate what progress has been made in the various works, how many surveys have been completed—how much has been done of those unfinished and how many unsurveyed or unexamined which it is contemplated to examine. How many Engineers have been employed in that service—their rank, and pay: likewise, how many men have been employed by these Engineers in that service; and if not finished, at what time it is presumed this work will be completed.”

I have made some alteration, as will be seen, in the form, as well as the extent of the resolution: For a new practice has of late crept into the mode of doing business in this Government. This House, instead of calling for information from the President of the United States, calls upon his Secretaries, who are the mere creatures of law; nay, so far has this gone, that even the Secretary of a Department, instead of giving, upon his own responsibility, a condensed statement of the facts inquired for, goes to his clerks, and sends us in bulk, the reports of these clerks to the Hon. Secretary himself, for the House to make what they can of them. By this mode of proceeding, all responsibility is shifted from the President or his Secretary, and if erroneous information is sent to the House, and any inquiry is made, why, forsooth, it was an error of one of the clerks. I have worded my amendment so as purposely to avoid this.

Mr. MERCER regretted that his colleague had preface his amendment by a series of remarks which were wholly unnecessary to the sustaining of it. Perhaps the gentleman was not aware, that, in what he had said, he reflected not only on the Executive, but on thirty or forty of his fellow members of this House. The proceedings of the Administration in this matter, whether right or wrong, were had in pursuance of the recommendation of between thirty and forty gentlemen who had been members of a former Congress. If the gentleman, before he uttered the remarks he had just made, had taken the trouble to read the documents which had been furnished to the House on this subject, he would have perceived that the application of those gentlemen to have this survey effected, proceeded on the grounds of the compact between the United States and the State of Ohio, (the same instrument which was, in fact, the foundation of the Cumberland Road,) and of two successive resolutions of the House of Delegates of Virginia, (one of which was likewise concurred in by the Senate of that State,) on the same subject. The compact he alluded to contained a provision that “one or more” lines of connexion should be established by roads between the Atlantic and Western waters, leading towards the State of Ohio. The road from Cumberland to Wheeling formed one of these lines of communication; but the instrument equally sanctions another between the waters of James and the Great Kenhawa rivers. So much, therefore, for the right of Government to order these surveys.

But further: In the year 1815, the Legislature of Virginia invited the General Government, as well as the Government of Kentucky and Ohio, to unite in the construction of a Canal, or Rail Road, between the two rivers last mentioned. And, in the year following, a similar resolution was recommended to the Legislature of Virginia, by the Board of Public Works for that State, and was passed almost unanimously. It was, indeed, true, that the same route had been examined by a very distinguished gentleman in Virginia, (he did not know whether he was very skilful and experienced in Civil Engineering, but he was certainly a most accomplished Military Engineer,) Mr. Crozet. But, it was nevertheless true, that, since the year 1812, it never could be ascertained whether the proposed connexion was, or was not practicable, until the recent survey by the United States' Engineers. Mr. M. said, he felt the more entitled to speak with confidence on this subject, since he had himself been one of the Commissioners appointed by the State of Virginia, to make the examination, and had performed the most hazardous part of that duty, and he could declare that he was now as fully convinced of the practicability of the undertaking, as he was of any fact in Natural history. He had made the preceding remarks, in order that the responsibility of originating those surveys might rest, where it ought to rest, on himself and the other gentlemen who had recommended the measure to the Executive.

Mr. FLOYD spoke in reply, declaring that he should not retract one word of what he had said when last up. His colleague on the right must himself be convinced that, in what he had just advanced, he was under an egregious error. I said, (observed Mr. F.) that the waters of the New River and of James River might be united—but how could this connexion be contemplated by the contract with Ohio, when, according to the gentleman's shewing, it is now first ascertained that such a connexion is possible? The Engineers of Virginia have examined the very route now proposed. [Here Mr. MASON, speaking across, in an under voice, said, "they never touched it."] They have touched it; and they did examine it. Besides, this canal is on the same route with the contemplated road to New Orleans, (that is, if the President has yet determined on which side of the Mountains that road is to pass.) But, though several different surveys have been made, the Engineers are not yet done with it. Now, what are we to think of this? A bill has, to be sure, been reported this morning, on the subject of the New Orleans road, but (by reason of the new practice into which we have fallen, of not having bills read through on their first reading,) I do not know what it contains. The road must go either East of the mountains, or up the great valley. I presume it will go through the valley; and if so, then this canal will be almost immediately in the route. But this is not a road to Ohio; it runs through Tennessee and Alabama. What then can this canal, or this road, have to do with the contract between the United States and Ohio? But, I am told by the gentleman, that some members of Congress petitioned the President for this survey. I was apprised of that fact, but I had thought that the Cumberland road fully satisfied our contract with Ohio. This, however, I will say—and I say it that the Administration may hear it—that I do know much more of their operations in the upper country than they think for, and, at a suitable time, I shall disclose what I know, let the consequence fall where it may.

Mr. MERCER insisted that his colleague was mistaken as to his facts. The practicability of connecting the James and Kenhawa rivers by a navigable canal, had been first ascertained by the United States' Engineers. The report of Mr. Crozet on the subject, was subsequent to that of the United States' Engineers. His report threw a doubt over the result at which the United States' Engineers had arrived. As to the compact with Ohio, it provided for "one or more" roads between the Western and Atlantic waters; it must therefore, of course, comprehend a road between the Great Kenhawa and the James rivers. But the route in question had nothing to do with the road to New Orleans; the former would intersect the latter at right angles, and, of course, the two routes could not run over the same ground. Of the road to Orleans, the present Vice President was the original mover, and Mr. M. said he applauded his sagacity for suggesting it. Three different routes for this road were originally contemplated: they had since been surveyed; but no report in relation to either had been made at the last session, because the committee of Roads and Canals had been overburdened with business which had the precedence. A bill for the construction of this road was now, for the first time, reported. The route of the road could not have been earlier fixed by the present Executive. It could not, therefore, have been sooner determined. Mr. M. said, in conclusion, that he had not risen, on the present occasion, with any view of protecting the Executive from censure, but merely to vindicate himself and those gentlemen of the House who had been associated with him in the recommendation of the survey referred to. The very first time he had raised his voice in debate in this House, more than ten years ago, was in favor of the power of Government to make roads and canals, and for many years, as was known to his friends, all the energies of his mind had been constantly and faithfully devoted to this subject. He cared not who ruled, so that his country prospered.

Mr. BARTLETT rose upon a point of order, and suggested a doubt whether the amendment proposed by Mr. FLOYD, did not so far differ from the resolution of Mr. MAXWELL as to be inadmissible under the 40th rule, as being a substitute for it.

The SPEAKER decided that the amendment was in order, being only an extension of the object of the resolution.

Mr. FLOYD again arose. He said that his colleague had totally changed his ground. He now says that the fact of the practicability of a connection of the two rivers was first ascertained by the United States' Engineers. I admit, (said Mr. F.) that the first survey was made by them, but I still insist, that Mr. Crozet did examine the route and ascertain the practicability long before they did. Mr. F. concluded by saying, there was nothing in his amendment which called upon the gentleman to defend either himself and his associates, or the administration.

Mr. MAXWELL said, it was not his desire to oppose the inquiry proposed by his colleague opposite, (Mr. FLOYD.) That gentleman was at full liberty, so far as he was concerned, to obtain any information he might wish; but, he was unwilling that such a call should be substituted for the resolution he (Mr. M.) had offered. The survey which he wished to have laid before the House was, he understood, prepared and ready to be submitted. His objection to the gentleman's amendment was chiefly grounded on its extent, and the delay which must necessarily be occasioned by the adoption of it.

The question was then put on the amendment, and it was rejected.

The resolution of Mr. MAXWELL was then adopted in its original form.

PUBLIC LAND DEBT.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. P. P. BARBOUR in the Chair, on the bill to revive and continue in force the several acts making provision for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of the Public Lands, and on the bill for the relief of Purchasers of Public Lands which have reverted for non-payment of the purchase money.

The first of these bills having been read—

Mr. ISACKS, Chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, rose to explain the nature of the bill now before the Committee of the Whole. It would be perceived that the bill contained nothing new; it proposed merely an extension of time; it did that, and it did no more. The ruinous policy of what was denominated the credit system, expired in 1820, and in the succeeding year Congress legislated for the relief of the purchasers who were unable to complete their payments. The act of 1821 was the basis of the several subsequent acts on this subject. The persons indebted to the United States for land, were divided by it into three classes. The first class contained such as had paid only one-fourth part of the purchase money; these were allowed eight years to complete their payments. The second class comprised such as had paid one-half of the purchase money; these were allowed six years. Those who had paid two-thirds were arranged in the third class, and were allowed four years. In 1824 another act was passed, extending the time of the former bill about eighteen months; and, in 1826, the time was again extended to a period, which expired on the fourth day of July last. The present bill was merely for the purpose of extending it to the fourth of July, 1829.

Mr. I., after some general remarks on the importance of the subject, concluded by reading an extract from the report of the Commissioners of Public Lands.

Mr. MCCOY inquired whether the amount of one million and upwards, stated by the Commissioner to have been received, had been actually received in money, or only by the relinquishment of land warrants?

Mr. ISACKS replied, it was received partly in one way, and partly in the other—but could not state precisely the proportion, without reference to documents.

Removal of Indians.

The bill was then laid aside, and the Committee passed to the next of the bills referred to the same Committee; and the said bills were reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 3, 1828.

Mr. BELL moved the following :

Resolved, That the Committee of Military Affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing an armory on some point on Harpeth river, in the State of Tennessee.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said, as the resolution which had just been read was intended only to direct the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to the subject embraced in it, he did not present himself before the House for the purpose of making any remarks upon the general expediency of establishing an armory upon the Western waters, nor with any view, in detail, of the grounds upon which he would urge the situation of that particular district of the West, for such an establishment, designated in the resolution. But, said he, as, in offering it, I do not intend to pay a mere compliment of the season to the interests of that section of the country which I have the honor to represent, I beg leave now to state, that, if the subject shall be thought of sufficient consequence to engage the serious attention of the committee, (and, in my judgment, it deserves a place in their deliberations,) I expect to be able to shew, that the country upon the lower branches of the Cumberland, and upon the south side of it, combines all the advantages desirable in a site for an extensive manufactory of arms, common to those places, which have hitherto been brought to the notice of this House, under more favorable auspices. I expect also to shew, that this part of the country possesses other advantages which are peculiar and exclusive; and I will, in due time, take the trouble upon myself of embodying the information necessary to this effect.

That I may not be thought too sanguine in my estimate of the condition, both national and adventitious, of the section of country alluded to, permit me to state one fact, which, I am sure, our Atlantic brethren will not be unconcerned to hear. Within the last four or five years, the manufacture of bar iron in Middle Tennessee, has increased in such a degree, that the produce of the works upon the Juniata, which formerly found an extensive and profitable market in that country, is now rarely to be met with in our shops, and the Swedes iron, which, though the product of the industry of another hemisphere, and burthened, as it is, with duties, has been afforded in our market lower than the Juniata, is also fast disappearing. In truth, however ill adapted the population of that State may be to other manufactures, that of iron must flourish, both by reason of the superior quality of ore which abounds there, and the diminished, and still diminishing value of that kind of labor which is almost exclusively employed in reducing it. In the same tract of country, water power susceptible of application to all kinds of machinery, exists to every necessary, and even desirable extent. Fossil coal, too, is found upon the banks of the Cumberland, and, as the means of transportation by water, to every point upon the Mississippi and its branches, at this time accessible from other quarters, are not restricted from this point, I am persuaded it will be found, upon enquiry, that no greater mistake could be committed, than to suppose, either that the principal materials consumed in an armory, or that all the essential articles of subsistence could not be afforded upon as low terms there, as at any other place in the Western country. There are other considerations connected with this subject, which, in my opinion, should give this point on the Western waters, a decided preference over those which seem to have been more attended to; but these I will not now urge, nor even mention. Such a course, I apprehend, would be likely to provoke an immediate discussion, which would be premature, and might be useless. The suggestions already thrown out, are designed not so much to make any impression upon the House, as to elicit a full enquiry on the part of the committee, and the character of the gentlemen placed upon that committee gives me the assurance that the proposition contained in the resolution will receive a candid and impartial examination.

The resolution was agreed to.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 4, 1828.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS.

Mr. HAILE said, that he had some days since laid on the table of the House a resolution in reference to the removal of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, which he desired now to call up for consideration.

The resolution was read as follows :

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to enable the Choctaws and Chickasaws to explore the country beyond the river Mississippi, and to provide the means for the support of such Indians who are disposed to emigrate, and are willing to embrace the benevolent objects designed by the Government."

To this resolution Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, offered an amendment, when it was before the House on the 11th December, to include the "Pattawattamie and Miami Indians," and the question occurred on this amendment.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, (Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs,) stated, that the committee had the subject of that resolution now before them, and were preparing a report upon it, which they intended shortly to present to the House.

Mr. HAILE observed, that his resolution had, he believed, been offered previously to any other, on the general subject of the removal of Indians, and he had been told by those gentlemen who had offered amendments to it, that they would consent to withdraw those amendments in order that his might be considered separately. The honorable Chairman of the Indian Committee was not, he apprehended, fully acquainted with the situation of the two tribes to which his resolution referred. In 1820, there had been guarantied to the Chickasaws and Choctaws, by the Government of the United States, a large tract of land West of the Mississippi; but, since that treaty, no steps had been taken to carry this pledge into effect. On the contrary, 3000 whites had encroached upon their territory, and were driving them back, at the same time that every inducement had been held out to them by the Government, to obtain their consent to emigration. Under these circumstances, the tribes referred to, had peculiar claims on the attention of the Committee of Indian Affairs, and he wished that Committee to report to the House, whether, in their judgment, the tract guarantied by the treaty, was to be given, as it had been promised, or some other tract in lieu of it.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, having no objection to the object of the resolution, and not being desirous of throwing any obstacles in the way of its adoption, withdrew the amendment to it which he had before offered.

Mr. FLOYD, of Va., said, he believed this was the first time an appropriation had been asked from this House to enable Indians to go into the wilderness to explore it. He had thought that the object of the system adopted by the General Government, with respect to the Indians, was to civilize those People, and to get them out of the wilderness. As the reverse, however, seemed intended by this resolution, he was opposed to its adoption.

Mr. HAILE said, that Government had made a treaty by which they were bound. If solemn treaties were to be considered as of any avail, and the Government meant to act in good faith, these Indians ought to receive what had been promised them. It was with a view to this end, that he had offered the resolution.

The question being put, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means do enquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the 16th section of an act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port, or place, within the jurisdiction of the United States, etc., as requires that the owner or captain intending to transport a slave, coastwise, from one port to another, in the same State, shall previously deliver to the Collector a manifest, specifying the name, age, etc., of said slave, and swearing that the said slave had not been imported since the year 1808, and that he was held to service by the laws of the State.

Mr. MITCHELL said, that, without some explanation of the facts referred to, the resolution must be, in a great measure, unintelligible. In 1807, Congress, in pursuance of a clause in the Constitution on that subject, passed an act suppressing the slave trade. The 10th section of that act required, that, when a slave arrives in any part of the United States, in a vessel of more than 40 tons burthen, the captain and owner must unite in an oath, that the slave had not been imported since the 1st January, 1808. This ceremony was accompanied with fees to the Collector of $1 50, and if the parties failed to comply with this requirement of the act, the vessel was to be confiscated, and the captain to pay a fine of $1,000. At the time this act passed, these requirements were wise and proper; because, at that time, our whole coast swarmed with vessels engaged in the slave trade; but the object of this and other acts had been fully accomplished, and that trade might now be pronounced, so far as we were concerned, to be completely suppressed. The last accounts received from our station in Africa, declared that the English and American branches of the trade had ceased. All those formerly engaged in it, had, by the severity of our laws, been expelled from the country, and no such trade was now carried on in any part of our coast. The act to which he referred, therefore, while it imposed a very severe tax on the People of the South, was, under the present state of things, productive of no benefit whatever. Its operation was harassing and oppressive. If a gentleman wished to go with his servant, from Charleston to Beaufort, the captain is under the necessity of giving, in his manifest, an account of that slave. His oath, and that of the owner, must be submitted to the Collector, though that officer should know ever so well the fact to be substantiated; and, if a gentleman sends his slave up and down, fifty times in the course of the year, the same ceremony must be gone through. This is trouble and expense, without any useful end.

Mr. M. said, that, though he was himself a slave holder, he was as warmly and as sincerely opposed to the slave trade as any gentleman from the Northern States possibly could be, and could he be convinced that such a provision as this was necessary to the putting down of that traffic, he would be the last man to oppose it; but he was convinced, that it was wholly unnecessary, and as it interposed a vexatious embarrassment in the intercourse between the Southern States, he was desirous of seeing it repealed; but wished to obtain the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means on that subject.

Mr. MERCER said, that, without intending to express any opinion upon the subject of the enquiry which the gentleman from South Carolina was desirous to institute, he could not refrain from correcting the erroneous impression which he seemed to have formed, that the slave trade was abolished. On the contrary, he believed that it was now carried on to as great an extent as at any former period of its history; and to some extent, though precisely to what, by American capital, he would not undertake to determine.

The resolution was then adopted.

CANAL IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. WING offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to enquire into the expediency of appropriating a sum of money for examining and determining upon a suitable route for a canal across the peninsula of Michigan, to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Lake Erie.

Resolved, also, That the same committee be instructed to enquire into the expediency of appropriating, for the purpose of making said canal, tracts of land on each side of said route, equal in quantity to those heretofore granted for constructing the Illinois and Indiana Canals.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. WING said, that, as the importance of the resolutions might not at once be apparent to the House, he would ask the indulgence of a moment, whilst he briefly stated a few of the reasons which have indicated the propriety of the present enquiry. The difficulties and dangers which attend the navigation of our Northwestern Lakes; the exposures to which the lives, the health, and the property of individuals, as well as the property of the Government, are subjected; the frequent losses which are sustained, both by the public and by individuals, in encountering a navigation of nearly eight hundred miles in extent, from the head of Lake Erie to the head of Lake Michigan, which is difficult, if not dangerous, even in the most favorable seasons of the year; indeed, the utter impracticability of navigating some of our most northerly lakes and straits, during the Winter months, Mr. W. said, all conspired to render it an object of no inconsiderable moment, not only to the inhabitants of that country, but to the Government itself, to effect as speedily as possible, a safe channel of communication across the peninsula of that Territory.

This object once accomplished, together with that of the Illinois Canal, for the construction of which, the Government has already made a large, if not an ample provision, you not only avoid the necessity, in time of war, as well as peace, of transporting every description of property, destined for the supply of your Northwestern and Western ports, through a long chain of narrow straits, which bring you within musket shot of the British shore; as well as the dangers of a boisterous lake navigation, to which I have just adverted; but you have at once a safe and easy inland communication, upon nearly the whole line of your Northern and Northwestern frontier, extending from New York to the Mississippi.

I present this subject, Mr. Speaker, the more confidently, because it is not trammelled by those constitutional objections which have been heretofore urged against similar propositions from the States. The whole route of this contemplated canal is within the limits of a Territory, over which the United States exercise the exclusive sovereignty; and within which, the United States are the principal owners of the soil. To such as may not have adverted to the subject, who are not intimately acquainted with the geography of that country, and the facilities with which the object may be accomplished, the item of expense might, at first, seem to be an objection. Careful examinations, however, have been made by a number of our most scientific and intelligent citizens, who hesitate not to say, that a canal may be constructed across that peninsula, at less expense than any one of similar extent which has ever been attempted in the Union.

If, therefore, to facilitate the intercourse between the different sections of the United States; if to render the transportation of property both cheap and safe; if to enhance the value of the public domain, by improving it, and thereby inviting to it a healthful and enterprising population; if to give stability to your frontier settlements in that quarter, and add strength to an extended and defenceless frontier, be legitimate objects for Congressional legislation, and worthy the consideration of the Government—then, sir, I may indulge the hope that the resolutions which I have had the honor of submitting, will be favorably received by the House, and will obtain a direction to that Committee from whose investigations, not only the citizens of the Territory, whom I have the honor to represent, who feel a deep interest in the subject, but the Government itself, may anticipate beneficial results.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The remainder of the day was spent in debate upon a bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive. This was a private bill, providing for remunerating the claimant for the lost time of a slave impressed into the service of the United States, at New Orleans, and who was wounded, and also for hospital charges.

The bill having been read, together with the report of the Committee of Claims in the case,

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that the Committee of Claims, in the report just read, assume it as a principle, that the United States' Government it not bound in any case to pay for slaves injured or lost; because they are not considered as property. A principle like this (said Mr. L.) is one of the most serious importance, not only to my constituents, but to all those who are interested in this species of property, throughout a large and very important portion of these United States. Slaves not property! What are they then? If not property, they are free: if they are not our property, we have no right to their service: if they are not property, the whole foundation on which the Constitution of this Union rests, is shaken. And is it by a by-blow like this, that so important a principle is to be established? I trust not. I trust that the Representatives of those States who are so happy, yes sir, I say so happy, as not to possess any of this species of property, will not, by sanctioning such a principle, lay a foundation for that discontent, for that jealousy, for that division, and for all those most serious consequences which must result from such a decision. The sum in this bill is nothing; it is not to be spoken of—it is not for that I now address this House; but I should basely betray the duty I owe to those who have entrusted their interests to my hands, did I not protest against the admission of a principle like that advanced in this report. Indeed, sir, it can scarcely be believed, that the Committee of Claims intended to establish it. The terms on which we entered into the social compact, and without which it would never have been formed, the laws which have been passed, and the treaties made under it, must all have prevented their coming to this conclusion; and, independent of these, the laws, not of the Southern States only, but in those very quarters of the continent where such an opinion seems now to be held—the laws of those States would have taught them that this opinion could not properly be held. How long is it since, in those very States, the laws which considered them to be as much property, as any other article, have been repealed? In New York, within the year—in other States, they still exist. It would be well, therefore, for gentlemen who might be inclined to favor the doctrines of this report, to look at home, and see whether, by voting for it, they do not sustain a principle as much at war with the laws of their own States, as it is with the Constitution and laws of the United States. With all this evidence before them, I can scarcely believe it to have been the deliberate intention of the respectable Committee, to declare that slaves were not the property of their masters: yet, whatever may have been their intention, their language is but too plain; the whole tenor of the report admits of no other conclusion. I move you, therefore, an amendment to the bill.

[The amendment of Mr. L. went to introduce a clause allowing the claim for the injury done to the slave, and for medical attendance on him.]

Mr. WHITTLESEY, a member of the Committee of Claims, and who had reported the bill under consideration, spoke in reply. He said he extremely regretted that the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON) had thought proper to exhibit, in the discussion of this question, so much spirit and warmth of feeling. It is a question, said he, that ought to be decided dispassionately, on its own intrinsic merits, without awaking sectional feelings or jealousies; and he trusted that his (Mr. L's) appeal to Southern gentlemen to rally round his standard, would not, on this occasion, be responded to by them. He might assuredly have abstained from charging the Committee with falsehood, and with having introduced into the report any sentiment or expression, which has necessarily provoked this debate. The Committee studiously avoided touching the question which the gentleman apprehends is so vitally important to the slave-holder. The whole of his argument is based on false premises, and his deductions are of course erroneous. He takes it for granted, that the Committee have said "that slaves are not property." In this he is mistaken; there is no such position taken in the report. They have said, that "slaves are not put on the footing of property, and paid for, when lost to the owner in the public service." Can the gentleman disprove the truth of this assertion, by recurring to a single case, where the Government has paid for a slave lost in the service? When the gentleman appeals to the passions of the Committee, and presses upon its consideration that the Committee of Claims have, in this instance, advanced new and alarming doctrines, it behooves him to look into former reports, and ascertain from them the sentiments of former Committees, when deciding on similar questions. The Committee of Claims gave to this subject the most unremitted attention, and did not content themselves with examining the printed reports, but they also carefully examined all the manuscript reports, from the commencement of the last war; nay, they went still farther; they sent to the Register of the Treasury, and inquired of him whether there were any instances, during the Revolutionary war, where slaves had been paid for by the Government, and the answer was, there were none. It cannot be supposed that, during that long and arduous struggle, when the whole energies of the country were put in requisition, there were no slaves in the service, nor that some of them were not slain in battle, or otherwise lost to the owners. For the information of the Committee, and to remove any impressions which may have been made by the argument of the gentleman, that the present report contains novel principles, Mr. W. said, he would turn their attention to such other reports which had a bearing on the question now under consideration.

Mr. W. said, the first case his researches had enabled him to find, was that of Andrew Montgomery, reported at the first Session of the Fourteenth Congress, and recorded in the fourth vol. manuscript reports, page 160. Montgomery was a Lieutenant in the Rifle Corps, and, at the battle of Fort Mims, his waiter, a slave, was killed, or captured. The Committee said: "It is conceived the United States ought not to be liable for the value of the slave, if he should be killed, or by any other accident be lost to the owner. If compensation were to be made, it would have the effect of compelling the United States to become the warrantor of the value of the servants, instead of making a reasonable allowance for the hire of a waiter."

The next case was that of William P. Lawrence, same Session, manuscript reports, vol. fourth, page 186. Lawrence was a Surgeon in the Army, and, on the return of the Tennessee Militia, he was ordered to remain at Bogue Chitto, in the State of Louisiana; and attend upon the soldiers who were afflicted with a contagious disease. Nurses could not be obtained, either from the line of the army or the inhabitants. Dr. Lawrence was obliged to put his slave into the hospital to nurse the sick, where he contracted the same disease, and died. The claim was rejected, on the ground that the United States were not liable to pay for the slave. The Committee of Claims, at this Session of Congress, consisted of Messrs. Yancey of North Carolina, Alexander of Ohio, Goodwyn of Virginia, Davenport of Connecticut, Lysle of Pennsylvania, Stanford of North Carolina, and Chipman of Vermont.

The third case is that of Basil Shaw, first Session, Fifteenth Congress, vol. fourth, page 396. Shaw was an Assistant Adjutant General, and took his slave into the service with him, who was killed by a cannon shot on the morning of the eighth of January, 1815, while in the service, and attending to his duty. The Committee, in their report, say: "They are decidedly of the opinion that Congress is under no obligation whatever to remunerate the petitioner—no principle of legislation is perhaps better settled than this, that, for such losses, Government cannot be liable." The Committee, at this Session, consisted of Messrs. Williams of North Carolina, Rich of Vermont, Bateman of New Jersey, McCoy of Virginia, Huntington of Connecticut, Schuyler of New York, and Walker of Kentucky. The case was again presented at the first Session, Sixteenth Congress, and the like decision made. The Committee, at this Session, consisted of Messrs. Williams, Rich, McCoy, Moore, of Pennsylvania, Culbreth of Maryland, Edwards of Connecticut, and Metcalfe of Kentucky.

The fourth case is that of Robert Evans, first Session, Fifteenth Congress, manuscript reports, fourth vol. page 473. Evans was a Captain in General Coffee's Brigade, stationed at New Orleans in 1814 and '15. His slave, a waiter, died from fatigue attending on the sick, and from exposure. The Committee said, in this case, "if he had been killed in battle, the petitioner would not be entitled to any compensation."

The fifth case is that of Jacob Purkill, first Session, Sixteenth Congress, first vol. page 32. Purkill resided in Kentucky, and hired his slave to Willis, to descend the river to New Orleans. On his arrival he was impressed by General Jackson, and put into the Swamp, where, some of the witnesses said, he labored while sunk into the mud up to his hips. He contracted a disease, and died. The Committee said, if the facts were established, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the Negro contracted the disease of which he died, whilst in the service of the United States, it would be considered consequential damages, for which the petitioner would not be entitled to pay.

There was another case, which was decided by the first Session, Seventeenth Congress, but, Mr. W. said, his minutes did not enable him to give the facts.

It will be seen by these reports, said Mr. W., that the decisions had been uniform, that slaves had not been put on the footing of property, and paid for, when lost to the owner in the public service; and that there was no distinction in the reports between those cases where the slave was taken into the service by the master, and where he was impressed into it. He denied the right of the Government to impress slaves, and said, therein the interest of the master was amply protected. He said, the country was to be defended by free men, and he would advocate no principles which would enable them to stay at home, and send their slaves into the ranks of the Army, or which would compel the Government to impress them. Slaves can no more be impressed than minors—who are not liable to perform military duty; but suppose a minor, in the time of imminent danger, was in the service, would his parent or master, if an apprentice, have any claim on the Government for a remuneration for his loss, if such minor was killed or wounded in battle? No one will pretend that he would; and why not, if the master is to be compensated for the loss of, or for injury done to, his slave? The service of the minor is not the less valuable because he is white, and the parent or master is ordinarily entitled to it. The discussion of these topics is at all times unpleasant, and, in this instance, it is wholly unnecessary and gratuitous. So far as my information has extended, those in the non-slave holding States have for their brethren in the South the kindest feelings; they consider slavery to be a national evil, and are disposed to relieve the country from it, so far as meets the acquiescence of the slave-holder, and no farther. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has said, that the amount of money involved in his amendment is of no importance; if so, there is no necessity of adopting it: for no principle is involved which need alarm his fears; and, if there is any ground to apprehend danger from any quarter, it is to be found in his argument, and not in the report.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman says I have misunderstood the Committee, and that they do consider slaves as property. Well sir, if so why have they not allowed compensation for their injury? But, have I misunderstood the Committee? Have they not carefully employed, throughout their report, in every case (but one) where they speak of the slave of M. D'Aulivrie the word servant, and carefully avoided the word slave? [Here Mr. L. quoted the report.] Now, the gentleman tells us that the Committee have no where said that a slave is not property.

But they have said expressly, that they have not been considered by the Government as property which ought to be paid for when taken for public use. And the addition to the phrase in which it is said that they are not property, cannot qualify it, so as to lessen the effect of that allegation, and the sentence has precisely the same meaning as if it had read thus: "Slaves have never been considered by the Government as property, and therefore are not to be paid for." If they are property, of any description whatever, they must be paid for when taken for public use. The Constitution makes no distinction. It embraces all private property, of whatever nature. If Congress could distinguish, and say, this species of private property shall be compensated for, that shall not, the provision of the Constitution would be nugatory, and every species of property might, in its turn, become the subject of an exception. We must, then, argue upon the report, not upon the explanation of it, given by one of the members who made it.

But, should we adopt this explanation, is the difficulty removed? The same injustice, the same injury, the same danger remains. He says, they are not denied to be property, but they have a peculiar quality attached to them, which exonerates the United States from the obligation of paying for them, when they are taken for the public service. What this circumstance is, he does not explain; but, to say any thing of this nature exists, is to take from this species of property one of those qualities which constitutes its chief value; Property that may be taken by the public, without any obligation of compensating for it is to make the owner a holder at will; and, besides its unconstitutionality, is an absurdity in terms. The holder is, then, no longer the owner, but the mere possessor at the pleasure of another, who may, at pleasure, deprive him of his possession. Nor is the difficulty lessened by saying, as, I think, has been done, that slaves cannot be lawfully impressed into the public service. The act of seizing any property for public use, is founded on necessity. It is a wrongful act, for which compensation is due, and the Constitution declares that this compensation shall, in all cases, be given. If we say, then, that no compensation is due, where the taking was ill-gal, we declare that it shall not be afforded in the very case in which the Constitution directs it to be made.

The report, then, whether explained according to the version of the gentleman from Ohio, or considered according to the plain meaning of its terms, asserts either that we have no property in our slaves, or that it may be taken from us without compensation; either of which positions are too injurious to our interests, and too subversive of our rights, to pass without animadversion. Would to heaven, sir, that any other construction could be put on this proceeding; most gladly would I adopt it: but it is too plain, too palpable. Every slave-holder who should see, what I trust, however, he will never see, its confirmation by this House, would consider all security for his property at an end, and he would justly reproach those to whom he had confided his interests, with a base dereliction of duty, were it to pass without opposition. Once establish this as a precedent; show that slaves, whether they be considered as property or not, may be taken whenever public utility requires it, without compensation, and the consequences may easily be foreseen. There are those who probably may think that public utility may be promoted by taking them all.

The honorable member from Ohio has been pleased to say, that I have charged the committee with falsehood—he is under an erroneous impression. I was not guilty of the indecorum which such a term would imply, nor have I, in any manner, insinuated the charge; but I must be permitted to arraign the deductions which would deprive one of my constituents of his property, and endanger the best interests of the State I represent. Neither have I appealed, as it is stated, to the passions of any section of the Union. With more reason might I complain of an attempt to enlist prejudice against me by an allegation that I have treated a committee of this House with disrespect. Sir, I make no address to the passions. I demand strict justice and constitutional right—I ask no favor—and if the consequence of denying this right, and adopting the principles of the report have been adverted to, they have not been enforced as they might have been; because they could not but excite feelings that ought to be suppressed. This case has been assimilated to that of an apprentice—but there is no further similarity than this: that, if the apprentice be below the age for serving in the militia, and he should, notwithstanding, be forced to serve, the master would be entitled to compensation for the loss of his time; but if the age of service should arrive before the expiration of his apprenticeship, the claim of the country must be preferred; the master knew, when he took the apprentice, that he was liable to be called on at a certain age, and it must have entered into the consideration of the contract. But both the apprentice and master are free citizens, liable to be called on for the defence of their country; and, enjoying the benefit of that for which they fight, each must take the risk, and neither is entitled to compensation. But what application can this have to a slave who, while his master is serving in the militia, is taken by force to do the drudgery of the camp? If the ox, impressed in the service, should be killed, compensation, would be given: the slave is precisely on the same footing. We are told, however, that there is a difference; that, though cattle may be impressed, slaves cannot; that they are something that is property, and at the same time not property. But the gentleman cannot draw any intelligible distinction: they are either property, or they are free.

But by way of confirming the doctrine he has advanced, the gentleman resorts to precedents, and he has quoted a string of them, to the number of five or six. His proposition is, that slaves are not to be put on the footing of property, and are not to be paid for as such; and his proof is, that persons who have voluntarily put their slaves in the public service, and exposed them to danger, have not been paid for them if lost! How do such precedents apply to a case where the slave was taken and impressed, contrary to the will of his owner? The owners, in the gentleman's precedents, exposed their slaves for hire, and, in so doing, calculated the risks of the adventure, and took them on himself. But this is a totally different case.

There is another reflection which I am bound to notice. He asks, shall the slave holder be allowed to stay at home and fight the battles of his country by his slaves? No, sir! But, had the gentleman been present, he would have seen that no one staid at home; that no man sheltered himself behind the body of his slave. To a man, the free inhabitants faced the danger where it was most imminent; they did it cheerfully, successfully. No slave was permitted to join in the honorable task—he was taken for servile labor; the patriotic duty of repelling the enemy was performed by freemen, and they performed it nobly. The gentleman's expression implies a reflection on my constituents which they do not deserve, and which I cannot permit to pass, without remark.

[Mr. WHITTLESEY rose to explain. What he had said, was meant merely as applying to the general argument, and had no allusion whatever to the particular case to which the gentleman applied it. He had never meant for a moment, to say, that the slave owners staid at home when New Orleans was attacked. He knew the facts too well to say or think so.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, however general the expression, it was one that might be construed into an unmerited sarcasm against his constituents, which he was therefore bound to notice. He was happy, however, to hear that nothing of this kind was intended. He once more called the attention of the House to the serious consequences of confirming the report. Allow the claim, he said, and you do no more than justice; reject it on these principles, and you shake the Union.

Mr. FORT said he rose for the purpose of bringing to the notice of the House a single fact. The gentleman from Louisiana had put the matter on its true footing. If this slave had been impressed and lost, those who impressed him must be held to pay. This principle, so far from never having been acknowledged or acted upon by this Government, had been expressly acknowledged and acted upon in a very memorable instance. The gentleman from the Committee on Claims said, that payment had never been made by this Government for slaves lost, and had quoted a string of precedents to prove it; but of all the cases cited by the gentleman, only one had any bearing on the present bill, and that was the case where the sickness of the slave, contracted in the service, was not certainly proved to have been the cause of his death; but it was this doubt only that was the true reason why the slave had not been paid for, and not any doubt whether the slave was to be reckoned as property. But the instance to which he had at first alluded, was one that could not be denied or doubted. In our Treas-ty with Great Britain, this Government openly claims payment for slaves forcibly taken away, and the claim has been allowed, and large sums paid by the British Government on this very principle. If this is not an acknowledgment of the principle by this Government, I am at a loss to conceive what can be; and surely our own Government is as much bound by it as the Government of a foreign country.

Mr. MCCOY, (of the Committee of Claims) said, that this was a delicate subject, and he could not help thinking that the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana was, in its practical tendency, more injurious to the interest of the Southern States than that advocated by the Committee. The Government, (said Mr. McC.) does not pretend any legal right to take and use this species of property, and he was not willing to coerce its employment. He was one of those who would not willingly have a single slave in or about the Army at all. He thought our soldiers should all be freemen. That Government in its treatment of slaves considered them as something more than property. The Constitution does the same—it considers them not only as property, but as persons also. The Government has no authority whatever to call slaves into the public military service. There may be justice in some cases in allowing for their loss: but he, for one, had rather see all the slave owners of the South suffer some loss than grant claims of this kind, and thus sanction the principle that Government has a right to impress slaves into the service. He knew that the States in which this kind of property existed had their own laws, by which slaves were made property in the most complete sense of that term. But these were not laws of the General Government. The Government has no control over slaves—and he would rather lose a slave entirely than admit that the General Government had a right to take it. So far was the Government from pretending to this, or admitting the principle now contended for, when the law of 1816 made provisions for property lost in the late war, a gentleman from one of the Southern States proposed an amendment, which went to include this species of property with other descriptions of it: but the House, on full consideration, rejected the amendment. This fact had a strong influence on the decision of the Committee of Claims. They took the law of 1816 as their guide—and they found pleasure in thus being able to avoid the decision of the abstract question. The subject had not been lightly considered by the committee. He would not, however, go farther into the argument. The House well knew he was not in the habit of talking, and he would conclude by repeating his conviction that the House would do more injury to the slave-holding States, by sanctioning the principle that the General Government have the right to impress a slave, than by refusing the present amendment.

Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, thought that, instead of cherishing a wish to avoid the question involved in the amendment, it was, on the contrary, very desirable that it should be fully presented for decision. Let it be considered, let it be fully debated, and let it be finally acted on. He thought somewhat differently from his honorable friend from Louisiana, as to the present case, not presenting all the points necessary to ensure a full and correct investigation: but if the facts are as stated by the member from Louisiana, and not contested by the member from Ohio, then the case is fully made out; but he apprehended, having once paid some attention to this question, that the record evidence will not support the issue proper to be made. But, yielding in this my opinion, or rather my knowledge of the facts to that of others, and inasmuch, too, as this point is not contested in the report, I will assume, that all that is requisite is embraced; and when the decision has gone forth to the country, let it be distinctly understood that all the material facts sustain the issue.

It may be objected that the amount of compensation is uncertain, the amount of damage resting alone on the opinions of two persons. All objections on this point should be yielded, when it is recollected that the sum is fixed by the declarations of disinterested neighbors and respectable men, upon oath, duly administered by a competent officer; and to this add the certificate of a physician, more particularly describing the wounds received, and agreeing with the witnesses as to the quantum of damage.

I did prefer that another case, which had heretofore been before the House, and which must again be before it, should have been the one on which this discussion should have arisen: But, Mr. Chairman, the member from Louisiana has thought otherwise; and that it was his duty to go fully into the discussion at this time, and on the case now before the committee; and, as before remarked, the member from Ohio had met and discussed it as presented, I shall not, therefore, change it: I will, therefore, take for granted that the claim is based upon the facts that the petitioner owned the slave; that he was impressed into the service of the Government; that in that service the damage claimed was actually sustained. The point then is, whether this be such property as contemplated in the Constitution, the conversion of which to "public use," calls for "just compensation." Gentlemen tell us that there is something alarming in the discussion of this question. I tell the gentlemen, in reply, that if there be something alarming in it, the greater is the necessity, and the more imperious is the duty to investigate and finally decide it. If it be an unsettled question, and there exists danger, whether real or imaginary, in approaching it, the propriety is obvious of having a speedy determination of it; therefore, this is the proper time for discussion; for when can there be a more auspicious moment? The moment is auspicious, because it is now brought before us; and what can be gained by avoiding it? It is due to ourselves not to shrink from the discharge of duty, whether pleasant or painful in its performance. Its very character has called the attention of the People of this Union to it, and it is due to their good sense, it is due to their repose, and to the prosperity of all, not to a portion only, that it should be met, and calmly and thoroughly investigated and decided.

I shall, therefore, proceed, not fearing nor anticipating consequences. And, sir, could it be presented to Congress for adjudication or legislative regulation, whether the slave was the property of the master or not, I could readily conceive that the most appalling consequences would ever attend its progress here; and, sir, though I have all the confidence that patriotism can demand, in the action of this House or of Congress, acting within its legitimate sphere of delegated powers, yet, sir, the very act of its transcending that limit, would destroy that confidence. It matters not that this step should be on a point connected with this particular class of rights, delicate as it has ever been considered, and on which the jealousy of so large a portion of the People of this country is properly excited, or whether it should be on any other. The first act of assumed unconstitutional right here, is in violation of the charter that binds us together, and therefore becomes a usurpation; and any usurpation is alarming, whether in this Government or any other, but more especially in this.

Is, then, the question to be raised here, whether this class of people is property? Sir, it cannot, nor will not, I hope, be gravely asked or answered; and to my mind it is only involved by your granting the indemnity, or by your refusal of it. If granted incidentally, it is decided; though intrinsically you gave no greater validity to a y perfect and complete : but if refused, you on a portion of the People of this Union, that have repeatedly granted to another portion, the fifth article of the amendments of the from having due force and execution ; for, hings, it declares, "nor shall private property : public use, without just compensation." If his "just compensation," we must either say late the Constitution, or else you decide that of property. Are you then prepared to make n ? I think not. And, although the member ravelly insists that slaves are persons; yet he rly denied that persons may not be property. it we look to, to ascertain what is or what is ? It is to law ; it is the creature of the law ; etent authority provides that persons are pro- instantly become so. Such is the principle this question. Slaves are property by laws ss can neither enforce nor avoid ; it can nei- , nor diminish, the right vested in the master ective States within which this people exist. becomes our duty ? Is it not that we should this inquiry, and look alone to the acts of States, either in their constitutional form of , or in their statutory provisions ? Unques- will. You cannot, therefore, if disposed so le that the slave is not the property of the ain States of this confederacy ; but you can e acts of those States which stamp the cha- he slave is to bear. The States, therefore, o grant you the power, before you can exer- ht. I will take this as my position on which decision of this question ; and I had thought ber from Ohio, even, would have given me, east, the sanction of his opinion ; but I think ded, to some extent, even to approach it.

not greatly mistaken, the concession of this s essential to the preservation of any species belonging to the citizens of one State, as well f any other. The right to the horses, carts, rain, of a non-slaveholding State, is secured ipal regulations of such State ; of these they rived without indemnity. If, then, the laws ern States (say the Commonwealth of Vir- please) have made no distinction between f their citizens relative to slaves, and other ely chattels, how can Congress make it ? In nce before you, you propose to pay for the se of the petitioner, and refuse to make in- their driver. The laws of Louisiana secure s as completely their right to their slaves as eir carts and horses, or any species of pro- t right have you, then, to draw a distinction ? his question is where it should be ; permit and your Government is firm upon its basis ; d the consequences I need not here present . Sir, if it availed any thing, I would most gle my regrets of the existence of this blot utchcon. Ay, sir, I would call it the curse try. But I would stop here. I would not, uasiasts of the day, declaim against that which nedied, and thereby render still more heavy they profess to alleviate. If contentment foundation for happiness, to disturb a peace t the province of a philanthropist. Idle, d be the attempt, if resorted to here, of ex- slave owner in odious colors. The intelli- age in which we live, would recur to causes and the means of even the fathers of the ation to avert, that fixed upon that people n this hemisphere ; and so far from detract- rtues, or religion, if you please, of the pre- n master, the present mode of treatment towards that people, that universally prevails in the South- ern States, does more credit to the human heart, and gives a stronger practical result towards the amelioration of their condition, than all the theories rantingly pro- claimed by the zealots of the day, whose voice is heard every where, but whose judgment and discretion are seen no where.

This digression will find its apology in the declaration tauntingly made, "that white blood was worth some- thing." The whites of the South, in all the struggles that this nation has had to encounter, have never been found wanting ; their blood has so freely flown, that to them it might be said they gave no value to "white blood!" Sir, whenever danger threatened, they never calculated the cost ; property, comfort, life—all have been freely offered on the altar of their country's rights. This, sir is no boon to the chivalry and patriotism of the South ; you cannot recur to any portion of the history of this country, where their deeds are not recorded, and their disinterestedness has ever been proverbial.

But to recur to the question. We are told that there is no authority to impress a slave ; that it is in violation of law ; that this is a species of property above the law. I grant it, sir, and the very same principle I claim as equally applicable to any description of private property. Can gentlemen point me to a code of law regulating im- pressments? None such exists. The very term indicates its character. Its law is power, and its action necessity. It is not, nor ever can be, based upon right ; and the very clause of the Constitution, which I have before re- cited, gives not the right, but recognizes the power, and enforces remuneration. This clause was not ingrafted into the Constitution, to delegate to the Federal Govern- ment a power not previously possessed, but to compel the fulfilment of the demands of justice—a power inherent in all Governments from necessity called into action. All Governments claim the power, but few grant the indem- nity : ours, based upon principles of stern justice, pro- vided for the indemnity, in its fundamental law, but left as it ever should be left—the regulation of the power to be controlled by the exigencies of the case ; and these never should be less than the sternest necessity. Sir, all impressment is above the law : all impressment is a tres- pass against individual right ; necessity, therefore, be- comes the law, and its operation should only be, when for the benefit of the whole it becomes necessary to sacrifice individual interest. Sir, in the case before you, I cannot anticipate a denial of the existence of such necessity : if it ever did exist any where, it surely did exist on this occasion. The case then is made out ; the strong arm of the Government has been exerted to take from a pri- vate citizen his individual property. Can your justice deny the compensation which your power enables you to withhold ! The impressment was from necessity ; the in- demnity is from the law. Sir, I can never believe, when a case is presented as this is, in this Government of de- fined rights and limited powers, that any doubt can exist of the nature of the decision ; and I think I may claim the co-operation of the member from Ohio, as I think he has conceded, if the claim was for property, even this species, if he could consider this so, would grant the in- demnity.

[Mr. WHITTLESEY interposed, and denied having made such admission.]

Mr. O. said, I am sorry to have misunderstood, and certainly did not intend to misrepresent the gentleman. The House, therefore, is called upon to decide the ques- tion. And, sir, if the House can, this country will not, turn a deaf ear to the prayer of this petitioner, and say to him, it is true your slave was seized without your consent, which inflicted on you a loss, but we had the power to commit the act, and our justice does not compel us to in- demnify you. This would surely be at war with any thing that has hitherto been done by the Government of these United States.

Sir, I repeat it, if the States make no distinction between slaves and other property, you have no right to make any; you have no right to refuse indemnity; you are bound to grant it. But we are told that Congress has heretofore purposely avoided the discussion of this question. I am anxious that it should never be avoided again. If it is an unsettled question in this country, it is full time that it was settled. I cannot see, therefore, why this is not a proper period for its settlement, and I demand it at the hands of this Government. I therefore appeal to this House to make this indemnity; and the gentleman from Ohio will pardon me when I say that his string of precedents is unhappily selected; none but one has any the remotest application: to those, however, the gentleman from Louisiana has replied. The last mentioned one was the case of the slave from Kentucky impressed, put to labor in the mud, and died; the damages determined by the committee to be "consequential," therefore the Government not liable. This precedent ought not to be regarded; the slave was impressed; the impressment caused him to be put in the mud, the mud caused his death; what is then the conclusion? I need not draw it.

I do hope that we will act, and that we will justly and constitutionally decide this point: if thus decided, all will be right, if otherwise, the "damages will be consequential."

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, said, that he had not fully understood the case for which this bill is to provide. The gentleman from Alabama had expressed some doubt as to the main fact, which was the impressment of the slave. This Mr. M. considered as the point on which the decision must turn. If Government impressed the slave, Government must pay for his loss of time, but, if his master voluntarily took him into the ranks, he must submit to the loss. He hoped, therefore, that the bill might be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, in order that fuller testimony as to the main point might be exhibited to that committee. As matters now stood, gentlemen seemed to him to be arguing about a case which was rather imagined than proved. To argue with any effect, they must have all the necessary facts first clearly ascertained. And to this end, he moved the recommitment of the bill.

[The CHAIRMAN decided that such a motion could not be received till the Committee of the Whole had risen and reported.]

Mr. STRONG said, that he had risen for the purpose of recurring to a fact, in legislation, which seemed to have escaped the notice of gentlemen. It was a singular circumstance in relation to our slave population, that, up to the year 1814, there was no law which protected them from military service. Previous to that year, the law of enlistment permitted officers to enrol "effective able bodied men," but, in December, 1814, the law was changed, and since that time none may be enlisted, but "free effective able bodied men." Before that time slaves might be enlisted, but since that time they cannot. The inference is of deep interest to all the slave-holding States. If it be a fair inference from what he had stated, that the intendment of our previous Legislatures had been that slaves should form a peculiar species of property, which was placed without the reach of military law, so that they, like horses, oxen, and other chattels, might not be taken for military use; then the explanatory statute of 1814 would lose its effect, if the doctrine, now advanced by gentlemen, in support of this bill, was to be admitted. If such was their wish, if they did intend to put this species of property over, within the reach of the military power of the United States, so be it. It was for them to judge of. This was the great question involved in the present discussion: Shall slave property, like horses and oxen, be placed without the reach of the arm of military government or not? If the gentleman take the former ground and agree to pay for the loss of this slave, then the whole mass of slave population is put within the reach of the Government. For himself, he did not now say that he did not agree to take either of these courses.

The analogy in the Constitution between slaves and horses, and other cattle, was, that it was property which could not be taken by the United States, and if this be settled, and a slave is illegally seized and impressed by a military officer, the owner must look for his remedy not to the United States Government, for it never sanctioned the impressment, but to the individual officer who had impressed the slave without its authority. He, and he alone, is responsible for the act. He repeated that the great question for gentlemen now to consider, was, whether slaves shall or shall not be turned over to the military power of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of contributing to any excitement which the debate might have occasioned: for, if the question was really a difficult and critical one, (which he did not perceive) it ought only to be approached with a greater degree of calmness and deliberation.

Now, sir, I am not prepared to admit that Congress is about to decide (whatever may be the fate of the claim before you,) whether slaves be property or not; because, so long as this Confederacy lasts, and the Constitution that created it, Congress has no power to settle any such question, and there is an end of the argument. The question, therefore, before the House, is not whether slaves be property or not, because the mere statement of the proposition involves an absurdity in its terms; but whether there be any thing in this peculiar species of property which should deprive its owners of a just claim to indemnity, when injured or destroyed in the public service.

To sustain the negative of this question, the gentleman from Ohio had relied on several precedents, nearly all of which he (Mr. H.) considered as inapplicable. For it would be recollected, in the case he had cited, in which Congress had refused to indemnify the owners either for the loss or for injury to their slaves in the public service, was where they had been taken by their masters into the army as their servants, for which their owners received a full equivalent in pay, clothing, and subsistence, with a perfect understanding of the risk which their slaves were to encounter. But this does not touch the question of coercive impressment, made of a slave, not as a soldier, but as a laborer, precisely as any domestic animal or implements of husbandry might be taken for the public use. Claims of this description could, in his view of the subject, be paid without affirming any power of the Federal Government to enlist or to make coercive levies, by way of conscription, of the slaves of the South. On the contrary, he thought the payment of this claim sustained the converse of this proposition, and proved that the Government had no control over slaves as military persons; but took them for the mere purposes of labor, as property, and, for their use or injury, their owners were to be paid in this light alone.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] need feel no apprehension, and may reserve, for some other occasion, the sympathy he has kindly offered; because, as he supposes, the people of the South would be alarmed at any thing which looked like a recognition of the doctrine that the Federal Government had any military power over the slaves in this Union. We know well enough that no such power will ever be exercised, either by enlistment or compulsory levies; but we know that, those cases in which we should be most willing slaves shall be used, their labor will and be coerced into the public service, and that is a fact of actual invasion. No matter what abstract you may settle here, or what may be the legis- is House, you cannot control the over-ruling of war.

An enemy was to land at the mouth of the River, at Tybee Island, for example, and the a temporary work on the bank of the river ted to save the country, and that this work o be effected in sufficient time by the labor es in its neighborhood, what commander, fit uted with the defence of a country, would coerce their labor into the public service if it oluntarily contributed? This would not be a quision for troops, but an impressment of pro- the public use, and would grow out of that ssity, which is superior to all law, and forms civilians call the eminent domain, which bel Governments, and is founded on the irresist- e and impulse of self preservation.

we maintain that you can indemnify an owner or injury of his slave in the public service, ablishing the position that you are entitled to es of the slave under all military exigencies arise. We do not say that in principle you right; but we do say that, whenever in point exercise it, by taking this property for the , we are entitled to indemnity, and we are wil- e the occurrence of these impressments to ties growing out of an invasion of the coun- e exigencies of which no human legislation e.

HITTLESEY said, it was important for the to consider what was the real question before e gentlemen who supported the amendment om South Carolina, Mr. HAMILTON) persisted the committee determine whether slaves are

The Committee of Claims have not submit- uestion by their report. Its discussion and de- ferefore, is wholly unnecessary. The question e adopt the amendment, and give to the peti- an injury done to his slave, a sum of money ad in the bill? Although the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OWEN,] seems to think that the question whether "a slave is property or not," is not necessarily raised in this case; still he maintains that this is an auspicious period to discuss and decide it, and his inference is, that, if it is decided in the affirmative, the amendment is to be adopted, and the money contained in it is to be paid. When this case was investigated by the committee, and when the report was drawn, that honorable gentleman was himself a member of the Committee of Claims; and, (Mr. W. said,) if his recollection did not greatly mislead him, he (Mr. O.) agreed to the report. He did not then entertain the opinion, that, on the abstract question, slaves were property; this was a case where relief ought to be granted. The gentleman says, I have not, in my argument, admitted that slaves are property; for his gratification I will admit, that, for certain purposes, they are not only so considered, but that they are so in fact: but, when I make this admission, he must concede that, in a political point of view, they are considered to be something more than mere property, and are not reduced to the level of oxen and horses, where the gentleman from Louisiana has placed them, for the purpose of carrying his amendment. But, with this admission, it does not follow, as a matter of course, that the amendment ought to be adopted. The Committee of Claims have uniformly been governed by the principles established by the law of the 9th of April, 1816, and their decisions have been sustained by the House. The whole subject, when the bill was under consideration, was fully discussed. It was soon after the termination of the war, a period the most favorable to do ample justice to those who had suffered by it. Relief is granted by the principles of that law, which, it is believed, have never been extended to the sufferers in any other country. It is stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McCOR] that a distinguished member from Georgia [Mr. FOSBERT] offered an amendment during the passage of the bill, to include cases similar to the one now before the committee, which amendment was rejected. Do gentlemen reflect on the consequences which must follow from innovating on the principles heretofore established? There are a vast number of cases, involving immense sums of money, which have been rejected, by the provisions of that law. These cases will, all of them, be pressed again, if the amendment is adopted; and they are equally entitled to relief with the one now before us. There are cases where well and elegantly furnished houses were occupied by our officers and soldiers, and the furniture materially injured or destroyed; as, also, where other personal property was taken, for which no relief has been granted. Are gentlemen disposed to pay these, and similar claims?

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FORT] supposes he furnishes a precedent for this case, in the provision made in the treaty of Ghent; wherein, the British Government stipulated to pay for slaves taken away by her troops during the war. Mr. W. said, it seemed to him that the provision alluded to, most strongly militated against the position taken by the gentlemen who advocate the amendment; for, if slaves could have been considered, by the distinguished individuals who negotiated that treaty, as simply being personal property, why was not an indemnity insisted on for losses sustained by the destruction or capture of other personal property? The gentleman will seek in vain for an instance where the Government of an invading army has paid for the destruction, or capture, by her troops, of the personal property of the citizens of the country invaded. Mr. W. concluded by saying he hoped the amendment would not be adopted.

Mr. KREMER said, that what he had this day heard advanced was so very extraordinary that it called on him to say something. What is this case? A man has had his slave taken by the Government of the United States, and employed in its service, and there wounded, if not destroyed. Shall the master be paid for it or not? This was the question, which some gentlemen seemed to think so terrible. The gentlemen say we must not touch it; but they do touch it, and they say the man must not be paid because a slave is not property. This is the logic of College-learned gentlemen. Now, for my own part, I do not care when or where this question is discussed. I am willing to meet it any where. The gentleman from New York [Mr. STROGGE] has told us that the officer of Government and not the Government must be responsible. Sir, this may do very well in a certain school, but it will never do in a school of justice! I can never consent to such a doctrine as that. I'm for putting the saddle on the right horse. If the servant of the Government acts unjustly and tyrannically, the Government must pay for it? Who ever heard of such an argument? The government not responsible! Why, even in the most despotic Governments such a notion was never heard of; but, in a Republican Government, like ours, it's intolerable. If ever there was a just claim before this House, this is one. And if the question is to be argued how far a slave is the property of his owner, I, for one, am willing to declare, before the whole world, that I believe a slave is as much the property of his master as any thing else that he owns.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that he had understood a gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMILTON,] as having advanced the opinion, that the right to take and employ a slave for the public service, arises out of the imminent necessity of a state of war. There was a very striking case, illustrative of this matter, which took place in 1814. Previous to that time no person had been allowed by law to be enlisted, unless he was over 21 years of age, or the consent of his master, if he was an apprentice, had been obtained in writing. But, at that disastrous hour, while sitting amidst the ruins of this capitol, Congress felt the necessity of raising armies to defend the country, then attacked on its sea coast, on its Northern frontier, and in the extreme West. Under the pressure of such a necessity, a law was passed, authorizing minors of 18 years to be enlisted, without the consent of their masters, and the same law was afterwards repeated, to the destruction of the contract by which a servant is bound to his master. Yet, even in that law, the contract was so far acknowledged, that a part of the bounty to which the recruit had a claim was required to be paid to his master. The injustice and the oppressive effect of this act, was pressed upon the House with very great force of argument by a large portion of the members from the Northern States. It was painted in colors as glowing as any which can possibly be used on the present occasion. But what did Congress do? Were they deterred by these arguments? Not at all. They passed the bill on the principle that necessity was above law, and they directed the servant to be enrolled without his master's consent. Some of these recruits fell in battle or by other casualties of the military service. But was such a thing ever heard of as the master of such an apprentice, coming to be indemnified for the loss of his servant's time, or the expense of medical attendance? Never. Yet gentlemen cannot show any valid distinction between such a case and that in this bill. The difference depends only on the degree of loss or hardship, and not at all on the principle. But, more: a servant with a team was forcibly impressed, and in the impressment the servant was slain. His master had a right to his service. He was taken not by law, but by the exigencies of war, contrary to the common rights of mankind; yet it was never so much as even pretended that the Government must pay for his loss. The present bill rests on the same principle; and if you allow the claim of D'Auterive, you must go back and include all such cases as those I have mentioned. Mr. T. concluded by saying that he had risen merely for the purpose of bringing these facts before the view of the committee. He should not further enter into the argument.

Mr. LITTLE, believing that gentlemen were not prepared, at this moment, to settle the question involved in this bill, moved that the Committee of the Whole now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

After an ineffectual attempt, by Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims, the motion of Mr. LITTLE prevailed, the committee rose and reported, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, JAN. 7, 1828.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were instructed by resolution, moved by Mr. LUMPKIN, on the 13th December, and by resolution, moved by Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, on the 18th of December, to enquire into the expediency and practicability of congregating the Indian tribes, now residing East of the Mississippi river, to the West of that river, and of establishing a government over them, &c. made a detailed report upon the subject, accompanied by the following bill, which was twice read, and committed:

"A Bill making appropriation to defray the expenses of certain Indians who propose to emigrate.

"Be it enacted, &c. That, to enable a deputation of the Chickasaw and other Indians, to be joined by such persons as the President of the United States may appoint for that purpose, to examine the country West of the Mississippi, for the purpose of selecting a portion of it for a permanent home, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid from any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated."

INDIAN GOVERNMENTS.

On the 3d instant, the Committee on the Judiciary was instructed "to inquire if any of the Indian tribes, within the territorial jurisdiction of any of the States, have organized an independent government, with a view to a permanent location in said States; and if they find that any attempt of the kind has been made, to inquire into the expediency of reporting to this House such measures as they may deem necessary to arrest such permanent location."

Mr. BARBOUR, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, observed to the House that this was a very important subject, requiring great labor, and involving many very delicate points, which should be approached with caution: that it belonged more appropriately to the Committee on Indian Affairs than to the Committee on the Judiciary: but that his opinion was that a select committee would be the best tribunal to act upon the subject: that if the Committee on the Judiciary were disposed to do so, the flood of business now upon their tables, would, of itself, prevent them from bestowing upon it that consideration which its importance merited; but that, in order to give the gentleman who introduced the inquiry [Mr. FORT, of Georgia] an opportunity of disposing of it in such a manner as he might select, he would ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the resolution be laid on the table.

This course was assented to by the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims inquire into the expediency of making provision for carrying into effect the resolution of the Congress of the United States, of Saturday, Oct. 4, 1777, that the Governor and Council of New-York be directed to erect a monument, at Continental expense, of the value of five hundred dollars, to the memory of the late Brigadier Herkimer, who commanded the militia of Tryon county, in the State of New-York, and was killed gallantly fighting in defence of the liberties of the State.

In submitting this resolution, Mr. HOFFMAN said, that he had offered this resolution in obedience to a duty which he owed to his own State, as well as to the memory of the deceased. If gentlemen examined the Journals of the Congress of the Revolution, they would find several different resolutions ordering monuments in commemoration of public services performed by the soldiers and patriots of that eventful day. A part of these monuments have been erected, and many gentlemen of this House have probably seen that which was voted to General Montgomery. Others, however, though ordered by Congress, had not been erected to this day. So far as the order in relation to General Herkimer was concerned, all Mr. H. now asked for, was simply an inquiry. He had at first intended to word his resolution in such a manner as to include all the other monuments which had been resolved upon, but not built. But, on reflection, he had concluded it better that the motion should proceed, if at all, from the Representatives of those States to which the deceased parties belonged. The duty of thus commemorating great and valuable public services, was a sacred one, and ought long since to have been performed. The question respecting a monument for General Herkimer had been referred to the Legislature of the State of New-York, but the duty certainly belonged to Congress, by whom it had been ordered, and it was desirable that it should be known as soon as possible, whether any thing would be done, in order that, if not, this act of patriotism might devolve, without delay, upon the Legislature of his own State.

The resolution was then agreed to.

CASE OF CAPTURED AFRICANS.

The bill from the Senate to authorize the cancelling of a bond therein mentioned, was twice read.

It having been moved that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole,

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR (Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary) expressed his conviction that the reference was wholly unnecessary. The Committee on the Judiciary had had the subject matter of this bill already before them, and had reported a bill to the House, of which, he believed, this was a transcript, totidem verbis. The circumstances of the case he would state in a few words :

A vessel, called "the Antelope," had been captured by one of our own revenue officers, and brought into the port of Savannah, with a cargo of 140 African negroes. The vessel had been libelled, and claims had been set up on the part of certain Portuguese and Spaniards, for a portion of the slaves. One hundred of the negroes had been sent to Cape Mesurado, in Africa ; but 39 of them had been decreed to the Spanish claimants. The case had been some time before the Federal Courts of Georgia, and had been removed by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It had been pending, in all, about eight years. During the whole of that time, these unfortunate creatures had been detained in the custody of the Marshal, and in this interval, many of them had been married, and become heads of families—had been partially domesticated with us, and were desirous of remaining in this country. The Spanish claimants, however, (who resided in Cuba,) sent an order to have the whole number transported to that Island ; but a Southern gentleman, [Mr. WILDE, of Georgia,] a member of this House, not now in his seat, in a spirit of pure benevolence, and from no motives, whatever, of interest or selfishness, had, from mere kindness, bought out the Spanish claim, and paid all the expenses in the Courts, which were very heavy. By a regulation, however, of the Court in Georgia, he is bound to give a bond, to transport these negroes beyond the limits of the United States, and his prayer is, that the bond may be cancelled. The effect of granting it will be to leave these negroes and their children in the United States, instead of having them transported to Cuba, and he need submit no remarks to this House, either on the difference of treatment they would here experience from what they might expect there, or on the painful severity of breaking those near and tender ties which bind the husband to his wife, and the parent to his child. If the bond referred to were not cancelled, the transportation of the whole must inevitably take place. He presumed there could be but one feeling in the bosom of the House as to such an alternative, especially as the measure would be productive of no possible evil, while it went to mitigate that load, which, under any circumstances, must press but too heavily. He had, indeed, heard a suggestion whispered, that this bill was meant to cover the infamy of evading the law which prohibited the importation of slaves. Did he believe that it had the remotest possible connexion, he would be the last to countenance it on any other occasion, which went to increase the number of that unhappy population. But where there was no possible connexion with such a design, where the slave vessel had been captured by our own officer, and these unhappy people had been detained in the country in consequence of unforeseen litigation, and where a gentleman, in the pure kindness of his heart, had stepped forward, at an actual pecuniary sacrifice, to save them from being torn from each other, he could conceive of no reason why the House should refuse the request that this bill should go at once to its third reading.

Mr. MCCOY hereupon withdrew his motion to commit the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that the facts now stated in conversation might officially re-appear in the form of a report.

Mr. BARBOUR opposed the reference as unnecessary, and the question being taken, it was negatived.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said a few words on the importance of the question involved in the bill, and was proceeding farther, when

Mr. BARBOUR, disclaiming all desire of precipitation, and with a view to allow time for full inquiry, moved to lay the bill on the table.

CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The House then passed to the Orders of the Day, when the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive was again taken up, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONYER in the Chair, on that bill—the amendment of Mr. LIVINGSTON being still under consideration.

Mr. J. C. CLARK, of New York, said, being a member of the committee who reported the bill under consideration, and having assented to the report, he would claim the indulgence of the committee for a few moments, while he assigned the reasons which induced him to sanction the report. I regret, said Mr. C., that it should have been thought proper by honorable gentlemen, at this time, and on this subject, to enter into a grave discussion of the question whether slaves are properly. I regret that a sense of duty should have compelled my honorable friends from the South to start a point which I had imagined had long since been settled ; and I still more regret that this debate furnishes an opportunity of getting up, with new dresses and machinery, and for stage effect, a second edition of a serio-comico play, entitled the "Missouri Plot." Is the ghost of the Missouri Question again to be marched, with solemn and terrific aspect, through these halls? Is it again to "shake its gory locks at us," and, pointing with one hand to the North, and with the other to the South, and gazing its blood-shot eye on slavery, written on the escutcheon of the Constitution, to proclaim, with unearthly voice, "out damned spot?" I had imagined that this subject had received its quietus; that it had gone to the "tomb of the Capulets," and that its epitaph had been written "Requiescat in pace." Sir, is there any necessity, at this time, to disturb its repose? I think not. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. Some restless spirit—some future Catiline—appealing to the worst passions of his countrymen, will be found ready to "sound the trumpet, and wake its resurrection."

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

The honorable gentleman from Louisiana seemed to think, that, to deny the right of compensation in this case, would be to sap the foundations of the Constitution, and dissolve the Union. If such is to be the result, the subject should be approached with great caution, and discussed with temperance and moderation. I apprehend the gentleman is indebted more to his fancy than his judgment for his fearful forebodings, and that this question can be settled without doing violence to the Constitution, and, at the same time, preserve the just rights of the slave-holder. The gentleman from Alabama thought now was the proper time to settle the question. Sir, the question has long since been settled. If I understood the gentleman from South Carolina, he seemed to think that this House had no right or power to settle the question, and could not, so long as the Constitution, and confederacy under it, should exist. He did not mean, I presume, that the citizens of the South—that highminded, gallant, and patriotic people—would not submit to a decision of this House. He did not mean to be understood, I presume, that if, for the purpose of making a proper disposition of this amendment, it should be decided that a slave is not property, in the absolute, unqualified sense of the term, that then it would be high time, in the language of a learned Doctor of the South, to inquire of what benefit to us is our Union? He undoubtedly meant that the question had long since been decided by the Constitution, by the slave-holding States, and by the opinions of the first men of the South, and, therefore, it was not to be doubted: and in this, sir, I entirely agree. By the national compact, slaves, for certain purposes, are considered as persons, and, for certain purposes, as property. It is a fixed principle in the Constitution, that representation is based on numbers, and not on wealth. In the apportionment of the representation in Congress, amongst the several States, under the Constitution, this principle was maintained, by adding to the free white population three-fifths of all other "persons." What persons? So anxious were the venerable framers of the Constitution to avoid offence; so studious were they to treat a subject so full of embarrassment, with the utmost delicacy, that they cautiously omitted the word "slave." So, in the 9th section of the first article, they are called "persons." Would to God, sir, that the same tenderness of the feelings of others, and the same anxiety to avoid offence, were more the characteristics of more modern politicians. Then shall we hear no more of Southern nabobs and Southern negro-drivers—names used for the purpose of party excitement, and of arraying the passions and prejudices of one portion of our country against another. That slavery is an evil, there can be no difference of opinion. But the Constitution found us in the possession of slaves; it has recognized them as an effective portion of our population, and it is enough for us to know, so far as humanity is concerned, that they are better clothed and fed, and more happy, than they would be in a state of emancipation. Liberty to them, under their present inability to appreciate, and incapacity to relish its enjoyments, would be a curse. No one who consults their happiness, or the good of the Republic, would wish to see them emancipated, and turned adrift on the community. The Constitution, then, for certain purposes, regards slaves as "persons," and, sir, for a very important purpose. It gives to them, or to their masters in their right, a portion of our national representation. But it will be said that this was the result of mutual compromise and concession. Yes, sir, it was; but it was a compromise based on equivalents, and one of those equivalents resulting from the principle and spirit of the Constitution, is the right of Government, when threatened with destruction, to use slaves for the purpose of national defence, and that, too, without being liable to be called on for indemnification.

Sir, the Constitution views slaves in the same light as did the slave-holding States at the time of its adoption. It has given no new character to these anomalous beings. The States had always considered them sub modo as persons. They were considered by the laws of the States as a species of animals, neither belonging to the moral or material world, but holding a middle station between both. The Constitution having thus found them, left them to be considered by the States as property of a peculiar character—property so far as their liberty and services were subject to the uncontrolled will of their master—property so far as they were the subjects of sale; but persons so far as the lives and limbs were protected from violation—so far as the right of trial, in some cases by Justices, and in others by a Jury, was concerned; and so far as they increased the national representation of the States owning them. The laws of Virginia, I think, secured to them these rights—rights which can only belong to persons, as members of the body politic, moral beings, and the subjects of punishment. In more modern times these rights have been enlarged. In Missouri they have the right, in all cases of imputed crime, that a Grand Jury should pass upon the case, to a trial by a Petit Jury, to the benefits of counsel, and are subject in most cases to the same punishment which would be inflicted on a white man for the same offence. The same statute which declares slaves to be personal property, likewise confers on them personal and political rights.

This, sir, is no new doctrine. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution, it was well understood. In the 54th number of the Federalist, we have from the pen of Mr. Madison, whose opinions on all subjects, and especially on this, are entitled to great respect, an exposition of the views of the people of the South, so far as he understood them. He says, "the slave is no less evidently regarded by law as a member of society, not as a part of the irrational creation; as a moral person, not a mere article of property. The Federal Constitution, therefore, decides, with great propriety, on the case of our slaves, when it views them in the mixed character of persons and property. This is, in fact, their true character."

Both humanity and religion sanctions this declaration, which declares that slaves are, in some respects, "persons." It is impossible, in this age, to form any idea of the absolute, direct, and unqualified dominion, as applicable to a human being. It is impossible to reconcile this sort of property with the fact, that they are possessed of personal rights. If they are property, in the unrestrained sense of the term, why do they not mingle with the common mass of matter, and be treated like the "brutes that perish?" Has the master the same kind of property in the slave that he has in his ox? No one will answer in the affirmative. This construction of the Constitution, and of laws of the slave-holding States, secures the latter in the undisturbed possession of the slave property, except in the extraordinary case of war, when the Government, threatened with annihilation, calls to its aid, for the purpose of self-preservation, all its moral and physical force. Then it is that the Government has a right to call upon the slave-holding States for the equivalent for an increased representation in consequence of the slaves.

The gentleman from Louisiana has said, that no property could be rightfully impressed! This, sir, is a novel doctrine. Every writer, in treating of the rights of sovereignty, from the first to the last, tells you, that, when a nation is at war, struggling for existence, it has the right to avail itself of all its means, whether the subject is willing, or whether he is not. At such a time, it does not stop to enquire whether its population be bond or free, black or white; if they can use the bayonet, or point the musket, it is their duty to rally round the standard of their country, and, if necessary, sacrifice their lives in her preservation. And here there is no discretion. If it is the right of the Government to command, the subject is under a corresponding obligation to obey.

We have been also told, that no precedent can be set up against the Constitution. This is not disputed. But, practice and precedent are resorted to, with great propriety, to ascertain the views of enlightened politicians and statesmen; and, in some measure, to learn the prevailing sentiment of the age. Shall we reject the experience of past times, the opinions of the great and good, and continue forever in a state of political infancy? If, sir, there is no precedent to be found, from the earliest period of our history, where a slave has been paid for, under circumstances like the present, it is, to me, strong presumptive proof, that, in the opinion of the patriots of the Revolution, and the statesmen of after times, no such compensation ought to be allowed. The gentleman from Ohio has informed us, and, no doubt, truly informed us, that neither the war of our first or second independence furnish any precedents.

Legislation furnishes no instance of remuneration. The act of April 9th, 1816, authorized a compensation to be made to the owner of certain enumerated articles which had been impressed into the service, and had been damaged, captured, or destroyed, but is silent as to slaves. This could not have been an unintentional omission, as it must have been known that many cases like the present existed; and, as I am informed, notwithstanding the term property, in one section of the act, is used in its widest sense, no claim was presented to the commissioners under that act for allowance.

Why was it that Government claimed of Great Britain indemnity for the slaves captured and taken away during the late war? Was it on the ground that they were "property?" If so, Government has made an odious distinction between its citizens. On this principle, it should have claimed indemnity for property of every description, captured or destroyed. But no such claim has been set up. The principle on which our Government claimed pay for the slaves, and on which it was allowed by the British Government, must have been that they were persons, human beings, having some political rights, and, as such, should have been restored to their country on the return of peace.

From these considerations, sir, I am led to the conclusion, that slaves, for certain purposes, are persons; that their masters have in them only a qualified property; that Government, in cases of high necessity, growing out of a state of war, has a right to impress them into its military service, without the liability of being justly called on for indemnification.

It is idle declamation, sir, to talk of the black population of this country, disconnected from the political disabilities under which they labor. The philanthropist may inveigh against slavery. He may urge the consideration that they are of the same flesh and blood with ourselves, descended from a common ancestry, having like passions to gratify, and faculties to improve, accountable to one common Creator, and destined to the same immortality. This would all be fine: but the politician must view them as they are, sunk to the lowest point of mental and political degradation, and wait with patience for the developments of futurity.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, then rose, and said: My motive for throwing myself on the attention of the House—I (was indisposed, and necessarily absent when this question was last agitated)—my motive for throwing myself on the attention of the House, is earnestly to request—I could almost say adjure—but certainly respectfully and earnestly to ask, that no member of this House south of the Ohio, and west of the Mississippi, will debate this question—will deign—will condescend, to debate the point which has arisen—I mean, whether persons can or cannot be property; or will allow that the General Government can, at any time, under any circumstances, in any manner, touch that question. I certainly am obliged to my worthy colleague [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] for some of his remarks; but I should have been full as much so if he had omitted them.

This is a question the United States Government has nothing to do with. It never had, and it never can have; for the moment it lays their unhallowed hands upon the ark of that question, it ceases to be a Government. We have been told by the gentleman from New York, that this question has been settled forty years since. Sir, it was settled two hundred years since. It has been settled from the day on which the first cargo of Africans was landed on these shores, under the colonial Government. What new distinction is this, about persons not being property—as if there were any incompatibility between the two? Sir, there is none: there never has been any. Property is the creation of the law. What the law makes property, that is property; and what it declares to be not property, that is not property. There is no other distinction. The question has been settled during the longest term of prescription, for more than half a century. It has been settled ever since these States first threw off their allegiance to the British Government.

I hope the gentleman from New York will pardon me. I thank him for much that he said, especially for the manner in which he spoke of his Southern brethren. The gentleman is an entire stranger to me. I certainly have every species of good feeling towards him. But I must take exception to one term he employed. He spoke of "our second war of independence." I object to this language, because I never can agree, either, that we were slaves before the first war, or that we were not independent when the second war was declared. But this is aside from the subject. I say that slaves are made property by the law; and you cannot unmake them so, any more than you can alter the British debt, or the tithes, or any thing which you choose to consider as an abuse in any foreign country. When gentlemen tell me that the Constitution is to protect us in that species of property, I answer, it is like the protection of the wolf to the lamb. We scorn it. We deny it. It is created property by our law, and our own State Governments are able to carry that law into execution. We do not ask the aid of any Government whatever.

The gentleman alluded, in one part of his speech, to the Missouri question. Sir, the Missouri question never has been settled. There was a spirit mingling in that question, which, as was once said by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BARTLETT] was endeavoring "to buy golden opinions from all sorts of men." A poison was infused into the decision of that question. I never felt it to be any triumph, nor do I now.

Sir, let me ask the House, whether, under the laws of old Rome, a man who was a slave was any the less property, because, forsooth, he was a person? His being a person it was that made him subject to becoming property, because his master had need of his services. I might ask, too, what is the situation of other Governments in relation to this subject; but I will not now pursue that inquiry. We were told something, I know not very well what, about humanity and benevolence, and religion. Sir, that has nothing to do with the question. We are not to depend on individual views of humanity and religion. It is upon the compact—Ita lex scripta est—that is what we have to depend upon. You may cant to the end of the chapter, about whether your religion is that of the Jew or the Gentile. Your religion cannot interfere in the question. God forbid that I should say that it cannot interfere with those who are the subjects of the question.

Suppose the framers of the Constitution, instead of using the terms which they have done in relation to slavery, (and I think it was with much more delicacy than policy that they introduced such a periphrasis as they have done) had omitted the subject altogether. Supposing the clause for continuing the slave trade for a limited time, was not there: how would you have got hold of any pretext whatever to bring the subject under your rule or jurisdiction.

Sir, humanity and religion are very good things in their proper places; but we have no right to make our humanity and our religion: the rule of other men's actions within the sphere of neither. I will put a case—and I hope I shall not be misunderstood; that I shall be judged by my words, and not by any gloss which may be put upon them here or elsewhere. I will put it for the sake of putting a case, and, that I may not be accused of libelling other States, I will suppose that my own State, the State of Virginia, had made the abuse of a slave not punishable at all, and that slaves were daily and cruelly and inhumanly murdered by the masters, (a thing as much within the range of probability as many statements I have heard,) what would be the remedy? Would it be found in this House? Can you punish murder committed on the other side of the Potomac? Your jurisdiction is confined to your own territory, district, forts, and dock yards. You may cry your eyes out with humanity, but you could not touch this matter. The thing is in its proper place: it is under the jurisdiction of men of as much learning and talent, and as much humanity and religion, as can any where be found, who, knowing the disease, know the remedy, and do not chuse to suffer quacks to "step in where Angels fear to tread." Again, Sir, we have been told that the representation of this description of persons in the Constitution of 1787, was a compromise. No, Sir, it was none. There was no compromise about it, further than the whole Constitution was a compromise. We wanted a representation for our whole population; but we were weak enough to agree, that one half of that population should be represented by only three-fifths of that half. Suppose, now, that this had been a regulation for the white population, and not for the black: how would that affect the question? It would not have touched the rights of the whites. A compromise, Sir! No; there was no compromise; and why not? Because, in 1787, there existed not a man in this continent, who dared so much as breathe a whisper of a right on the part of the General Government to touch the question at all: nor can they touch it now. This Government has no more to do with it than the Khan of Tartary. We are all Representatives of respectable, and some of us, of ancient and powerful Commonwealths; and our laws will, may, and must execute themselves. There may be agitators, and I know there is some real or affected agitation (I mean without the Southern States,) on the subject of slavery; and the effect of this agitation may be to make the slaves themselves more miserable, but that will be the sum total of its effect.

One word more, Sir, and I have done. Suppose that the reasoning of the gentleman who has just spoken in opposition to that of the learned gentleman from Louisiana—for, in reference to his professional acquirements, no man better deserved the title, were true, then we must lose three-fifths and the English pay for only two-fifths of the value of the slaves carried away during the last war, because three-fifths of each man was person and two-fifths property! This reminds one of the judgment of Solomon, which we see depicted in the Tapestry, (and in that Book of which I ever desire to speak with respect) who ordered the child, disputed for by two mothers, to be equally divided between them; but his was a more practicable rule, it was a vertical cut from top to bottom. [Some members smiling at this allusion.] I did not intend, Sir, by this remark, to excite any merriment.

Permit me again to ask, before I sit down, that no man will deign ever to discuss this question. This is not "the accepted time." If ever that time does arrive, as I sincerely hope it never will, our business, sir, will not be here, but at home. Our business will be, to make our escape if we can, for this House will then be to us the den of Cacus. Our business, I repeat, will be, not here, but at home. And let me, on the other hand, remind those gentlemen who differ from me on this question, (and differ no doubt, as conscientiously from me as I do from them,) that it was just ten years from the first stirring of the question of the right of Great Britain to tax the colonies, until the spirit was got up which ended in a separation. It took ten years of goading to bring us to that point. Sir, the relation of the States to the General Government resembles, in some respects, another sort of union, more tender and more sacred in its character; yet even that will not bear continual provocation—even that near and strong relation, may be torn asunder, though there are pledges of their loves to bind the subjects of it together. He may be a very acute man—he may be a very learned man—and he may be in a train to become a very able man, but he is not a man of observation and experience, who does not see that a temper has been excited, and is exciting now on this subject, which it is not less the duty than the interest of every member of this House, in every possible mode, to allay. I know, and I speak "the words of truth and soberness" when I say, that I know that the reflecting part of our country will unite with me in this sentiment—even among those, who have conjured up all those chimeras on the subject of slavery, which we have so often seen pourtrayed both by pen and pencil. I cannot agree with the gentleman from New York, that the slaves are an unhappy race. They, no doubt, are causes of unhappiness to their owners, sometimes, and no doubt they are unhappy sometimes themselves: for who is exempt from unhappiness?

But I believe that, as a class, I have no hesitation in saying, that to the best of my knowledge and belief, they are much happier than their proprietors are now, loaded as these are with the effects of a system, which I will not now go into a discussion of, and with the cares, and wants, and difficulties, which this very population brings upon them.

In regard to the claim to be provided for, in the present bill, I had thought that the old maxim was applicable, inter arma leges silent. This slave was taken precisely in the same manner as the horses and the cart. A gentleman has asked if slaves are to be considered as oxen and cattle? Sir, no man of common refinement, or any humanity, ever regarded them in the same light as oxen. Yet, gentlemen should remember that even the ox and horse, though they be but brutes, have, nevertheless, their rights. Sir, I fear I have done, what I have often done before, but very seldom of late, and what I intend rarely to do again, trespassed already too long on the patience of the House.

II. OF R.]

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said, he was sorry the honorable gentleman from Louisiana had introduced a question which was so extremely liable to be misunderstood. I cannot, said Mr. S., agree with that gentleman that, on the mere question of the adoption of this amendment, we are compelled to determine what is the precise nature of that property which a master has in his slave. But as the question on the amendment is a question of compensation, we must vote on it. Though representing a State which does not, at this time, contain any slave population, it is not my fault that this question has been presented. It has been brought in, as I think, unadvisedly: I could have wished the honorable gentleman had forbore to press it, lest some misconception might lead to a doubt of our maintaining that relation which the laws of some of the States have recognized, and which they sustain between a slave and his master.

I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH) that the Constitution has nothing to do with this matter. That instrument never fixed the nature of the relation of master and slave, nor of any other of our domestic relations, nor of the persons of the different States to each other. When, therefore, gentlemen criticise on the terms "person—population—persons held to service," &c. used in that instrument, they are, in my judgment, somewhat hypercritical. Those words were used, not for the purpose of definition, but out of delicacy, and as laying down a rule to be observed in taking the census of the United States. What is this relation of the slave to his master? And what are the qualities of that relation? I hold, sir, that the right of the master in his slave is a right to his service under all circumstances whatsoever, and also to the absolute unqualified control and custody of his person, so that it cannot be taken from him for purposes of service, nor his actions regulated by any power but his own, save only when the State lays its hand on him for the punishment of crime, and the preservation of the public peace. You may debate the abstract question as long as you will, and may discuss metaphysically what is the exact nature of the right; but, after all, the question is, what do the laws of the State declare in which the master and the slave reside? I have bestowed some little reflection upon the subject, and the only conclusion to which I can bring my mind, is that I have stated. On maintaining this control of the master, rests the security of a very large and important portion of this Union, and whoever interferes with the exercise of it, is guilty of a violation of the rights of all those who inhabit the States where this species of property is held. This Government cannot do this. It is a question not to be debated. No man, I mean no man of any sense and reflection, ever thought of maintaining, that I know of, that it was competent to the General Government to touch the question of right in the slightest degree.

What, then, is the case before us? An officer of the United States, in the use of what he was pleased to consider as his discretion, seized and impressed into the military service of the United States, a slave, belonging to a gentleman of Louisiana. That is, a mere military officer undertook to do what all branches of this Government united, are not able to do. Yet, we have been told by some gentlemen, that he had a right to make this impressment. What, sir—an officer, a mere creature of this Government, whose official existence can be swept away in a moment, has a right to do what this Government, with all its powers, may not so much as attempt? And now, he having done this—having assumed what he called his right to sever the bond between master and slave, and having made himself the judge how far he might carry this right of impressing whom he pleased, what are we asked to do? To adopt his act as our own—to make it an act of this Government, and, in consequence of so adopting it, to indemnify the loser. On what principle, sir, can we possibly be held bound to indemnify, when the officer clearly transcended his duty? I disagree with my colleague, as to the power of impressment in cases of danger. An officer shall never touch my person and property, whenever he chuses to determine that State necessity warrants him to do so. No, sir; whenever he does this, he is a trespasser. And if the State does not give me a remedy against him, there is no longer such a thing as freedom in my country. Liberty is gone—it exists no longer. We have, indeed, indemnified the loser in some few cases, where the public necessity was so great, so high, so undeniable as to overstep all obligations of lower duty. But, then, we have indemnified for the act of our officers, in the character of trespassers—and we took into our own hands, to inquire whether any such necessity existed. But, once admit the right of a mere military officer, whose sole power is the parchment in his pocket, and the epaulette upon his shoulder, to seize and impress, whenever he may think proper, and you give to this creature of yours, authority over every slave holder in the Southern States—he may set them all at defiance—and I am asked to say, I will assume his acts. Sir, I am not prepared to do it. Yet I must do it if this amendment passes; for the principle, and the only principle on which we can grant compensation in this case, is, that we adopt the lawless act of impressment as the act of this Government, and pay for this slave under the pretence of state necessity; and what the officer is pleased to call the salvation of the country. Sir, I cannot even attempt to run out the consequences of establishing such a monstrous principle, and so vitally fatal to a large portion of the Union. If a General may do this, a Colonel may do it; if a Colonel, then a Captain; and if a Captain may, a Sergeant, and so may every subaltern, down to the lowest cotton tassel in the camp. And if an officer from the Southern States may do it, so may an officer from the Northern States. Sir, if these doctrines are sanctioned, it shall be done without my consent. It is a dangerous doctrine. Admit it for a moment, and you strike a blow at the security of the whole slave population of the Southern States. It is the same case in principle as to allow the impressment of an infant, apprentice, or servant, in the Northern States. If there is any reason in it, then every officer of the United States may, at pleasure, (or in circumstances of which he is to be the sole judge) sever the bond which unites master and servant, which binds together parent and child. He may enter our dwelling, drag our children from the fireside, and, regardless of his father's will, or his mother's cries and tears, force him to the camp—and, when there, put him under martial law. He may do this—and when he has done it, we, forsooth, are to volunteer him an indemnity, to step in his place, and assume these deeds as acts of the Government. Sir, you never provided for such a case—yet you authorized our apprentices to be enlisted, without the consent of their masters, and our children, without the consent of their parents. You allowed this tie to be severed—(though the right of a father over the person of his child is as perfect as that of any master over his servant, and far more tender, though I grant that the ties of master and slave may sometimes be of a tender kind)—but you never thought of granting them compensation. You are asked to make it in a case by no means so strong. You are asked to do that for one section of the Union, which you never thought of doing for the other. Adopt this principle of impressment, and you sanction what may, at some future day, lead to consequences, in one part of this Union, I will not speak of, nay, which I will not permit myself even to think upon. The report of the Committee of Claims avoided meddling with this question.

JAN. 8, 1828.]

Indian Governments.

[H. OF R.]

The honorable gentleman from Louisiana was, in my opinion, rather hypercritical in his examination and construction of that report—all that the committee said, was, that slaves were never considered as that species of property, which was to be paid for by the existing laws of the Government. This was a mere statement of the fact—it touched not the abstract question at all; and, as to the warmth of discussion, which has been drawn out by the gentleman from Louisiana, I must be permitted to say, that, in my judgment, the play is not worth the candle. I think it would be far more advisable to reject a claim which is extremely doubtful in its character, to say the least of it and let the question rest till you are compelled to meet it in some other form, and under some more imperious necessity.

Mr. DRAYTON, of South Carolina, here commenced a speech on the subject, which he concluded on the 10th, in which date his remarks will be found.

On motion of Mr. DORSEY, of Md. the hour being late, Mr. D. gave way for a motion for the Committee to rise.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1828.

INDIAN GOVERNMENTS.

On motion of Mr. FORT, of Georgia,

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, introduced by him on the 4th instant, and, from the consideration of which, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged yesterday:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to enquire if any of the Indian tribes within the territorial jurisdiction of any of the States, have organized an Independent Government, with a view to a permanent location in said States; and, if they find that any attempt of the kind has been made, to enquire into the expediency of reporting to this House such measures as they may deem necessary to arrest such permanent location."

Mr. FORT said a few words in support of the resolution, and stated that this reference of the subject had been advised by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONDUCT said he had no other objection to the resolution's taking the course proposed, than this: that it would be taking from one of the standing committees of the House business which appropriately belonged to that committee. If the Committee on Indian Affairs was indeed so much burdened with business as not to be able to attend to the present resolution, then he should have no objection to its going to a select committee; but, as he did not know this to be the case, he would move to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "a select committee," and inserting "the Committee on Indian Affairs."

Mr. FORT was opposed to this amendment, on the ground that the Committee on Indian Affairs had already reported on a subject closely analogous to that contained in this resolution; and to require them to report on this resolution, also, would only be asking them to go over ground which they had already trodden. He was unable to say on what ground it was that the Committee on the Judiciary had advised the reference of the subject to a select committee; but, for himself, he conceived that the subject of the resolution being one of great import, and, as he conceived, entirely novel in its character, he thought that a new committee might, with propriety, be raised upon it. He felt not the slightest doubt of the ability or the good disposition of the Committee on Indian Affairs: and should the House order the resolution to take that course, he was prepared, with cheerfulness, to acquiesce; but he would prefer its going to a select committee.

Mr. McLEAN (Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs) stated, that that committee was greatly burdened with business already referred to it, and would be unable to bestow on this subject that degree of time and attention which its importance well deserved. He hoped, therefore, that it might be assigned to a select committee.

Mr. LUMPKIN expressed his hope that the course recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary would prevail, and that the resolution would go to a select committee. He had no doubt, that, if the House were once fully in possession of the case which had given rise to the resolution, not a gentleman on the floor would deny that it was a case which called for their most serious deliberation. It was known to many who heard him, that the Cherokee tribe of Indians, whose residence extended into several States of this Union, have recently formed for themselves a written Constitution of Government, under which, should it be carried into operation, there was the strongest probability that collisions would speedily arise with the several State Governments within whose limits that tribe is at present located. And it was his conviction, that, before any of these evil results had time to take place, the General Government ought to interfere promptly and efficiently to prevent them.

The question on the amendment for striking out "a select committee," and inserting "the Committee on Indian Affairs," being put, it was carried in the affirmative—ayes 79, noes 60: and the question recurring on the resolution as amended—

Mr. BARTLETT proposed farther to amend the resolution by striking out the words "to arrest such permanent location."

Mr. HAYNES said, that he thought that the member from New Hampshire had misapprehended the import of the clause which he desired to erase. The resolution did not, in any manner, conclude the House as expressing any opinion; that the permanent location of the Cherokees ought to be arrested. The clause, like every other part of the resolution, was submitted to the committee, as a matter of enquiry merely, and he hoped that, on this ground, it would be permitted to stand.

Mr. LUMPKIN agreed with his colleague in the view he had just expressed. The House, at an early day, had been in possession of an indirect expression of the opinion of the General Government on this subject. It would be found in the report of Mr. McKenney, the Indian Agent, which accompanied a message of the President of the United States to this House. It was the decided opinion of that officer, that the farther progress of the Cherokees towards a permanent location within the States, should be promptly put a stop to. And was the House now going to forbid even an enquiry in relation to a matter so important? He trusted not. He trusted the resolution would be permitted to stand in its present form.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he should like to hear what the exact nature of the government was, which these Indians were desirous of establishing. When they were governed as formerly, by Chiefs and Kings, nothing was said about this Government's interfering with them—but as soon as they seem about to set up for themselves a Republican form of Government, we are asked to interfere with promptitude and effect. What right had the General Government to interfere with the arrangements of these Indians now, any more than when they were under their old form of government?

Mr. FORT spoke in reply, and said, if he had rightly heard what fell from the gentleman from North Carolina, he had enquired whether this Government had ever stated to these Indians that it had a right to interfere with and control them. The Government certainly ly have made this statement. The very first principle inculcated by us upon the Indian tribes within our limits, had been, that they were tributary and dependent, and under the defence and patronage of the Government of the United States. The question how far this Government has a right to interfere with these People, was, he thought, a very plain one.

Mr. F. was about to proceed, when the SPEAKER interfered, by stating, that it was not in order, on a question of amendment, to discuss the general merits of a resolution.

Mr. BARTLETT said, that the reason he had desired to have the clause stricken out, was not that he wished either to affirm or deny the right of the Government to arrest the location of these Indians, but that this House might not be understood as at present expressing any opinion on the subject.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, rose to order, and suggested, that the resolution having been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, was ipso facto in the custody of that committee.

The SPEAKER decided to the contrary. The question had been taken only on an amendment, and that amendment having been adopted, another was now proposed.

Mr. HOFFMAN, of New York, hoped that the amendment of Mr. BARTLETT would not prevail; not that he had any difficulty as to the propriety of arresting the permanent settlement of these tribes, but because he wished that the committee should be authorized to enquire, and report on that subject—especially when it was considered that a part of these Indians resided within the limits of the State of Georgia; a State to whom we are bound, by compact, that we will extinguish, as soon as practicable, all Indian titles within her limits. He hoped the resolution would go, in its present form, to the committee; that a full enquiry might be had, and a report made, both on the propriety of arresting their permanent location, and also on the best means of effecting that measure.

Mr. WOODS, of Ohio, hoped the amendment would prevail. He should not, however, have felt so much solicitude on the subject, but for the course of the remarks which had just been made by the gentleman from New York. He was apprehensive, should the last clause of the resolution not be stricken out, that, taking its language in connexion with the observations which had been made upon it, the Committee on Indian Affairs might be led to understand it as the sense of this House, that their business is merely to report a plan for the removal of these Indians, or at least for arresting their permanent location among us. Now it was well known that there exists a difference of opinion in this House, in relation to the policy to be pursued towards these People; and there were some who had the opinion that this Government, instead of arresting, was bound rather to encourage their location, and even to give them a permanent right to the soil. He wished, therefore, to have this point left open, that the committee might not be directed to one side of the question only, but might feel themselves required to examine equally the propriety or impropriety of such a measure.

Mr. GILMER said, that he should have made no remark upon the amendment, but for the language employed by the gentleman from Ohio, who had just taken his seat. He had supposed, that the object of the resolution had reference to the Cherokees alone; but he had seen, from the remarks of that gentleman, that it was held by some a matter of importance that the Government should take means to vest in the Indian tribes a permanent right in the soil.

Mr. G. said he could not permit an opinion like this to pass without remark, in as far as it referred to the State of Georgia. He hoped this House would never set one of its committees to enquire whether the General Government has any control over the soil of one of the original States of the Union. The right of the State of Georgia, over her own soil, was not like that possessed by one of the new States. If any jurisdiction whatever belonged to an original State, it was jurisdiction over her own soil. Georgia has the full right of legislation on this subject. All that the General Government can do, in preference to the State Legislature, is, that possessing by the Constitution the right of making treaties, (and our agreements with the Indian tribes being construed to be treaties within the meaning of that instrument,) it possesses more power to remove the difficulties and obstacles to the extinguishment of the Indian title, than the State of Georgia herself has. He could not, however, admit for a moment, that she could yield in the smallest degree her right over the soil. So soon as she does this, she ceases to be a sovereign and independent State.

[The SPEAKER here interfered, and said that the observations of the gentleman from Georgia had taken too wide a scope for the question actually before the House.]

Mr. GILMER said, that his remarks had only been made in reply to those which fell from the gentleman from Ohio. For himself, he did not know that there was any great importance in retaining the clause which was now sought to be stricken out. He understood it to be the avowed object of the Committee on Indian Affairs to carry into effect a plan for the removal of all the Indians remaining within the limits of any of the States. If that were so, this clause must be unimportant. But if, on the contrary, the United States are about to adopt the policy of aiding the Indians, in making for themselves a Government, that it may the more attach them to the soil, then it was certainly important to enquire, whether the permanent location of those, at least, within the limits of Georgia, ought not to be speedily arrested.

A gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] has asked why Congress should arrest them in making a constitution for themselves, and what right we have to interfere? It might be said, in answer, that this Government claims, and has always claimed, a right to control them. If, however, the formation of a constitution is at all necessary to the happiness of the Indians, he would not arrest their proceeding. Let them, in that respect, pursue whatever course they may judge most for their good. The Government has never interfered in their manner of ruling themselves. But if it shall appear that the forming of a constitution was necessarily connected with the result of fixing them to the soil, then doubtless the enquiry in the resolution was highly expedient. In his judgment, Mr. G. said, that no such result necessarily followed. He did not believe the Indians would be any more attached to the soil after they had gotten a constitution, than they were before, and he therefore felt very indifferent whether the amendment was adopted or rejected.

Mr. LUMPKIN said, that, from what had just fallen from his colleague, he perceived that that gentleman did not attach the same importance to this subject which he did. His own chief inducement for supporting the resolution, had been, that he might, if possible, be spared the painful spectacle of seeing the State authorities take this matter into their own hands. He sought to prevent the occurrence of any thing like collision between the States and the General Government. He trusted, therefore, that the resolution would go to the committee as it now stood.

The question was then taken on Mr. BARTLETT's amendment, viz: to strike out the words "to arrest such permanent location," and decided in the negative, yeas 60, noes 76.

The resolution was then adopted.

BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. HAMILTON moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of having an historical picture of the Battle of New Orleans painted, and placed in one of the pannels of the Rotundo. And that they further inquire into the expediency of engaging Washington Allston to design and finish the work, and, if expedient in both contingencies, to ascertain whether, and on what terms, he can be so engaged.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that, in the resolution which he had just submitted, he felt himself sustained by the authority of a very judicious report of the Committee of the Library, which was made during the last session. He would take the liberty of reading an extract from the report to which he referred, an application of which he would endeavor to make to the subject comprehended in the resolution. This committee very justly remark, "that it is desirable that the pannels of the Rotundo shall be filled with the productions not merely of respectable artists, but of the very best the country has produced," and further, that, whenever, "in the opinion of Congress, the time shall have arrived to complete the decorations of the great Hall of the Capitol, the committee are of opinion, that a highly proper course would be to engage such artist or artists as Congress should deem competent to the work, to execute it for an honorable compensation, under proper directions as to the choice of subjects."

To the good sense and good taste of these reflections, Mr. H. said, he could add nothing. All that he would ask of the House, on this occasion, was, to permit those whose opinions were so just and discriminating on this topic, to inquire, "whether he had suggested a proper subject," and "not merely a respectable artist, for its execution, but the very best the country has produced."

It was not necessary, nor could it be expected at this time, that he should vindicate the policy which had dictated an embellishment of this National building with a representation of some of the most cherished events which adorn our history. The policy itself springs from a sentiment which may well be called instinctive in the human breast. Its elements are to be found even in the impulse which leads the savage to construct those rude memorials by which he attempts to tell of an age and warriors that have been. But the sentiment becomes irresistibly powerful, and of great moral efficacy, when it summons to its aid the delightful art of painting, which is the result of the highest condition of civilization, and whose lessons are inculcated by a universal language, and is understood by all the children of men, however divided by divers and conflicting tongues.

Whether the victory of the 8th of January was an event which, delineated by the hand of genius, might be applicable to some one of the purposes to which the great moral of this art is subservient, was precisely the question which he wished the intelligent committee to whom the inquiry would be referred, to decide. He trusted he might be permitted to say, that, as we had a representation of the surrender at York Town, by which our first war was closed, there would be a peculiar fitness in placing by its side a delineation of that achievement which so brilliantly closed our second contest.

Without professing to be a connoisseur in the art, would those who were, pardon him for saying, that he could scarcely conceive a finer subject for the canvass, than the objects which would animate, and the scenery which would adorn this picture?

The defence of New Orleans forms a beautiful chef d'œuvre in the science of war. It was characterized by circumstances which would enable the painter to place in high relief the heroic steadiness and gallant devotion of our warriors, and to exhibit, in gorgeous array, the embattled hosts of our enemy, who rushed on like a torrent, in daring and dauntless valor, regardless of their fate. Nor would the chivalry of our country be content in assigning an obscure or a disparaging spot in such a picture, to the pathetic fate of the British Commander, who poured out the willing streams of his life blood in obedience to the mandate of his Country. No; "our countrymen war not with the dead." The ashes of a man who thus falls are thrice consecrated by the blessings of the generous, the feeling, and the brave.

Let me add, that the scenery of this picture will be associated with some of our most interesting recollections. It will be placed on that Delta of Egyptian fertility and tropical magnificence, through which the Mighty Father of our Western waters is pouring the tribute of his thousand streams, in his almost finished journey to the ocean. On that Delta, which belongs to that glorious realm, the first possession of which we owe to him, who now sleeps in peace, "by all his country's wishes blest," and the last, to him "who has filled the measure of her glory."

Mr. H. said, he should have felt great delicacy in designating Mr. Allston, if, by universal consent, he was not considered one of the first, if not the very first "living artist our country has produced," by which an important requirement of the committee would be at once fulfilled. Indeed, the profound genius, and unrivalled execution of this gentleman was so well admitted, that he had heard, on the best authority, that one of the most enlightened and discriminating critics of Europe had declared, "that, if there was a man living who was capable of lighting up anew the glories of the Augustan age of painting, that man was Washington Allston." It may not be known to all who heard him, that this gentleman, after passing fifteen years of his life abroad, in studying the remains of ancient, and the acquisitions of modern art, is now engaged, under the patronage of a city (Boston) no less distinguished for its refinement and taste, than by its literature and science, in giving the last touches to an historical picture, (the labor of ten years) which is probably destined to form a new era in the arts, and to confer a renown on that country which has neglected to cultivate them.

If you want this man, you must seek him. To the pride of genius, he adds a thriftless disregard of money: for he knows, as it has been beautifully said on another subject and occasion, that the real price of the productions of his pencil, "is immortality, and that posterity will pay it."

I hope, sir, I shall be pardoned for a suggestion, somewhat selfish in its origin, but surely not deserving of a severe reprobation. Gen. Jackson and Mr. Allston are both natives of the State of South Carolina, and there would be a happy congruity in the fact, that the conduct and valor of the one should be illustrated by the genius and taste of the other.

Mr. H. said, in conclusion, that he felt entire gratification in confiding his resolution to the judgment and patriotism of his honorable friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVANS) who was well acquainted with the merits of the great artist to whom he had referred, and that of the gentlemen associated with him on the committee, and he would barely repeat that he was content that they should determine, as preliminary to the decision of the House, "whether the period had arrived for completing the decorations of the great Hall of the Capitol," and whether he had designated "a judicious choice of a subject, and a competent artist."

Mr. INGERSOLL said, that he should not have risen, had not the resolution, moved by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, designated the name of the artist to be employed. When it was recollected that Mr. Trumbull, the gentleman who had executed the paintings, now in the Rotundo, was a native of the State which he represented on that floor, he trusted his honorable friend would excuse him if he ventured to suggest, that no course ought to be pursued, in this stage of the business, which went to exclude the employment of that venerable and patriotic individual in executing any paintings which might be ordered. If the artist, to which the gentleman had alluded, was a native of the same State with the hero of our second war, the artist he himself had named, had been an actor in his own person in the war of the Revolution. He had been a prisoner, and had suffered severely in that contest; and he must be permitted to say that great injustice had been done him, from the manner in which his paintings had at first been displayed. They were placed in a small and obscure room, beneath our feet, and the artist had had the mortification to know that the most unkind and unfeeling strictures had there been passed upon them, in consequence of this, their disadvantageous location. His fame had suffered; his feelings had suffered; and all his friends who knew the circumstances, had suffered with him. It was with pride and pleasure, Mr. I. said, that he had witnessed their removal to a situation more worthy of their excellence, and he (Mr. I.) had witnessed the tears of joy glistening in his venerable eyes, under the consciousness, that, at last, justice had been done him. Mr. I. said, that he admitted, very willingly, the high merit of Mr. Allston, but, if Congress should conclude, in this matter, to depart from the class of our Revolutionary worthies, there were other native artists, besides Mr. Allston, who would desire not to be precluded from a chance of employment. He therefore moved the following amendment: to strike out the name of "Washington Allston," and to insert the words "some suitable artist."

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he had risen principally to indicate his acquiescence in the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut. He desired, also, to exempt himself from all idea of the slightest disrespect towards the venerable gentleman so feelingly referred to in the remarks just submitted; and certainly, if the resolution he had had the honor to move, proposed the commemoration of any of the events of our Revolutionary war, that gentleman, both from his services and from his opportunities of observation, would have a special claim to be preferred. But the subject proposed by the resolution was, in a great measure, out of his sphere. The execution of it would require a comparatively youthful artist. As it would be necessary that the spot should be visited where that ever-memorable engagement took place, he would have to endure much personal inconvenience and fatigue. It would not, he was sure, be pretended by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, that his friend had not participated pretty largely in the patronage of the Government, so far as the subject of our national paintings was concerned. He willingly adopted, however, the amendment which had been proposed, and he did so the more willingly, because he felt satisfied that, the more the sphere of competition was enlarged, the more beneficial it would prove to the reputation of Mr. Allston.

Mr. DWIGHT said, that, while he did not refuse to do homage to the great and acknowledged merit of Mr. Allston, he wished to suggest a further amendment of the resolution, which was, that it might be made to embrace the battles of Bunker Hill, Monmouth, Princeton, and the attack on Quebec.

Mr. KREMER said, that he entirely agreed that it was proper such a painting should be executed, and that the illustrious glory which had been achieved in the most brilliant victory of modern times, ought to be handed down to posterity. Such deeds ought to be kept fresh in the recollection of all generations, and he thought that it could not be put in a better place than in the Rotundo of this building. But, in order that this painting may be justly judged of, (since all our judgments were founded on comparison, and what could we judge of but what we know? and how could we judge of what was unknown but from what was known?) he would move a small amendment. When this victory was achieved, which rendered our country so glorious in the eyes of all nations, it excited both pride and wonder; and he wished he could stop there. But he must say it created envy too. Now, in order that posterity might have a fair opportunity of judging of that transaction, he would suggest that another painting be placed along side of the victory of New Orleans, representing the meeting of the Hartford Convention, which was in full session at the same time. He therefore moved to amend the amendment, by adding, "and also the meeting of the Hartford Convention."

Mr. EVERETT, Chairman of the Library Committee, said that he should not have risen to speak on the resolution or amendment, had not the gentleman from South Carolina done him the honor to refer to the report which he had submitted to the House from the Library Committee, during the last session, and which recommended a course to be pursued on this subject. In every thing of commendation which that gentleman had advanced in relation to the artist proposed by him to be employed, Mr. E. said that he heartily concurred; and he had been prepared to pass the resolution, which in itself was the most distinguished compliment that could have been paid to that eminent artist and excellent man. He concurred, too, in all the commendations which had been bestowed upon the great event which was intended to form the subject of the painting; nor was the present the first time that he had attempted on this floor to add his tribute to that which had been so liberally paid by this whole people to the great man who had achieved that victory. But he thought it would be convenient if the terms of the resolution were enlarged, and this idea had in part been suggested by the remarks of the gentleman himself, who had said, that, as the victory of Yorktown, which closed the war of independence, had been made the subject of one of our National paintings, there was a peculiar fitness that the victory of New Orleans, which gave lustre to the close of our second war, should be made the subject of another. This went to show the expediency of enlarging the terms of the resolution, and he should be glad if the honorable mover would make it general, extending its provisions to filling the empty pannels of the Rotundo with appropriate paintings. [The remarks of Mr. EVERETT were imperfectly heard by the reporter, who apprehends that they have been as imperfectly reported.]

Mr. STORRS said, that he had often thought that our Naval victories were entitled to some notice, as well as the military exploits of the Army, and that Congress could not better occupy some of the vacant pannels in the Rotundo, than by filling them with commemorations of some of those chivalrous triumphs of the Navy that had conferred so much honor and glory on the country. He hoped that the Navy would not be altogether forgotten, and that the House would agree to adopt an amendment that he should offer to the proposition of his friend from Massachusetts. Mr. S. then moved to add the following words, viz: "or such of the victories achieved by the Navy of the United States, as in their opinion should be selected for such national commemoration." [Here the debate closed for this day.]

HISTORICAL PAINTINGS.

The resolution yesterday moved by Mr. HAMILTON, together with the several amendments, having been again read, and the question being on the amendment of Mr. STORRS—

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, said, that, after the indulgent attention with which he had been honored by the House yesterday, he felt great reluctance in trespassing again upon that indulgence; but he felt satisfied that the resolution which he had submitted, which was one merely of inquiry, was, nevertheless, in danger. He certainly had not expected that gentlemen would have embarrassed its passage by amendments which were calculated to defeat it. There were two modes of legislative hostility, which might be put prominently. The first an open and undisguised opposition, by which the issue was met and combated singly; and the second, an opposition by suffocation, by which strangulation was produced by amendments, and by which a measure was not defeated on its own merits, but broken down by the weight which was ungenerously put upon its back. Now, sir, why will not the gentlemen offer their amendments as separate resolutions of inquiry? I, certainly, in such a shape, will cheerfully vote for them, as I am desirous that the committee should not only select the most competent artists, but the most appropriate subjects also; and that from the widest sphere of selection. Will they pardon me for saying that I conceive the compliments to the several subjects they propose, would be much more decisive by introducing them separately, than by merely appending them to a previous and original proposition. There is surely too much merit in the battles of Bunker's Hill, Monmouth, and Princeton, and in our naval engagements, to require that they should be assisted by the vote which this House might be disposed to give separately, on the propriety of a delineation of the battle of New Orleans.

[Here the CHAIR informed Mr. HAMILTON that the question was upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS) as to the naval victories, and to that his remarks were to be made.]

Sir, continued Mr. H., nothing could be more delightful to my feelings than to vote separately and distinctly for a representation of most of the latter events. The naval engagements of the late war, many of them, would be particularly rich in that dramatic effect which is one of the finest provinces of painting. And I hope the day is not distant, and the day shall not be distant, if my humble efforts can in any measure contribute to it, when these walls shall be decorated by a delineation, by a first-rate artist, of the battle of Lake Erie, which is as proud a subject for the canvass as it was for national exultation when it occurred. God knows, sir, there is not a man in this House would feel more delighted than myself, however mournful the associations, in seeing reflected back into life, as it were, amidst the delusions of the canvass, the manly form, and the heroic achievement which graced it, of our lamented Perry, although a sad reality tells us that death has shrouded him forever from our view.

Let me, however, request the gentlemen who have proposed these amendments, and who profess to be entirely friendly to the original proposition, and which profession I do not desire to impeach, not to embarrass it, by which even the meritorious objects they have in view are essentially endangered. It is a wise rule which dictates that we should not ask for too much at a time; for generosity, as a distinguished British satirist has pointedly said, like patience, is a very good virtue, but is apt to be tired by too much exercise.

If, however, gentlemen persist in their amendments, then I hope the friends of the original resolution will stick by it, as the man whom they desire to honor by its passage, did to his country in the hour of her utmost need; and after we have carried it, let us, with a comity with which I hope we shall always treat our opponents, and with that justice which is due to the subjects they propose, vote for them as separate and distinct propositions.

Mr. BARNEY, of Maryland, said he was apprehensive that the train of argument adopted by the gentleman from South Carolina, was calculated to embarrass his friends, who, approving of, were disposed to sustain his proposition. The amendment offered by the honorable member from New York, [Mr. STORRS] proposed to commemorate one of the splendid achievements of our gallant Navy, in which he earnestly desired to co-operate. Surely the time has arrived, when it becomes us to express the deep-toned gratitude which the nation had long since awarded to the glorious exploits of this arm of our national defence. He felt no preference whether the action on Lake Erie should be selected, or the capture of the Guerriere by the Constitution, which was the first in a series of victories that snatched the trident of Neptune from the haughty mistress of the ocean, and taught her the severest lesson she had ever received in the school of humiliation. Two of the pannels in the Rotundo were appropriately assigned to paintings emblematical of our successes on land, and he was willing to sustain the proposition before the House, to devote a third to a similar purpose; but, at the same time, desired to consecrate one niche in this temple of fame to perpetuating the glory of a Navy on whose banner victory had so often perched, while the annals of history did not record a single instance wherein the fair fame of her country was tarnished by ignoble flight or inglorious surrender: for, wherever her flag had been struck, it was not until the elements of resistance were exhausted, and scarce force enough left to haul it down.

What have been the legislative honors awarded to our gallant Naval officers, for a long life of service? Hailed by a grateful nation, with one loud acclaim, as the benefactors of their country, not even the honorary stimulus of brevet rank has been assigned to them. Beyond the grade of captain they are not permitted to aspire. Mere centurions—nay, not so much, for, in former times, a centurion commanded one hundred men; whereas, the grade of captain in our army extends to scarce half that number—and this is the extent of their promotion. In an army numerically less than the existing forces employed on the ocean, we find major generals, brigadier generals, commissary generals, quartermaster generals, adjutant generals, and inspector generals; all of which Mr. B. approved of in its organization, as having contributed to give it its present efficient character, and to promote economy in its disbursements. But, in his judgment, correspondent rank ought to be extended to the other branch of our national protection and defence, now employing six thousand men, and requiring more than twenty thousand whenever the whole naval force should be called into service. He must confess his sensibilities were excited by the flagrant injustice under which a gallant corps had so long suffered, and he fondly hoped that his friend from South Carolina would be willing that the compliment designed to be paid to the hero of Orleans, should be rendered more illustrious by associating with it some one of our naval triumphs, and that this tribute of admiration and applause would proceed pari passu with each other, and be handed down to posterity together.

Mr. STORRS said that he should not refuse, at a proper time, and on what he deemed to be a fit occasion, to express by resolution, or otherwise, the high sense he entertained of the honor acquired by the country, by the event of the battle of New Orleans, as a military exploit. He would always, he trusted, be so far just to himself as an American, and one of the representatives of the country here, as to admit that it was entitled to a distinguished place among the subjects which we propose to commemorate in the embellishments of the Rotundo. He had no wish to embarrass any proposition that he thought contributed solely to that purpose. But, while he admitted this, he felt bound, in justice to others, to say that he had never thought, that, among all the chivalrous exploits which had advanced the glory of the American character, and with reference to its consequences especially, the battle of New Orleans was entitled to the exclusive honors that we proposed to confer upon it. He thought that the resolution, as it was introduced by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, might lead to great misconception. The naval victories of Lake Erie and Lake Champlain, he believed to be deserving, in every respect in which they could be considered, of as distinguished honor from Congress, as the victory achieved at New Orleans by Major General Jackson, and our brave and patriotic countrymen under his command. While the one saved New Orleans, and protected the Southwestern portion of the Union, the others gave security to the Northwestern States, the Western and Northern frontiers of New York and Vermont. Mr. S. said that he had no wish to draw any invidious comparisons between the battle of New Orleans and these triumphs of the Navy, or many of our Revolutionary battles that equally deserved the national commemoration; and it was for this reason, too, that he wished to divest the resolution of a feature that rendered it objectionable in that respect, and which would easily lead to great misconception. He should most cheerfully unite with the gentleman in giving to the battle of Orleans a prominent place in the Rotundo, but he thought it would lead to injurious criticism if we refused, at the same time, to confer the honors of the country on the splendid achievements of the Navy. We were the more liable to be misunderstood, from the existence of other circumstances, which it was unnecessary to bring into the question, but which were sufficiently obvious without any very particular reference to them. These were adventitious mercy, and the subject should be treated as purely national. The moral value, too, of any vote that we might pass, would derive all its real worth from the spirit of nationality with which we treated the question. It is not a thing, said Mr. S., of the present hour, only, that we are about to pass upon, and he thought that, since the subject had been introduced before the House, a very fit opportunity was presented of expressing our sense of the gratitude that the nation owes to the Navy. We have, heretofore, been anxious to perpetuate the remembrance of the triumphs of our armies only, and our seamen seem to have been, in some measure, overlooked. Equal justice to all, requires of us that we now remember our moral obligations to the Navy also. I shall vote for the resolution if the amendment is agreed to; but I owe it to myself, at the same time, candidly to say, that, if it is rejected, I consider the real worth of the original proposition so much impaired, and so extremely liable to invidious misconception, or real misunderstanding, that I cannot give it my vote.

Mr. DRAYTON said, that he honored our Navy as much, he believed, as the gentleman from New York could do, and was ready to go as far as any gentleman on this floor in assigning to its achievements the meed of honor and renown, so far at least as the efforts of so humble an individual were of any avail. And it was precisely because he did honor the Navy, that he was strongly averse to the adoption of the amendment; and he was persuaded that the officers of the Navy themselves would not esteem themselves very highly honored if the commemoration of their deeds should be brought in under such an amendment. When the object in view is to commemorate with honor, heroic actions, performed in the public service, whether on land or wave, let it not appear, said Mr. D., to have been an accidental thought, a measure dragged in at the tail of a resolution, when it had never before been thought of. The Navy does not merit this treatment at our hands. Those who are embarked in it had never shrunk from their duty, and although none had a higher opinion of the achievements of our Army, in the late war, than he had, yet, he must nevertheless adhere to his conviction, that there existed no higher renown than that which had been won by the Navy of the United States. Indeed, he was not prepared to say, whether the Nation did not owe even a greater debt to the gallant tar, than to the veteran soldier. This, however, was, in some measure, owing to an accidental cause. When the first battle was fought between an American and a British frigate, the action might be said to have been big with the fate, if not of Empires, at least of Sovereign States. The whole world were the spectators of that combat. Its issue decided the question, whether Great Britain was to continue the undisputed Empress of the Sea, or whether the trident was to be ravished from her hands, and those laurels which had so long bloomed upon her brow, were to be transferred to the possession of a new Power. The issue was, to us, great, and truly glorious. By it, we became the conquerors of the conquerors of the World, and this, too, on that very element which they had hitherto considered as peculiarly the element of their glory. Not only did they consider themselves as our acknowledged superiors, but they remarked with taunt and ridicule, on the rashness of an American frigate presuming to engage a British vessel, having any thing like an equality of force. The consequences of this battle none could forget. It was followed by a long stream of glory, as bright as ever illumined the annals of a nation. He earnestly wished, therefore, that nothing should be done in this House—that no feeling should be expressed, nor act promulgated, which might induce so much as a supposition that this House held the merits of the Navy as at all inferior to those of the Army. If, after thirteen or fourteen years had been suffered to elapse, after amendments on amendments had been prepared, at the foot of all these, there should appear, in a single line, the proposal to make some commemoration of their deeds, that gallant body of men would feel themselves not honored, but dishonored. He agreed in the sentiment, expressed by his colleague, that, if amendments were in this manner to be heaped upon amendments, there was every presumption that the resolution, itself, would fall, and its object be defeated; yet that object was a mere expression of the respect, felt by this Congress, for those who had achieved the great victory which is proposed to be the subject of the painting.

As to that victory, it was not his intention to offer any remark. It had been already commented upon with so much eloquence by his colleague, [Mr. HAMILTON] that he would not impair, by any thing he could say, the effect which that gentleman's speech was so well calculated to produce, and which it did produce, in this House. His only object, in rising to oppose the amendment of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. STORRS] was, that the object of the original resolution might not be prevented from going into effect, and that the reputation of the Navy might be rescued from an indignity. The gentleman from New York professed himself the Navy's friend, and he had no doubt he was so; but, he must be allowed to say, that the gentleman's friendship had not, on this occasion, been very judiciously exhibited; and, should the amendment prevail, he feared that the gallant spirit of those who had never sought to avoid an enemy, might be constrained to cry out, "save me from my friends."

Mr. MINER desired farther to amend the resolution by adding "the battle of Stony Point," to the subjects already proposed for paintings. But any farther amendments were pronounced by the CHAIR to be out of order, until those now under consideration should have been disposed of.

Mr. BASSETT said, that it was very obvious that the members of this House were all disposed to commemorate achievements in the public service; but he rose because he felt the force of what had fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina, who had just taken his seat. As an old friend to the Navy, he might be permitted to say, that this was not the moment in which the House had forgotten the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from New York. His principal objection to the gentleman's amendment was the consequences that must follow it. He thought it would bring the House into a difficulty. If they voted for the amendment to the amendment, they were, in some sort, pledged to vote for the amendment itself. Now, if he could show that the amendment to the amendment went to destroy that which it was intended to amend, he thought he should satisfy gentlemen that they ought not to vote for it; yet such was undoubtedly the fact. This accompaniment to the amendment went to destroy the whole. Why? Because it proposed more paintings than there were panels in the Rotundo to receive them. Should this be adopted, it requires a farther extension of the plan which has hitherto been agreed upon for decorating that apartment. As to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DWIGHT] the subjects proposed by him were certainly great and noble in themselves, but they were not so comparatively; that is, they did not excel other actions of the Revolutionary war so far as to deserve to stand above, or to be preferred over them. They did not, for example, excel the battles of Germantown, of Eutaw Springs, or of the Cowpens, so much that the one ought to be celebrated, and the other not.

[Mr. B. was here reminded by the CHAIR that the amendment of Mr. DWIGHT was not now under consideration, but only the amendment proposed to be added to it by Mr. STORRS.]

Mr. BASSETT resumed. At the time when the four paintings now in the Rotundo were resolved upon by the House, the principle was distinctly decided, that those four panels were all that ought to be assigned to the commemoration of events in the Revolutionary war, and the four remaining panels were purposely reserved for subsequent events that might arise in our history. Mr. B. saw no good reason for departing from the principle then established. He thanked the gentleman from New York for his kind intention towards our Naval heroes. He only wished the gentleman had thought of his plan a little sooner. Did not the gentleman see that his proposition was liable to the very objection he himself had urged. If there was, as he said, any thing invidious in preferring the Army before the Navy in our proposals for commemoration, would not that very feeling be excited by bringing forward his proposition now? Why not wait till the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina was passed upon by the House? Let that first be done, and then his motion in favor of the Navy would stand upon its own ground. Then, said Mr. B., that gentleman shall see whether this House is not fully prepared to express its feelings of gratitude for our naval achievements. He regretted that the subject had slept so long. Not, indeed, so far as himself was concerned, because he had never voted for any of the pictures. This mode of expenditure was objectionable, according to his view of the principle it involved. But he had no doubt that the gentleman who had introduced the resolution, [Mr. HAMILTON] if it were suffered to pass, would immediately convince the House that he felt as warmly on the subject of our naval victories as the gentleman from New York. At present, he left it for the House to say which of these two courses would be most for the honor of the Navy.

Mr. BURGESS said he had risen because one of those, whose acts it had been proposed to commemorate, by the amendment now under consideration, was a native of that State, which he had, in part, the honor to represent. He was opposed to the amendment, and, if for no other reason, in consequence of what had been said by the mover of the original resolution, that the multiplying of amendments was well known, as one of the modes of legislative hostility, by which a measure, which it was not wished openly to oppose, might often be fully as effectually destroyed. In commemorating deeds like those contained in the amendment, he was unwilling that the vote should be taken under any possible suspicion of mere party hostility. For his own part, he was against the whole, both resolution and amendment, because he could not believe that the fame of any man could be secured by legislative enactment. Did he think for a moment, that the future fame of such a man as Oliver H. Perry depended on any vote which this House could pass, humble as he was, he would not accept of it. No, sir, his fame is already secured. It is beyond your reach or mine. But if his actions were of so little value that no artist would consider them worthy of a voluntary and unbought commemoration, then let them go down to oblivion. But, sir, I say that the victory on Lake Erie presents a spectacle, which no artist need be persuaded to select. Artists will be found who will gladly embark their fame in the same barge which conferred immortality on that gallant man. But, for his part, Mr. B. said, he felt unfeigned surprise when he observed the solicitude of gentlemen to secure the glory of the Hero of the Battle of New Orleans by any vote of this House. That battle is not one of those achievements which needs any resolution of this kind. A vote of this House (much as we are inclined to think of it) is but a humble thing, when placed alongside of those achievements which have been produced by our wars. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DUNSTON] had contended that a resolution for commemorating our Naval victories ought not to come in at the tail of a resolution intended for any other purpose. He fully agreed in this sentiment, and he agreed with it, because he held those victories, whether we consider their nature, or the consequences which flowed from them, as infinitely superior to that which had been achieved at New Orleans. The victory of Lake Erie was so especially; because it brought us into competition and advantageous comparison with Great Britain in that kind of warfare which was her peculiar glory. We had already often met and combated her troops on the land and on the ocean: we had again and again met and conquered her in battle, ship to ship, but we had never till that moment had an opportunity of grappling with her, fleet to fleet. The occasion was a great one, and the victory commensurate to the occasion. A more decided, a more complete, or a more triumphant victory, was never won by land or sea. And, sir, said Mr. B., I, for one, am not willing that that act shall follow in the train of any military comet which has shone, and glittered and glared across this land. No, sir, let the victory of Erie stand by itself. I will not agree that a vote for the commemoration of an event like that shall be tacked to a resolution, the only object of which is to commemorate the victory of the Hero of Orleans. It is not my intention to deny or to disparage the merits of that achievement. But I ask if there is any man here, who feels his bosom swell and his heart glow at the recollection of the victory at Orleans, who does not at the same time feel his exultation checked by a pang, at the thought that such a battle, with all its attendant carnage and woe, was fought by two nations who were at that moment at peace: that the contest, glorious as it might be, was a mere mistake : that it happened solely from the tardy pace at which intelligence had unavoidably to pass from the point of pacification to the extremity of this Republic. The Treaty of Ghent was signed on the 22d of December. If the Angel which brought the news of peace across the ocean could have hastened his flight but seventeen days, this bloodshed, on the 8th of January might have been spared. And who is there that does not regret that all this glory had not been won while the nations were yet in the career of full and open hostility? Who is there that does not regret that the drama should have been closed with such a scene of blood, after all the events of the tragedy itself were finished and over? Not so with the battle of Erie. That immortal victory happened when it was most needed. It stood out in bold relief in the midst of the scenes of our national difficulty and danger ; and its effect was felt in the renovated courage, raised hopes, and excited feeling, of all who were engaged in the contest. I ask, then, if, when the consequences of these two victories are taken into view, there can be a moment's comparison between them?

Sir, I am against this measure on another ground. It may illustrate our pride as a nation to put the warriors who have served us in an attitude of glory upon canvass, but methinks it would better illustrate the national humanity, were we to put those warriors themselves at least in comfortable circumstances. Here have we more than an hundred petitions on our table from those who once breasted the battle for us, and are now in circumstances of actual want and mendicacy. It would better become us, before we reward our heroes by the pencil, to send some scanty pittance to those who are begging at our doors. And besides, sir, we have hanging on us, by a slight, I grant you, and a fragile tie, a remnant still surviving of the soldiers of our first war. They, too, have prayed us for relief, but to this hour we have made no provision in their behalf. The plea urged by some in behalf of these aged veterans, was met by the alleged poverty of the public Treasury ; yet, now we are asked to put our hand into that Treasury, and cover our walls with more than they can contain, while these men are left to beg their way through the States. Sir, what have we done for the Hero of our first war? We begged his bones, and we have left them to moulder, to this hour, under a covering of deal boards and sand. Would to God we could do something to redeem our pledges of respect to his memory, before we put our respect for so many others upon the canvass.

Mr. B. observed, in conclusion, that he was unwilling the House should take any measure which might lead men to suppose that there was not an artist in the world who would attempt, without a bribe, to paint the victory of New Orleans.

Mr. EVERETT was opposed to the amendment, because, in his apprehension, it did not go far enough. He had no hostility, whatever, to the original resolution, but thought the inquiry ought to take a more extended form, and, at a proper moment, it was his intention to submit an amendment, intended to effect that object. He did not wish that the House should pass any resolution which might leave it to be inferred that all public merit was divided between Military and Naval achievements. No, sir, said Mr. E., I think the principle was a very wise and patriotic one, which was pursued in the selection of the subjects already executed. Two of these were of a military kind ; two others were, both in their conception, and in the lesson which they taught, of a civil character ; and I think that, in filling up the remaining pannels, the same principle ought still to govern us. It is, in my judgment, very important that, in all the details of this great National Monument, we keep constantly in view, our obligation to teach a valuable lesson to posterity. We may find enough memorable events, in the civil history of this country, to call for all the aid of all the arts. I need not, I trust, repeat the declaration which I made yesterday that I have no design, whatever, to break down the original resolution. I am perfectly free to say, that, in any series of military exploits, which it may be thought necessary or proper to commemorate, the victory of New Orleans ought not to be omitted. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAMILTON] said of that victory, that it formed the finale of a series of great achievements. Well, sir, on the gentleman's own principle, if this is the termination of a series, is it not, at least natural to take, also, some of the actions which composed that series? The gentleman also declared, and, I doubt not, with great truth, that, in offering this resolution, he meant nothing invidious. But, will it not be considered as invidious, when he himself confesses there has been a series of great actions, to fix upon one, alone, for commemoration? It is, in part, on this account, that I wish to give to the resolution the whole extent which, in my judgment, it ought to embrace.

Mr. BARTLETT expressed his agreement with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. [BURNES] that it was an unfortunate time to propose this declaration, in compliment to some of those who have fought for us, while there are others, equally deserving, who remain unprovided for. Before we flatter the vanity of our heroes, would it not be well to provide for their wants? Mr. B. said, that he had arisen for the purpose of stating, that he had prepared, and held in his hand, a resolution which would cover the whole ground, both of the amendment and the original resolution. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DWIGHT] extends the inquiry, which was at first confined to the victory at New Orleans, to events of the Revolution not yet the subject of our commemoration, while that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STORRS] proposed to include the naval victories of both our wars. There was an important part of the history of our country, which was not touched by either of these amendments. The resolution which he had drafted would be in order by way of amendment, if the gentleman from New York would consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DWIGHT] should withdraw the amendment he had offered.

Mr. DWIGHT said nothing would give him more pleasure than to oblige the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BARTLETT] by accepting his amendment as a substitute for his own, could he do so without abandoning the principles upon which he had originally offered his own amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina. He was persuaded that the gentleman himself would be satisfied of the propriety of the refusal, when he heard the grounds upon which it was made. He had, he said, long since, understood, from authority which could not be doubted, that, when the artist selected the four subjects embraced by his amendment, as the conclusion of a series of historical paintings, that selection received the sanction of Washington and Jefferson. When he saw the Rotundo decorated on one side by such scenes as the Siege of Yorktown, the Surrender of Burgoyne, the Declaration of Independence, and the Surrender of General Washington's Commission, it was painful to behold the other side of that splendid room a blank. He lamented it the more, when he saw how appropriately it might be covered by the Battle of Bunker's Hill, the Attack on Quebec, and the Battles of Monmouth and Princeton. While up, he would take occasion to reply to some remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAMILTON.] He had, in depicting the various modes of legislative hostility which might be adopted, let fall expressions susceptible of a construction which his own feelings towards that honorable gentleman forbid him to suppose could have been intended. He had intimated that his own original resolution was to be smothered by the weight of the amendments ungenerously thrown upon it. Whatever was intended by the remark, he could not, in justice to himself, suffer it to pass unnoticed. If there was a member upon the floor who did not feel his heart swell with a prouder and more ardent love of country, when he contemplated the achievements of the general and the army of New Orleans, he was not that man. But the heart which was alive to these emotions could never be closed to such as were calculated to be excited by the Battle of Bunker's Hill, and the others to which his amendment applied. And he could never consent to commemorate by paintings a scene in the late war, to the exclusion of those of equal splendor in our Revolutionary struggle. If his amendment were adopted, it would embrace them all. The gentleman from South Carolina certainly knew him too well to suppose that his feelings were of such a contracted character as to induce him to refuse to call upon American genius to illustrate American valor. To the genius of Allston, as an historical painter, he would do all homage, and he had the satisfaction of believing that the adoption of his amendment would give full scope to that of both the artists who had been alluded to.

The question was now taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. STORRS, viz: "or such of the victories achieved by the Navy of the United States, as in their opinion should be selected for such national commemoration," and decided in the negative—Ayes 80, Noes 99.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. DWIGHT, viz: "to embrace the Battles of Bunker's Hill, Monmouth, Princeton, and the Attack on Quebec."

On this question Mr. STRONG asked for the Yeas and Nays. They were ordered by the House, and stood as follows: Yeas 83, Nays 107.

The SPEAKER now announced that the hour allotted to the consideration of reports and resolutions had expired.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that as the discussion was now ended, and as a postponement might lead to a renewal of it, with a view to the economy of public time, he would now move that the consideration of the bills and messages on the Speaker's table, and also the orders of the day, be postponed, for the purpose of further considering the resolution.

On this question, Mr. TAYLOR demanded the Yeas and Nays. They were taken accordingly, as follows:

For the postponement,	113
Against it,	80

So the discussion proceeded.

The question being on the resolution as moved by Mr. HAMILTON, at the request of Mr. RANDOLPH, it was again read.

Mr. EVERETT then moved to amend the resolution so as to read as follows:

"That the Committee of the House of Representatives on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taking suitable measures, at this time, to procure a series of historical paintings for the empty pannels of the Rotundo."

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that he should vote against the amendment, and he should state, in the fewest possible words, why he should do so. Many years ago, said he, when Congress sat in the brick building to the left of this room, a proposition not dissimilar to this was brought forward, and referred to a Committee, of which Committee I was one. The result of that proposition is seen now in the Rotundo—it ended in that. I should have contented myself with saying nothing on this subject, if I had not seen my name in one of the Annuaries of this country—I think it was called the American Annual Register—printed at Philadelphia, I believe—it is some time since I saw it—represented as having expressed a very high opinion, whether of these paintings themselves, or of the original sketches of these paintings, I am unable to say which. That book, with this representation in it, will go down, not to posterity, perhaps, but to the next generation—it will go no farther—with ten thousand thousands of other books, and other misrepresentations, not quite of so harmless a character. Now, as in that representation, an opinion has been expressed for me, in justice to myself, as possessing the slightest possible pretension to the character of a man of taste, I protest against the whole of these paintings. If this proposition for amendment is to have a similar effect, it will not redound either to the honor of this body, or that of the parties to be represented, on such canvass, and in such a manner. Mr. R. here disclaimed a disposition to say any thing to wound the feeling of any one—of an artist particularly, because artists are, probably, genus irritabile, because genius is easily excited—but he said, he hardly ever passed through that avenue (the Rotundo) to this Hall, (which was almost every day, the other avenues to it being nearly impassable) without feeling ashamed of the state of the Arts in this country: and, as the pieces of the great masters of the art have, among the cognoscenti, acquired a sort of nom de guerre, so ought, in his opinion, the picture of the Declaration of Independence to be called the Shin-piece, for, surely, never was there, before, such a collection of legs submitted to the eyes of man.

Mr. BARTLETT said, that the reasons urged by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] should be applied with the same force against the resolution, as the amendment. It was not his purpose to attempt to resist such application of them. He had before observed that he thought it most improper, that we should be postponing the applications of the sufferers of the Revolution, to spend our time in discussing the project of complimenting the officers of the late war. With the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BRIGGS] he believed all their deeds, worthy of remembrance, had a better security of being transmitted to posterity, than any paintings could give them. But the resolution was one of inquiry merely, and as such, he wished to give the Committee the widest field. The resolution proposes an inquiry into the expediency of causing a painting to be executed of a single battle in the late war. He preferred the amendment, because it offered to the Committee a selection from many subjects and of different character. Among his reasons for this preference was this, that it gave them the right to look among the important events connected with our civil history, for subjects for the pencil. He did not hesitate to say that he believed it important to our future prosperity and safety, that we should not give a fictitious importance to the military character of the country. This was the fatal error into which all Governments resembling, in any degree, our own, had fallen, and it would become us to take warning from their fate. He would not go into a comparison of the merits of men, whose lives were devoted to their country in the civil departments, and those, whose fame resulted from a single successful exploit; but he could not but approve the wisdom of the former resolution, and the judgment of the artist, who in execution of it, had selected two of his subjects from those connected with the civil history of the country—the Declaration of Independence and the Resignation of Washington. Of the other subjects of this character contemplated by him to complete the series, one was "The Treaty with France," and another, "The Treaty of Peace." If we were to confine ourselves to topics of this character, our history would not soon fail us in presenting scenes of sufficient interest. If we choose to go beyond those of the Revolution, the landing of our pilgrim fathers has already called forth the efforts, the successful efforts, of a distinguished Artist. The Treaty of Penn with the Indians, we have pretended to commemorate by an attempt at sculpture, which does no justice to so interesting a subject. Could the painter find nothing worthy of his powers in the character of the individuals, and the circumstances under which they assembled, of the first Congress of the Colonies; in the Convention that framed the Constitution; the first Congress that was organized under its provisions? And are these matters of no interest to the present and future ages? If the subject must be a local one, and additional interest is attach to it from its connexion with South Carolina, surely the mover of the resolution could not object to see represented upon canvass the immortal Laurens, though in chains at the feet of a sovereign disdaining and rejecting all that power could proffer to tempt him from the cause of his country, or a testimonial that should do justice to his gallant and chivalrous son, who fell in the cause his father so ably and fearlessly sustained.

Another reason for which he preferred the amendment was, that it permitted the committee to select also from the brilliant scenes in our naval history. He would not attempt to recapitulate or to commend them. They needed it not. But he would say, that his judgment of their importance, as illustrating the history of the country, and the spirit of the people, and the times, depended not on the greatness or splendor of the results. Few events could better illustrate the true spirit and real power of freemen, than the achievement of the bold O'Brien, after the outrage at Lexington, in the same year. With his neighbors, five of whom were his brothers, the project was suggested, of capturing a British ship of war of twenty six guns, then upon the coast. His exclamation was, "My boys we can do it." 'Twas done. The pencil, that dare attempt it, will never find the subject unworthy of its efforts, in the meeting of Jones in the Bon Homme Richard, with the Serapis and Countess of Scarborough. The American flag in the Bay of Tripoli presents scenes and scenery, which the most skillful artist may be proud to copy. Somers and Israel, and Wadsworth and Decatur, have executed designs, which need no decorations of imagination or fancy. It is not necessary to advert to the brilliant achievements of the late war, upon the Atlantic and upon the lakes.

Another reason for preferring the amendment is, that, if we are confined even to military events, this permits the committee to select from among them. They may go back to the early scenes of our history. Personal valor and heroism are not of modern growth. The early Indian wars exhibited efforts of bold and successful daring, that have since never been surpassed. The achievement at Louisburgh loses nothing in comparison with later events. If we go to the time of the Revolution, as the mover of the resolution observed, that it was fit that we should have exhibited the closing scene of the late war, it cannot be less fit, that we should exhibit the first scene of that, which secured to us our present happy form of Government. Among the subjects suggested by the artist employed under the former resolution of Congress, and yet unexecuted, is that of the "Evacuation of New York," the "Death of Mercer at Princeton," the "Battle of Eutaw Springs;" the last of which, surely has the advantage of local associations, to recommend itself to the consideration of the mover of this resolution. The gentleman found a fitness in his proposing the subject, and an artist too for the present work, in their being natives of the State he represents. So far as that may influence our wishes, he might feel as deep an interest in embracing, with other gallant achievements, the battle of Monmouth. It was there his brave countryman, (Col. Cilley) standing upon the battery, from which he had driven the enemy, being inquired of by Washington, "what brave troops are these?" answered, "full-blooded Yankees, Sir, from New Hampshire." A title higher than it is in the power of any prince or potentate to bestow. It is too exalted a distinction, to be claimed exclusively by any section of the country. It was given, by the enemy, originally, in derision of all those, who dared assert and defend the rights of freemen, against the oppressions of tyranny. A name and principles, of which, from their associations, they should ever be proud.

The Battle of Bennington may not have been attended with all the "pomp and circumstance" of speeches and proclamations, that have accompanied some other occasions: for the only proclamation of the fearless Stark was, "There is the enemy," his only speech, "we will beat them, or, this night, Mary Stark is a widow;" but in the heroism of its leader, or that of the hardy yeomanry who fought by his side, it has no where been surpassed. Will the House prohibit the Committee from considering whether "the battle of Bunker Hill" is worthy of the notice contemplated by the resolution? The fitness on his part of urging it, rested not on the local origin of a commanding officer, but the citizenship of many, very many, of the brave men who there fought and fell. The original resolution proposed to us the subject of the battle of New Orleans, and commended to us an artist, who was a native of the same State of which the commanding General had been a citizen. The battle of Bunker Hill need not be excluded from the inquiry of the Committee. It is not intended to detract from the just praise due to the Artist who was named by the gentleman, by saying, that he has a worthy and successful competitor, in the school of their common master and distinguished countryman, West, who literally was raised upon the soil, which had drank the blood of the brave men who fell in the unequal fight—it was Morse.

But if we were to confine ourselves to the events of the late war, the subject proposed was not the only one worthy of notice. He had no desire to exclude that from the consideration of the Committee. He had no unwillingness to give honor to whom honor is due. Yet, splendid as was that achievement, he could not assent to the declaration of a gentleman that he was "the hero of the late war," to the exclusion of all others; or that "he was the man who achieved the victory of New Orleans." There were other men there, and boys too, who did not "ingloriously flee." Is it our duty, by such an exclusive resolution, to degrade those who fought at Fort Erie, Chippewa, and Bridgewater? In the bloody scene of that battle, a citizen of New Hampshire had earned, whether it should ever be awarded him or not, a higher reputation for personal bravery, cool deliberation, and successful enterprise, than belonged to any other individual of that war. When asked by the commanding General if he could drive the enemy from the battery, his answer was, "I'll try, Sir." It was done.

He had adverted to these subjects for no other purpose than to bring to recollection scenes worthy, at least, of some attention, in connexion with the one proposed. The mover of the resolution had expressed, and most deservedly, great confidence in the Committee to whom he had directed his resolution. If he has equal confidence in the merit of his proposition, he ought not to hesitate to submit it to their decision on the broadest principle of inquiry.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of protracting the debate: for he was conscious however great the interest he felt in the resolution, that the discussion had been already prolonged much beyond the period which the intrinsic merits of the subject might seem to deserve. He would, therefore, not emulate the example of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BARTLETT] by travelling over the historical detail with which he had been pleased to entertain the House

—a detail which had satisfied him, from its prolixity, that many of the events were much more happily disposed of where they were placed in the records of our history, than they would be, if transferred to the canvass. He was inclined to indulge in this criticism if he took for the grouping of the picture the events in the order in which they had been narrated by the gentleman himself.

Nor would he emulate that gentleman in another example, who has certainly not exempted the old adage, that "comparisons are odious," from its usual penalty. He may retain all the fruits of this example; I will not follow it. I have not been guilty of the invidiousness of challenging a single comparison, or running a single parallel. I would not purchase, if I could, the success of my resolution by underrating even the humblest achievement which has contributed to the sum of our national glory. Nothing shall provoke me into this species of war.

But, sir, I rose merely for the single purpose of repelling an insinuation of the gentleman, that there was something of a sectional selfishness in the motive which had dictated my resolution. The gentleman intimates that I am mistaken; sir, he may not have so intended—but he rung the changes so repeatedly on "South Carolina," and so often appealed to what he seemed to regard as my selfish feelings, by asking why I would not select such and such event from the Revolutionary history of South Carolina, as a fit subject for the painter, that it surely was a mistake into which, not I alone, but others, might very naturally have fallen.

Sir, I desire my own words should be my own interpreters. I did not say that I had offered the resolution because General Jackson and Mr. Allston were natives of South Carolina, but only indicated that an accidental conjuncture of circumstances had led to what might prove a happy congruity, that the valor and conduct of the one might be illustrated by the genius and taste of the other. If there be any thing censurable in cherishing this emotion of State pride, I must bear it. I would rather suffer the penalty than be destitute of the sentiment.

But, sir, I will not contribute to any further or unnecessary consumption of time. All I desire, now, is, that the question may no longer be postponed.

The question being now put, on the amendment moved by Mr. EVERETT, Mr. STORRS asked that it be taken by Yeas and Nays. It was taken accordingly, and decided by Yeas and Nays, as follows: Yeas 87, Nays 105.

So the amendment of Mr. EVERETT was rejected.

Mr. STEWART now moved the following amendment to Mr. HAMILTON's resolution, to come in after the word "New-Orleans," viz: "battle on Lake Erie, and such other subjects as they may select, to fill the four vacant pannels in the Rotundo."

Mr. STEWART said, that he had no intention to protract the debate. The victory mentioned in the resolution would fill one panel only, but he was decidedly of opinion that the House should provide for filling all the four. He was in favor of having the battle of New-Orleans to occupy one of the pannels, and he had worded his resolution so as to embrace it.

Mr. MCCOY said he was opposed to this amendment, as he had been to all the others, and not more opposed to the amendments than he was to the original motion. I (said Mr. McC.) am against laying out the money of this nation for pictures. It is my opinion that, in this age of civilization, any such mode of commemoration, as intended to carry down the memory of the heroes and wise men of a nation to posterity, is wholly unnecessary. The art of Printing, I think a much better and much surer mode of perpetuating great actions, whether military, naval or civil. I think we have had a sample of the fine arts, and it is now in the Rotundo, and, in my opinion, it has brought us more plague than profit. And if the fine arts cannot thrive in this country without getting up Government jobs, why, I say, let them fail. I should be as much in favor of commemorating the victory at New-Orleans as any other on the face of the earth, but I am opposed to the whole business, and I move you, that both the resolution and the amendment be laid upon the table, with the understanding that they shall lie there during the rest of the Session.

On this question, Mr. BARTLETT asked the Yeas and Nays. They were ordered by the House, and taken accordingly, as follows: Yeas 88, Nays 109.

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

Mr. WOODCOCK said, that he did not rise to discuss the question, after so much time had been spent upon it. He would ask his friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEWART] to accept a modification of his amendment. The House had been asked to couple the commemoration of the glorious victory of New-Orleans (and there was no man who thought more highly of that achievement than he did,) with some events of the Revolutionary War. The House had refused this request. He would now submit the propriety of filling some of the vacant pannels with some of the victories of the late war. He then moved to amend Mr. STEWART's proposed amendment, by inserting, after the word "Erie," the following words: "The battle of Bridgewater, and the victory on Lake Champlain."

Mr. STEWART accepted this as a modification of his amendment, from which he also struck out the words "and such other subjects as they may select to fill the four vacant pannels in the Rotundo." So that the amendment, as modified, would read, "To insert, after the word "New-Orleans," the words "the battle on Lake Erie, the battle of Bridgewater, and the victory on Lake Champlain."

On this question, the Yeas and Nays were demanded by Mr. STORRS, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. OAKLEY said, that as the Yeas and Nays had been ordered, he wished to state the reasons why he should vote against this amendment, although he had voted in favor of that offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT.] It had been his wish that all the pannels of the Rotundo should be occupied by subjects taken from the war of the Revolution alone, but gathering from the result of the votes taken, that it was the sense of the House that a decision should be had on the original resolution, taken separately, and this amendment having no relation to the events of the Revolution, he had no inducement left for voting in its favor.

Mr. WOODCOCK said, that he should not have asked the modification, had not the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DWIGHT] proposing to fill the remaining pannels with events from the Revolution, been decided in the negative. He inferred, from that vote, that it was the will of the House not to have any more paintings of the scenes in the Revolution. Seeing that this could not be obtained, his next wish was, to fill the pannels with events of our second war. He thought it would be no disparagement, either to the victory of New-Orleans, or to the commander who won it, to be placed alongside of the Heroes of the Revolution, and he had endeavored to select, in addition to that victory, such events as he thought would meet the wishes of the House.

Mr. MARVIN, of New-York, said, that he would take the liberty of reminding the House that the original resolution proposed an inquiry only, and not any order; and, that they might have the whole subject fully before them, he thought it would be preferable that all the subjects which the House thought of peculiar interest, should be laid before them at the same time. He was, therefore, in favor of the amendment.

Mr. JENNINGS said, that he had already given his vote against some of the amendments which had been offered, and he should vote against that now proposed. He was desirous to vote on the proposition as it was originally presented, and leave himself at liberty to follow such a course as he might think most proper, on other propositions which might be subsequently offered. He regretted that gentlemen seemed to persist in urging the original measure, as a matter of such vast importance. For himself, he was disposed to think, that the victory of New-Orleans had already been celebrated, as well by public as by private acts, more than any victory achieved during the late war. The Legislature of Massachusetts had made it the subject of one of their public acts, and he well remembered to have seen every door and window of the City of Washington illuminated upon that occasion. Subsequently to this, he had witnessed, in the House of the late Secretary of State, (now President of the United States,) what he thought was due to him and to the event. If any thing like party spirit was thought to mingle in the present discussion, for himself he disclaimed it entirely, and should vote against the present amendment on the grounds he had already stated.

Mr. RANDOLPH now enquired of the CHAIR whether, should this amendment be adopted, it would then be susceptible of further amendment? *

The SPEAKER replied to the query of Mr. R. in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDOLPH then said, that, before the Yeas and Nays were taken, he should read, as his reason for voting against the amendment, the following resolution. Mr. R. then read, from the acts of Congress, the following:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, given to Major-General Jackson, and, through him, to the officers and soldiers of the regular army, of the militia, and of the volunteers under his command, the greater proportion of which troops consisted of militia and volunteers, suddenly collected together, for their uniform gallantry and good conduct, conspicuously displayed against the enemy, from the time of his landing before New-Orleans, until his final expulsion therefrom; and particularly for their valor, skill, and good conduct, on the 8th of January last, in repulsing, with great slaughter, a numerous British army, of chosen veteran troops, when attempting, by a bold and daring attack, to carry by storm the works hastily thrown up for the protection of New-Orleans; and, thereby, obtaining a most signal victory over the enemy, with a disparity of loss, on his part, unexampled in military annals.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be struck a gold medal, with devices emblematical of this splendid achievement, and presented to Major-General Jackson, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of his judicious and distinguished conduct on that memorable occasion.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolutions to be communicated to Major-General Jackson, in such terms as he may deem best calculated to give effect to the objects thereof."

Mr. WHITTLESEY said that he would give his reason, also, for voting in favor of the amendment; and he would do so after the example just set him by the gentleman from Virginia. Mr. W. then read, from the acts of Congress, the following:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and the same are hereby, presented to Captain Oliver Hazard Perry, and through him, to the officers, petty officers, seamen, ma- rines, and infantry, serving as such, attached to the squadron under his command, for the decisive and glorious victory gained on Lake Erie, on the tenth of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, over a British squadron of superior force.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause gold medals to be struck, emblematical of the action between the two squadrons, and to present them to Captain Perry and Captain Jesse D. Elliot, in such manner as will be most honorable to them; and that the President be further requested to present a silver medal, with suitable emblems and devices, to each of the commissioned officers, whether of the army or navy, serving on board, and a sword to each of the midshipmen and sailing-masters, who so nobly distinguished themselves on that memorable day.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to present a silver medal, with like emblems and devices, to the nearest male relative of Lieutenant John Brooks, of the marines, and a sword to the nearest male relative of Midshipmen Henry Laub, and Thomas Claxton, Jr. and to communicate to them the deep regret which Congress feel for the loss of those gallant men whose names ought to live in the recollection and affection of a grateful country, and whose conduct ought to be regarded as an example to future generations.

"Resolved, That three months' pay be allowed, exclusively of the common allowance, to all the petty officers, seamen, marines, and infantry, serving as such, who so gloriously supported the honor of the American flag, under the orders of their gallant commander, on that signal occasion."

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. STEWART, with Mr. WOODCOCK's modification, and decided by Yeas and Nays, as follows: Yeas 85, Nays 108.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANDOLPH now moved to amend the original resolution, by striking out the words "Committee on the Library," and inserting, in lieu thereof, "a Select Committee."

Mr. RANDOLPH said, he had made this motion out of no disrespect to the Library Committee; and, after some other observations (not distinctly heard) he said that he was not himself, and had not for many years, been a member of that Committee. He had incurred the disgrace of being cashiered from that committee some twenty years ago. [He had at the same time been a member of another Committee, (Ways and Means,) upon which the Speaker had recently done him the honor to place him, after an interval of twenty years.] Now, said Mr. R. I take it that the members of the Library Committee are selected for their learning, and their knowledge of books—I should suppose so, a priori, certainly; which is a subject very distinct from the fine arts, although an acquaintance with both may be (because they have been) united in the same person, and, for any thing I know, may be so in the person of every individual composing the committee. But I wish to give to the Speaker an opportunity of selecting, to compose this committee, in case the resolution should pass, such individuals in the House, as may happen to be best acquainted, not merely with fine arts, but with painting particularly—for, among the professors of the fine arts many excel in one department, who do not in another; and, although the arts were said to be sisters, Mr. R. said he should prefer the judgment of a Canova or a Chantry in Sculpture, as he would of a Weber on a piece of music, and as he would unquestionably prefer that of Lord Byron as a poet, &c. He added that he had not made the motion until he was satisfied that his friend from South Carolina would accept it as a part of his motion.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that his acceptance of the amendment, which his honorable friend from Virginia

[H. or R.]

(Mr. RANDOLPH) had offered, might subject him to the imputation of inconsistency, unaccompanied by an explanation.

He had said, yesterday, that he felt entire gratification in confiding his resolution to the Committee on the Library. What he was going to say, to-day, might prove that candor was not the most profitable commodity a man can bring to market, although, under all circumstances, it is invariably the most creditable. He would out with it, and declare that he had changed his mind; and, as the members of the Committee of the Library, according to his humble view of the subject, had voted for every proposition calculated to defeat this resolution, they were, therefore, unfit depositaries for the subject-matter. He would profit by the fable. He would not put the lamb to nurse to the wolf.

Mr. EVERETT now said, that he felt much indebted to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH) and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) for the amendment which went to strike out "the Committee on the Library," and insert "a select committee." It would free him from what he considered as a heavy burden: for, without undertaking to speak for the other members of the Library Committee, he was conscious, for himself, of not being in the least degree qualified for the task imposed on him; and he felt greatly relieved by the adoption, by the gentleman from South Carolina, of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. S. WOOD, of New York, (a member of the Library Committee) said, that the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON) was mistaken in the inference he had drawn from his (Mr. WOOD's) vote, formerly given. I am for this picture, but I am for others also, and one reason is, that I believe the contract with Mr. Allston can be made on much better terms if we engage him for the whole series of paintings, than if he were to paint one only. I was in favor of the amendment before proposed, because, if it had been adopted, we should have had the whole field of the national history before us, from which to select the proper subjects. Our report would have been submitted to the House, and they could have passed upon it in such a manner as they thought proper. We have four pannels only, and not a picture gallery, and when four subjects have been selected, there our cognizance of the subject ends. In my judgment it would be better to fill all the pannels now. Should this be determined on, it is probable Mr. Allston might be more easily prevailed on to break his connexions where he now is, and come at the National call. Such a course I should deem more prudent than to contract with him for a single picture only.

Mr. WOODCOCK then moved to amend the modified motion so as to refer the subject to the Library Committee, instead of a select committee; which motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. OAKLEY rose to propose an amendment, which he did not doubt would be acceptable to the mover of the resolution. Its object was not to add any new paintings, but merely to provide for the preservation of those already in the Rotundo. He had been told that those pictures were already sustaining injury from the dampness of the walls, and it was important that some mode should be adopted of arresting what must otherwise very soon destroy them entirely. He then offered the following amendment:

"And that the same Committee also be instructed to inquire what measures are necessary to preserve the paintings already placed in the Rotundo."

Mr. HAMILTON signified his acceptance of this amendment as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said, that as he should vote against the resolution, he would ask the indulgence of the House, while, as an act of justice to himself, he stated the reasons which would actuate him upon this occasion. None, said Mr. B., can hold in higher estimation that great military achievement which it is now proposed to hand down to posterity by the aid of one of the fine arts; nor can any hold in more exalted estimation the distinguished individual who planned and executed it. It is a deed which has cast around him a halo of glory, and has added largely to the stock of the national reputation. My sentiments in regard to that individual I had an opportunity, about eight years ago, of expressing publicly in this House, and when occasion shall require, I am prepared to give yet stronger evidence of the high estimation which I think his character justly merits. It is not, therefore, from any objection to the individual, one of whose actions it is now proposed to commemorate, that I object to the adoption of this resolution. If I voted for any subject for this painting, I should undoubtedly place this first in order, as I deem it to be the first in importance.

I was a member of the House when the former resolution passed ordering the paintings which are now in the Rotundo. I voted against that, and on the same principles must vote against this also. My reasons for both is, that I do not hold it to be a proper disbursement of the public money to devote it to purposes of ornament. I call this a purpose of ornament, because, in my decided opinion, there is a better mode of handing down great actions to posterity than either painting or statuary. The House has this day heard read two resolutions of thanks passed by the assembled Representatives of the whole American People. The individuals named in these resolutions may be truly said to have their "names enrolled in the Capitol," there to live as long as the archives of this Government shall survive the stroke of time. My opinion is, that, so far as regards the present generation, the individual who achieved the defence of New Orleans has his monument in the hearts of all his countrymen; and as it respects the generations to come, the page of impartial history will better carry down his actions than any perishable monument which the arts could raise. And as to the moral effect attributed to such monuments, so long as the high spirit of liberty which now animates this nation shall prevail, it wants nothing to preserve it; and when it shall once have passed away, nothing that the arts can do will ever restore it. What says the experience of mankind? Those periods of the world when painting and sculpture were at their highest point of perfection, were not the periods of its proudest character.

In Rome, so long as the Republic lasted, painting and sculpture were comparatively little known, and even the Greeks, who excelled them most in both, after they had carried these arts to perfection, were conquered by the Romans, and the Romans, when they had learned them, were conquered in their turn. Nor did the spirit which has been recently awakened in modern Greece, derive its source from any relics of the paintings of their ancestors, but rather from reading their exploits on the page of history.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose. It might appear strange, he said, that he too should vote against the resolution, after the votes which he had given upon the amendments proposed to it. But he held it to be perfectly parliamentary to make a proposition as perfect as possible, and, having done so, to vote against it altogether upon principle. He would state his reasons for doing so on the present occasion, even more succinctly than his worthy colleague had done before him. If the House acted upon the subject of this resolution at all, Mr. R. said, he was satisfied that they ought to act upon it singly: and the resolution of Congress, which had been read by the gentleman behind him, as a sort of set-off against that which he had himself read, had only confirmed him in that opinion: for, he said, it would be found, upon examining the resolution in regard to the victory at New Orleans that General Jackson, and General Jackson alone, was named in it; whilst, in the other resolution, the glory was shared by others besides Commodore Perry, who, though not so distinguished as he, yet partook largely of the merit of the achievement.

Mr. R. said, he concurred entirely in what had been said by his worthy and respectable colleague, on this subject; and, if he would give him leave, he could tell him that he had heard similar sentiments expressed in this House by one (Mr. MACON) who might be called the Fabricius of this country. It was at the last Session of the Presidency of the elder Mr. Adams, that he said, in relation to the proposition for the erection of a monument or a pyramid to the memory of Washington, that the sure way to commemorate his virtues, was to put his Life into the hands of every school-boy in the country. In ancient days, Mr. R. said, monuments were resorted to, to commemorate public events or individual fame. What had become of them? It was the vote, and not the work of the artist, which conferred honor. And here he would speak in the words of another man, who as justly might be called the Dentatus of America, as the one to whom he had before alluded might be called the Fabricius, and who had scarcely his superior in sagacity. I speak, said Mr. R. of Roger Sherman, and of what I heard with my own ears. When a number of propositions for the erection of monuments were made, some of which the whole means of the Treasury would have been inadequate to carry into effect, he said that the monument was the vote to erect one; that posterity would never inquire where the monument was. It is the vote, that is the monument. Sir, what has become of the monuments of Egypt? They stand, to be sure, in the sands of the desert; but we do not know who built them. Where is the memory of Homer? Where his monument? His memory lives, at the end of three thousand years, as green and as great as ever.

Sir, said Mr. R., no man who has ever walked through Westminster Abbey, will, in my opinion, be in favor of erecting monuments to commemorate public services. We hear of Westminster Abbey: it is an imposing name, and an imposing thing. But it is the vote—the vote, and the Speech in the House of Commons which accompanies it, to bury an individual there at the public expense, that gives its value to the distinction. But go there, and, as in many other cases of real life, the dear delusion is torn away. Like the tombs of Hamilton and Washington, Mr. R. said, the monuments are disfigured by the hands of mischievous school-boys; and miserable things sticking against the wall commemorate the talents of such men as Gray, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, &c. The amendment of the gentleman from New York put the nail in the coffin of the resolution. You are going, said Mr. R., to put paintings into a room not furnished, uninhabited, and uninhabitable. If, in the fine climate of Italy, and under the immediate care of skilful persons, the pictures of the old masters are so damaged as almost to have lost their value, what would become of pictures, in a climate like this, where for forty days we have scarcely seen the sun, incurred in a spacious vapor-bath—in a room not only not furnished, but not inhabited. Mr. R. made some further observations upon the structure of the Rotundo, in the course of which he intimated that he might be disposed to support a proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, for the further decoration of the Rotundo, if it would not make the room more of a nuisance than the utmost efforts of architecture had already been able to make it.

To conclude, Mr. R. said, if he had voted for any further appropriation for pictures for the apartment he had been speaking of, it would have been for this, and this only, now before the House. God forbid that he should disparage the merits of Perry—but he would say thus much: that as General Washington stood on the canvases of the Revolution alone and prominent, so stands General Jackson in the history of the late war. We hear of other things, of that period, it is true, but they remind us of the radiancy of the moon and stars after the sun has risen, or, rather, of the stars after the moon appears—ington, T. Whipple, jr. Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, James Wilson, Joseph F. Wingate, John Woods, David Woodcock, Silas Wright, jr. John C. Wright.—103. So the resolution was rejected; and, thereupon, The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JAN. 10, 1828.

Mr. VERPLANCK submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire and report on the expediency of making such legislative provision as may be necessary, for reviving, extending, and carrying into effect the act of February 10th, 1807, providing for surveying the coast of the United States.

Mr. VERPLANCK begged leave to call the attention of the House to a brief statement of the objects of this resolution, and of the facts connected with the act it referred to. The law of February 10th, 1807, was passed in the last Congress of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, I believe upon the recommendation of Mr. Jefferson himself. It certainly was a favorite measure of his. It authorized and requested the President to cause a survey to be taken of the Coast of the United States, designating the islands, shoals, roads, and places of anchorage, within twenty leagues of any point of the coast; also, the respective courses and distances between the principal capes and headlands: in short, every thing necessary for completing a minutely accurate chart of our whole coast, for every naval, military, and commercial purpose. Another section provided for such examinations relative to St. George's Bank and other banks and shoals, and the sounding and currents beyond the limits of twenty leagues, to the Gulf Stream, as might be subservient to the uses of navigation. [The immediate object of this act was unquestionably, to procure a thorough knowledge of our coast, for naval purposes and for fortifications, which the prospect of a collision with the great maritime Power of the world then pressed upon the attention of Congress.] These, however, were combined with farther views—with the general interest of our own commerce and navigation, as well as with the generous wish to contribute to the useful science and geographical knowledge—of the whole civilized world. The sum of fifty thousand dollars was appropriated to carry the act into effect—and the principles upon which it should be executed were settled by the President. They are stated by Mr. Gallatin, with that luminous precision which marks all the writings of that statesman, in an official letter to a distinguished man of science, who was to be employed in the execution of the act. It is, I presume, to be found in the official files of the Department. I have myself read it in a valuable paper on the survey of the coast, printed in the American Philosophical Transactions. The plan he resolved into three distinct parts. 1st. The ascertainment, by a series of accurate astronomical observations, of the true position of a few prominent and remarkable points on the coast, such as are or would probably be the sites of forts, or light houses, &c. 2d. A trigonometrical survey, by a chain of triangles, of the line of coast between these points, the position of which had been thus astronomically determined, marking therein the position of every prominent object distinguishable at a distance. 3d. A nautical survey of the shoals and soundings, of which the trigonometrical land survey should be the base—to depend as little as might be on astronomical observations made on board ship.

Soon after this, Mr. Hasler, well known as a scientific, as well as an experienced and practical mathematician, was sent to Europe for the purchase of instruments. He there procured an admirable collection, selected by himself with great care, the workmanship of the first artists of the age, Troughton and Dolland, in London, and Le Noir, in Paris, well known scientific mechanics, whose labors and improvements have conferred higher benefits on the world than many men of more splendid fame, as well as loftier pretensions in the ranks of science.

With these instruments the survey was commenced, in 1817, and a portion of the work done with minute accuracy. After a time—I know not why—it is a part of the country I am not acquainted with—the work was suspended, and nautical surveys were substituted. These, too, were finally abandoned, as a system. A vast body of maps and charts were thus collected, at a vast expense—many times the cost which would have attended a perfect execution—I have been told, half a million of dollars, but have no precise authority for this; but, at whatever cost, they were exceedingly dear, for they are comparatively of very little value, and are acknowledged to be so. The private navigation has been left to guide itself by such lights as may be furnished by private enterprise, or by the science of Europe. Whenever any local interest or object, such as the building of a Port, or the location of a Navy Yard, required it, special surveys were, of necessity, ordered either by the Navy Department, or by resolutions of Congress. These were generally executed by the officers of our Navy, always with very incompetent means, and often limited in time. In the words of the Secretary of the Navy's last report, "they are unavoidably incomplete. The times within which it was desirable to make them (says he, speaking of the surveys made last year, of Baltimore, Savannah, Brunswick, and Beaufort,) and the means granted, did not permit them to be made so as to furnish perfect surveys and charts of these harbors."

Indeed, so imperfect are the surveys in the possession of the Navy Department, that I have been assured, on very good authority, that none of them have been found sufficiently accurate to determine the site of fortifications. I ought however, in justice, to except that of the harbor of Baltimore, made by Lieut. Sherburne.

These partial surveys, by separate expeditions, are also necessarily of enormous expense. Officers, men, vessels, &c. must be detailed anew for each object, with great loss of time, and new expenses of preparation, at each occasion. Without going further into detail, I refer to the Navy Report of 1825, in support of this assertion. With all this experience before us, it is now evident that we must recur to the principles of the act of 1807. I perceive that that law is printed in our statute book as an obsolete one. I do not see why; but if so, it is on all accounts expedient to revive it. I would go farther: I would embody in a new law, with the necessary appropriations, all the principles laid down by Mr. Gallatin, in 1811. The President should be empowered to appoint a scientific Commissioner, with a decent salary. The excellent instruments, purchased ten years ago, are still in possession of the Government, a little worse for neglect, and, I fear, too, a little the worse for having sometimes been in ignorant hands. The other expenses would be very trifling, compared to the magnitude of the object. A tithe of the annual gain or saving it would yield to the commerce of the nation, would pay the whole. To the Navy, in case of war, this is an all important object. It is a disgrace and a scandal to our country, that the British navy is probably, at this moment, in possession of far better details of the chart of our coast than we are.

I have only to add that this is an application of science to useful purposes, not only strictly within the power of the General Government, but directly incumbent upon it as a guardian of foreign commerce, and the director of peace and war. This Government alone can execute the work; and I trust that this House will not suffer it any longer to be neglected.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Protection to Manufactures.—Captured Africans.

[JAN. 10, 1850.]

THE MANUFACTURES' QUESTION.

Mr. MALLARY, Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, asked leave, on behalf of that Committee, that it might sit during the sitting of the House.

Mr. STORRS said, that he should not object to granting this power to the Committee on Manufactures, but he wished to ask of the Chairman whether the Committee proposed to sit at any particular hours, and at what times? He intended to take the opportunity to attend that Committee, for the purpose of making some inquiries of the manufacturers, and his colleague (Mr. CAMBLEDEN,) had expressed the same intention. He had no doubt that other members, also, would attend for the same purpose, and it would be useful to all, to be informed of the hours when the Committee would engage in those examinations, that members might arrange their business in the House, so as to enable them to attend without inconvenience.

Mr. MALLARY replied, that a large number of witnesses had been summoned, many of whom are now in attendance, and the Committee were desirous of pressing the examination without delay. If they were confined to the ordinary hours assigned to Committee business, they would not be able to make such rapid progress, nor to arrive at as early a result as would otherwise be in their power. As to the private convenience of gentlemen, in attending upon these examinations, it was a matter with which the Committee were not concerned—of which he was not prepared to speak.

The question was then taken on granting leave, and carried in the affirmative.

MR. WILDE'S CASE—(CAPTURED AFRICANS.)

The bill from the Senate for the cancelling of a bond given by Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, to transport certain Africans beyond the limits of the United States, was called up by Mr. P. P. BARBOUR.

Mr. B. moved that it be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TAYLOR objected to this course, as he had not had time to examine the papers in the case, and the bill was unaccompanied by any report.

After some conversation between Messrs. WRIGHT, of Ohio, and P. P. BARBOUR, the question was taken on the consideration of the bill at this time, and determined in the affirmative—Ayes 75, Noes 54.

Mr. BARTLETT moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report the facts of the case.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR (Chairman of the Judiciary Committee) said, that a similar motion to this had been made the other day, when the bill from the Senate on this subject was reported to the House, and, if such were the pleasure of the House, he should cheerfully acquiesce. He would state, however, that the committee, if ordered to report, could furnish no other information than that which was contained in the petition of Mr. WILDE, and the papers accompanying it, which now lay upon the Clerk's table; the substance of which he had, on the former occasion, stated to the House. If the resolution, therefore, for recommitment should prevail, the House would send back to a committee of men, to be by them reported, precisely those facts, and no more, which they had already in their possession.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said, he hoped the motion to recommit the bill would prevail. I have, sir, said Mr. W., taken some pains to examine the papers which were submitted to the House, and the result is, the perfect conviction of my mind, that the bill ought not to pass. If I understand the object of the bill, it is to cancel a bond, filed in the office of the Clerk of the Circuit Court of Georgia, pending a litigation concerning a number of Africans, and for their removal beyond the limits of the United States. On a careful examination of the papers,

I find no evidence of the amount of that bond, to whom it was given, or the precise terms of the condition. It seems to me there are two bonds, one given by the Spanish claimants of these Africans in Court, and the other by the petitioner. The petitioner asked to have his bond cancelled, and the bill provides for cancelling the one in the Clerk's office; and that, too, without ascertaining its date, amount, or the parties. If it were the object to cancel the bond of the petitioner, the bill did not reach it, but provided for cancelling another. But, sir, we are inhibited by the Constitution from impairing the obligations of contracts. Can I be expected to give my vote to cancel an obligation, a contract, without knowing the date, the amount, or purport of the obligation, affecting the rights of parties of whom I am wholly ignorant, as well as the extent my act may injure them? Can I be expected to vote to cancel a bond, of which I am so ignorant as not to be able to describe it? The bill contains no description. I have heard none, and can give none. What is its condition? Who are the parties? What its obligation? These questions I think material. Who was the obligee of the bond, and interested in it? Had we any control over it? I fear, sir, this bill exceeds our constitutional limits, and affects the rights of others, having no knowledge of our proceedings or voice in them. I do not know that these difficulties exist, but I throw them out that the Chairman of the committee might, if in his power, satisfy the House as to them.

Mr. BARBOUR said, in reply, that he could not conceive from whence the gentleman from Ohio had got the idea of two different bonds! There was but one bond, viz: that required by a rule of the Court of Georgia, and that one bond contained but one condition, viz: that the party should export the slaves therein mentioned without the limits of the United States. It there was any difficulty in the mind of the gentleman, as to what bond was meant, it might easily be obviated by introducing into the bill a description of the bond intended to be cancelled. Mr. B. said, that he knew of no party who could possibly have any interest in the provisions of it, but the United States. Its penalty had respect to the single fact of the exportation of these slaves; and should the House, from motives of humanity, permit the slaves in question to remain within the limits of the United States, and for that purpose should cancel this bond, Mr. B. said, he could see no possible difficulty which could arise from so doing. A purchaser had offered these slaves to the Colonization Society, with a view of having them exported to Liberia, in Africa. (This was an important fact which, Mr. B. said, he had unintentionally omitted when he had before stated the circumstances of this case. The proof of it, he believed, would be found in one of the documents accompanying the petition.) The Colonization Society were unable to make the purchase, in consequence of which, the slaves remained in this country. They had intermarried, some of them had become the heads of families, and they were desirous of remaining here.—Should the bill not pass they must be exported—but, if it should pass, and the bond be cancelled, they would have liberty to remain. These were the only facts with which he was acquainted in relation to the case.

At the request of Mr. DWIGHT, a document from the Colonization Society, stating the offer which had been made them by Mr. WILDE, and expressing their regret that their funds were insufficient to make the purchase, was read.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that, when he had requested, a few days since, that the bill from the Senate on this subject might go to the Committee on the Judiciary, it was that they might spread before the House, in the form of a report, the history of the facts connected with that bill. He considered those facts as of such moment as to deserve an official report. The question might be one which involved the liberty of thirty-seven human beings. And, however it might be determined by the House, he had desired a report as a justification of the vote which might be given. He understood that no report had accompanied the bill in the other branch of the Legislature, nor had any report accompanied a similar bill which had been prepared by the Committee on the Judiciary. The House is called upon to cancel a bond for the exportation of 39 African persons brought into the United States contrary to law. The original number had been 139. One hundred of these had been adjudged to be a lawful capture, (of the exact nature of the proceeding which had been had, he possessed no knowledge,) but that number had been sent to our colony in Africa. Of the remaining 39, 37 were declared not to be a lawful capture, and were consequently ordered to be restored to the Spanish claimant. These persons are now in the custody of law. Technically speaking, they have not been imported. It was a subject of discussion, whether their bringing into the country had been lawful or unlawful. So soon as it was determined that they were unlawfully captured and brought in, it became the duty of their owner to give a bond to export them out of the country within a given time. As there was no report to refer to, he did not know how long it was since the judgment of the court had been given, and he consequently could not know whether a sufficient time had elapsed to enable it to be determined whether the persons giving the bond intended to violate its condition or not. A very delicate, and what might prove a very difficult question, arose as to the right which these persons themselves may have to these Africans. As early as the year '98, Congress prohibited the introduction of slaves into the United States, and declared that all slaves imported in violation of that law, should be ipso facto free. Now, if the persons laying claim to these Africans have done acts, which, under the law, are equivalent to importation, it may turn out that all these Africans have a right to their freedom. Mr. T. said, that he did not know this, for the House had denied him the opportunity of knowing the facts of this case, from any official report containing them. In an act passed in 1808, said Mr. T., it is expressly provided, that no person in the light of an importer, (and for aught I know, the proceedings in this case may have been such as to place these persons in that light,) is capable of holding any right of ownership over a negro slave, and if he shall attempt to sell such slave, he incurs a forfeiture of $1,000 for each offence. Mr. T. repeated, that he did not know that the facts of the case would bring the parties within the provision of this law, and it was because he did not know this that he had desired to have all the facts spread out before the House, by the report of one of its own committees. At present he understood that the petitioner, Mr. WILDE, had purchased the right of the Spanish owners, whatever that right really was, who had been bound to export these Africans. And now an application is made to the humanity of this House, on the ground that the Africans have formed connexions with each other, and are anxious to remain in this country; and a resolution is presented to us from the Colonization Society, expressing it as their wish, that Congress will either indemnify Mr. WILDE, and allow these people to be exported to Africa, or will cancel the bond under which he lies to re-export them. Mr. T. said, he could form no opinion with respect to this resolution, for the reason he had already stated, that he was uninformed as to the facts. He had all respect for the Colonization Society, but still he might be permitted to say, that he wanted better evidence to go upon than their communication supplied.

His great objection, however, was to the very unusual course of passing a bill of so much importance as this without any accompanying report of the case, in either branch of the Legislature. Before we act, we ought to have a particular and minute statement of the circumstances. We ought to know the present actual condition of these Africans; how many of them have formed connexions; and, particularly, the manner of their being brought into the country. We ought to be enabled to decide with certainty, whether, in cancelling this bond, we may not be violating our own law for the suppression of the slave trade. The appeal is made to our humanity. It is a very easy thing to make such an appeal. Even the slave trade itself has, by some persons, been attempted to be justified on the ground of humanity. But, for himself, Mr. T. said, he wanted something more than the simple allegation of a petitioner before this House.

Mr. DWIGHT said, that he should not oppose the motion for recommitment; but he would take the liberty to state that there were some facts in the case which stood out in bold relief, and were, of themselves, sufficient, in his judgment, to recommend this bill to the universal favor of the House. What, asked Mr. D., was the policy of the act which requires a bond for the re-exportation of Africans introduced into this country? It was to prevent collusive captures. It was to prevent the success of what would otherwise have been a very easy mode of evading the law, viz: the bringing of African slaves upon this coast, and their consequent introduction by a pretended capture. In this case, one hundred and thirty-nine African persons had been captured by a South American privateer: one hundred of these had been decreed not to be slaves; but thirty-nine of them had been adjudged to be the bona fide property of the Spanish claimant. The decree of the court, however, omitted to designate which persons belong to the hundred, and which to the thirty-nine. By this omission, a new delay was created, and eight years, in all, had intervened before the question was finally settled. The humanity, however, of the Southern gentlemen, had not left them all this while imprisoned. They had been put out on healthy plantations, where many of them had acquired the relation of husband and wife, parent and child, and had formed attachments to the country. In the mean while, the Spanish owner appears and demands that they should be sent to Cuba, where they would be consigned to a bondage tenfold worse than any which exists in the United States. The petitioner in this case (with whom Mr. D. was personally acquainted, and for whom he entertained the highest respect and regard) had been employed as counsel in the case, and, in his course of official duties, had become acquainted with these slaves. They came to him as to their only friend, and implored, with tears, that they might not be sent away. To the honor of that gentleman, he stated, that he had interfered in their behalf, and had sacrificed, or at least put in jeopardy, a part of his own private fortune, with the benevolent purpose of relieving them from their distress. He did this from no selfish views. He was not a planter. He owned no plantation. His only motive had been pure humanity; and Mr. D. concluded with expressing his earnest hope that the House would, in some manner, interpose, to relieve him from the unwelcome necessity under which he now labored, of re-exporting those whom he had thus nobly saved.

Mr. MERCER expressed his hope that the House might receive a brief report of the facts in this case. The Colonization Society, said Mr. M., have stated to us that they were unable to comply with the proposal made to them on the part of Mr. Wilde, and this would not appear surprising when he stated the fact that, when that society, in September last, had advertised that a vessel would shortly sail for Liberia, they had received, within the course of thirty days, nine hundred applications for a passage, and there were, at this time, eighteen hundred persons who had expressed a desire to remove to Africa. It was proper he should state that these applicants consisted entirely of free negroes. Mr. M., however, said, that this inability on the part of the society to pay the sum required, ought not to be suffered to interpose an insuperable bar to the benevolent purpose for which they had been offered to the society by Mr. Wilde. He hoped the report of the committee would state the precise sum which had been advanced by that gentleman, in his purchase of those people from their Spanish owners.

Another fact he was desirous of having reported, was, whether these thirty-nine negroes had been selected out of the whole number of one hundred and forty, by lot; because, if that was the case, he was persuaded that the whole proceeding had been in contravention, if not of the express opinion of the court, yet certainly against the sentiment of all the members of the court. If there was no other separation between them than the lot had made, these persons are entitled to the privilege of being transported to Africa, as much as those were who have been sent at the expense of the Government. There was no authority of law for this mode of selection, and if it had taken place, the whole transaction was in direct violation of all law and justice. He desired to know, from a report of the committee, what were the facts on both these points; he wanted to ascertain what expense must previously be incurred by the Government before it can provide the means of transportation of these Africans, to their native land. It was evident that Mr. Wilde, when he purchased these slaves, preferred this as their destiny, and, Mr. M. said, that, from the knowledge of that gentleman, he was fully persuaded that he would never have proposed the sending of these persons to Liberia, if he had not thought that that would be a humane and proper mode of providing for them.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, professing some knowledge of this case, said that he did not despair of the vote of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WRIGHT,] when the facts of the case should not be misconceived. There was one idea which he considered, of itself, sufficient to ensure their support. Allowing the gentleman from New York to be correct in the supposition, that the conduct of the Spanish claimants should be proved to have been such as gave these Africans a right to their liberty, what remedy would be given by this House, unless the bond should be cancelled? Shall we leave these free persons here, in a land of freedom, or shall we compel the petitioner to re-export them to the irons of the West Indies, and send them into perpetual bondage? Mr. W. declared, that if he could believe these persons rightly entitled to their freedom, he should be prepared to say, not only that they might remain, but that they should not be sent away.

Mr. BARBOUR now expressed his entire willingness that the bill should be recommitted, such seeming to be the disposition of the House; and the question was about to be put, when

Mr. GILMER said, he had risen for the purpose of stating some of the facts which gentlemen had enquired for. He then read from a schedule, which he held in his hand, some items, from which it appeared that the total of law expenses and salvage, paid by the Spanish claimant, had been $11,668. The probable value of the slaves, at a fair estimate of the market price, was $11,700, differing but a few dollars from the expense incurred, but Mr. Wilde, the petitioner before the House, had paid to the Spanish claimant $15,000, to relinquish his claims. This he had done, as was most evident, from no motives of interest, for he bought the slaves at a loss, but because their case pressed deeply upon his own sense of humanity. He hoped that it would be some satisfaction to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MANNING,] to receive this statement, as it satisfied a part of his enquiry.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said, before the question was taken on the motion to re-commit, he, perhaps, owed it to himself, and to the House, after what had been said, to explain more fully than he had done, his views of the case, as it appeared to him. He said, as he understood it, in the year 1819, a Venezuelan privateer, clandestinely armed in Baltimore, manned mostly by citizens of the United States, and commanded by a citizen, sailed on a cruise from that port. Off the coast of Africa, she captured a vessel from the United States, from which 25 Africans were taken. She also captured several Portuguese and Spanish vessels, from all which Africans were taken, and, among others, the Antelope, owned by persons in the Island of Cuba. She proceeded, in company with her prize, the Antelope, until she was wrecked, and her captain, and part of her crew, were made prisoners. The armament, and the residue of the crew, were shifted to the Antelope, which was afterwards captured by a revenue cutter of the United States, hovering on the coast of Florida, and brought into Savannah for adjudication, with 280 Africans. The vessel and cargo were libelled in the Circuit Court of Georgia—claims were filed by the captain of the cutter, for bounty, or salvage—by the Consuls of Portugal and Spain, for, and on account of whatsoever citizens of either country were interested—and by the United States, claiming them as forfeit for a violation of the laws of the Union, and those, also, taken from the American vessel, because of her piratical character. The Court in Georgia decreed those free that were captured from the American vessel, and others not claimed by the Portuguese and Spanish Consuls, and decreed the rest to the proper owners of the Spanish and Portuguese vessels, on their giving bond to remove them beyond the limits of the United States. These Africans had been thrown into the common mass, many of them had died, and, having no satisfactory method of identifying those taken from each vessel, they were designated by lot. It so appeared, in the decree, and he believed the whole were so designated. From this decree, so far as it regarded the persons claimed by the Portuguese and Spanish Consuls, an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. On hearing, the Supreme Court reversed the decree of the Circuit Court of Georgia, so far as it regarded the claims by the Portuguese Consul, and affirmed the decree so far as it regarded the claim of the Spanish Consul. The Court, however, did not affirm the decree, even to that extent, by the direct action of a majority of its members, but because they were equally divided in opinion on the question.

I have been asked where I got the idea, that there were two bonds in the case? I will show where I got it. The portion of Africans now in dispute, were decreed to the Spanish claimants, on bond being given to export them beyond the limits of the United States—this was several years since. It no where appears, in any of the documents I have seen, that these persons were ever placed in the custody of the Marshal, or otherwise disposed of. It appears in the petition that, in November, 1827, if I mistake not the date, an agent of the claimants under the decree, arrived at Savannah, from Cuba, accredited to a respectable mercantile house there, and was about to take these persons out of the country, when the petitioner, from motives of humanity, interfered, purchased up the interests of the Spanish claimants, paid the expenses, and gave his bond to transport them beyond the limits of the United States. I had supposed the bond given by the claimants at the time of the rendition of the decree, and that the bond given by the petitioner, was, to those of whom he purchased, as an indemnity. In this I may have been mistaken; the evidence, and the petition, are neither very explicit.

If the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary says there was but one bond, I am bound to believe him: he, doubtless, has evidence of the fact—yet no evidence has come under my observation. It was competent for the Court to have ordered a bond to be given to the claimants, or the United States, in trust for the parties interested. How this bond was ordered, or how given—for, as it regards the petitioner, it was voluntary—no where appears. To me, sir, this is material: we should know who are the contracting parties to the bond, its condition, and the rights acquired under it, before we undertake to cancel it, and to impair those rights. If the bond was wholly to the United States, we might cancel it, but if we held as trustees, we should become responsible for all the rights affected injuriously by our act. We are not prepared to legislate upon this question until we are better informed, and I hope the bill will be re-committed, and we shall be furnished with the facts.

But, sir, if it shall be found, on a full investigation, that the facts of this case leave us free to act upon it as a subject within our control, then there will arise a grave and important question, which I will take this occasion to suggest to the committee, and to the House, and that is, whether the Congress of the United States will, under any pretext whatever, pass a law authorizing the importation into the United States, to be held in slavery, any number of Africans, in relaxation of the law of 1807? These persons are now in custody of the law; they are not legally imported into the United States, and the effect of cancelling a bond given for their removal, will be simply to allow, or legalize their importation. When that question comes up, sir, I shall be ready to meet it.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that this bill provided for one of the alternatives in the report of the Colonization Society, but there was another alternative in that report, which he also wished the Committee on the Judiciary to consider. The argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] had raised an inquiry of great importance, and which might prove of some difficulty; at all events, it could not be decided without a full knowledge of facts. The observations, too, of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MAXWELL] had raised an inquiry which was not only highly important, but one which had excited in him utter astonishment. It suggested the possibility that the liberty of thirty-nine persons had in this case been decided by lot. If that had been the fact, then a solemn inquiry devolved on this House, whether, by the laws of the land, the liberty of any human being could be taken away by the casting of lots. As all these difficulties would press upon the House, if they adopted one alternative, the Judiciary Committee might possibly find it best to devise and report the means of embracing the other alternative, viz: the repaying of the sum advanced for these Africans, and permitting them to be sent, by the Society, back to Africa. He hoped that the committee (should the bill be re-committed) would pay special attention to that part of the recommendation of the Society.

Mr. GILMER said, that he rose to present some additional information on this subject. The facts of this case were not such as some gentleman who had spoken, seemed to suppose. The District Court of Georgia had declared, in their decree, that the identity of these thirty-nine slaves has been sufficiently ascertained. Mr. G.

said, that he knew of no such thing as a lot having taken place in the matter. He then quoted the decision of the Court.

The question on recommitment was once more about to be put, when,

Mr. MINER moved to amend the instructions to the committee, by adding,

"And that the said committee inquire whether it would not comport with the interests of humanity, the principles of justice, and the honor of the Government, to adopt efficient measures to restore the Africans to the country and home from which they have been cruelly and illegally separated."

Mr. M., in offering this amendment, observed, that, if he understood the matter correctly, the Africans whose case was involved in the bill, had been captured on board a slave ship; they were subjects of the Slave Trade; they, at home, were as free, and, perhaps, as happy, as we are, and had as much right to freedom, Mr. Speaker, as you or I have. By the ruthless hand of slave traders, they had been torn from their home and country, and chance had thrown them upon our shores. Sir, I am unwilling to sanction the principle, in any form, that consigns them and their posterity to everlasting bondage; and therefore offer an amendment proposing an inquiry into the propriety of having them returned to Africa.

Mr. BARTLETT accepted the amendment of Mr. MINER as a modification of his motion.

Mr. GILMER said he should not stop to argue the question as to the right of Government to expend the money of the People of this country in aiding the Colonization Society. But he would ask on what authority the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MINN] had assumed the fact that these thirty-nine Africans had been cruelly and illegally taken from their own country? He would ask, further, on what ground it was assumed that this Government has a right over the private property of one of its citizens? And, also, how this House was going to alter a solemn decision of the Supreme Court of the United States? That Court has decided that these slaves belong to a foreign claimant. By what mode can Government control, or in any way affect, that decision? He knew of none. If the Court of last resort has fixed the right of property, the Government has no control or jurisdiction in the case. These two difficulties were open and glaring. He could not but think that the amendment had been accepted by the gentleman from New Hampshire, without due consideration. These persons, for aught that appeared, might have been slaves in their own land. There were many slaves in Africa, held in bondage by the laws of that country. The property of the Spanish claimant, if any, was transferable, and might be as well held by a citizen of the United States as a citizen of Spain. There was but one condition attached to the tenure, viz: the re-exportation of the slaves. Gentlemen were greatly mistaken, if they supposed that it was not as valuable an object to the South, as it could be to the North, that African slaves should not be imported into this country.

The people of Georgia had a deep and peculiar interest that no such importation should take place; and he could say with great truth, that there were no persons in the world who held the slave trade in deeper detestation, or would do more to resist it in every possible way. It was the people of Georgia, and they alone, who were to say whether they consented that these Africans should remain within their Territory. They, said Mr. G., are the only sufferers, and if Georgia says they may remain, then the right of the Spanish claimant, (now purchased by Mr. WILKIN) is perfectly unassailable: and it is equally so, if he performs the condition of this bond, and exports them within the specified period. Out of motives of mere humanity, this gentleman has expended more than $11,000, but he has not divested himself of his right to hold these slaves; he cannot divest himself of it, nor will he yield it to any arbitrary power attempted to be exercised on the part of this Government. It is true he offered these slaves to the Colonization Society, so that, if they would pay the expense he had incurred, the slaves should be placed at their disposal. This was his own free act, and it was in accordance with the feelings of every one—but, owing to the want of funds, their removal could not, in this manner, be effected, and there the matter ended. Mr. Wilde has never offered these slaves to the United States, on the same terms, or on any terms; and, if he had, the United States Government has no authority to expend $11,000 belonging to the People of the United States for any such object. Mr. G. concluded by reading the decree of the Court in the case.

Mr. BARTLETT said, that he had not adopted the amendment under any idea that the Government of the United States could exercise any power over the private property of an individual. He had adopted it as referring to the offer made to the Colonization Society, and as directing an inquiry whether Government might not do what the Society would gladly have done, but were not able. He had given no opinion in the case, but merely agreed that the inquiry should be submitted to the Judiciary Committee. Mr. B. said, that he entirely disapproved of the concluding sentence of the amendment, (of Mr. MINER) and should not have consented to adopt this part of it, had he adverted to the import of it. He wished the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MINER] would modify his amendment, by striking out this clause; and if the gentleman should not do this, he would himself move to strike it out. Mr. B. concluded by moving to strike out the words "who have been cruelly and illegally torn from their country," and the question being on thus amending the resolution,

Mr. MINER said he was not willing that the amendment proposed should prevail. Were not these Africans found in a slave ship? And is it not almost certain, if found on board a slave vessel, that they were taken both cruelly and illegally? Is there a reasonable ground of presumption to the contrary? Were you to go through this House, step by step, and ask of members, one by one, their opinion whether Africans found in slave vessels were purchased there of masters who owned them, or violently or fraudulently taken, can there exist a doubt what the decision would be? Sir, it is an accursed traffic—all illegal—full of cruelty. I have no doubt on the subject, and I would not express a doubt. I am aware that this subject is one liable to create excitement. To discuss the subject of slavery in any shape here is a delicate matter. So far as it becomes necessary for us to decide on subjects connected with slavery, or the slave trade, it is not only our right, but our duty, to discuss them freely, being careful not to give cause of offence. With regard to slavery, as it exists in the several States, there is no purpose to interfere. Passingly I may say, that, within this District, we alone have the power to regulate that matter. Here, we only can legislate upon the subject, and it is our duty to meet the question. But, whatever legal claim the gentleman who is in possession of these Africans may have; or whatever right the Government of Georgia may possess, I would not encroach upon—it is not my purpose or wish to interfere with. But I pray you to look to the true state of this matter. Here are thirty-eight Africans found on board a slave vessel, ruthlessly torn from their country and their freedom, as I suppose—they are cast upon our shores, and thrown into our power; the question is, shall we consign them and their children, and their children's children, into everlasting and hopeless bondage; or shall we restore them to liberty and their country?

To me it appears it would be magnanimous to say to these persons—you have been violently torn from your homes—we will exercise the national power to purchase the claim existing against you, and return you to your country and freedom. How much more nobly would this sound here and throughout Europe, than to say to them, "you fell into our power, and we will hold you in perpetual bondage." I would not violate the rights of Mr. Wilde; I understand he is willing to take what he gave the Spanish claimants, that he is willing to sell. I hope the words may not be stricken out.

Mr. RANDOLPH now made some inquiry, which was not distinctly heard; when

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR said he could not better answer the inquiry of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, than by asking for the reading of the first part of the petition of Mr. Wilde: and it was read accordingly.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I now say, sir, without intending the least disrespect, that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MINER] and which has been adopted by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BARTLETT] affirms as a fact, what the petition, and the decree of the Court of Georgia, do positively deny. And it is certainly unbecoming of this House to say to one of its committees, as a fact, that which all the evidence before the House proves not to be a fact, that these People had been taken illegally. The resolution in its present form affirms that these slaves have been "inhumanly and illegally" taken from Africa. They may have been taken "inhumanly," but of this we have no proof—but as to their having been taken illegally, we have the most positive evidence to the contrary, because they were claimed (and the claim was established by the tribunal in the last resort) by the Spanish and Portuguese owners, the Government of both of whose countries legalize the traffic. They could not, therefore, have been taken contrary to law. They were taken according to the laws, usages, and customs, of Africa, and of the nations to which the claimants belong. They were as lawfully taken, probably, as any slaves who were brought into South Carolina and Georgia since the adoption of the Constitution, under that clause of the Constitution which permitted the traffic in slaves for a limited time. The taking and bringing of these was legal, according to the laws of America, and by the customs of Africa. We are, therefore, asked to affirm that the slaves mentioned in this petition were taken "illegally," when all the proof is to the contrary.

Sir, I am not going to enter into the question of the slave trade and slavery in the abstract. That man has a hard heart, or at least a narrow understanding—yes, and a narrow heart, too, who would justify slavery in the abstract. But that man, although he may have a heart as capacious as the Atlantic Ocean itself, has a narrow and confined intellect, who undertakes to make himself and his country the judge and the standard for other men and other countries. Sir, this very principle of interference with the conduct of other nations was one of the greatest objections to the Revolutionists of France, and it was one of the greatest objections taken to the conduct of the high contracting parties at Pilnitz. We have no right to prescribe laws for other countries. God forbid, Mr. R. said, that he should ever defend slavery, or ever should, in any case, raise his voice against the cause of liberty. Though, said he, I might remind the House that slavery existed a long time ago. The mother of the Ishmaelites was a bond-woman; the Greeks and Romans about whom we hear so much, were slave-owners. Sir Thomas More, one of the wisest, and one of the most benevolent of men, could not complete his Eutopian Commonwealth without the aid of slavery. That it has existed, does exist; that it is an evil, no one will deny. But we have no right, on that account, to make laws for other nations, and in this case, the decision of the Supreme Court; to whom the case was submitted, is positive evidence that these persons were not illegally taken, and consequently were not illegally brought into the United States. I am now bottoming myself upon law—upon sheer law.

Sir, said Mr. R., there has a spirit gone abroad—both in England and here—it is now raging in England, perhaps, as much as ever fanaticism raged there in the time of the Covenant of the Round Heads—it is raging here, and I wish I could say that it does not exist even in Virginia. It is the spirit of neglecting our own affairs for the purpose of regulating the affairs of our neighbors. Sir, this spirit takes the plodder—yes, the plodder from the field—to become a plodder in the pulpit. It has taken the shoe-maker from his last—and, what is worse than all, it takes the mother from the fireside and from her children, into a sort of religious dissipation, in which the Church is made as much a Theatre as the Grand Opera at Paris, or as Drury Lane or Covent Garden in London. This spirit renders home too dull a place, and renders it (if I dare to use a French word in this House, or a Latin one, without the certainty of being misrepresented) the very seat of ennui.

Sometimes our humanity is up for the Greeks—it has not yet, so far as I know, been asked for the Trojans—it may, very possibly, be some day up for the Trojans—and we are called to rejoice in a victory of the three first Powers of Europe over a handful of semi-barbarians, in the harbor of the ancient Pylos. Sir, instead of any triumph, in my opinion, that victory was a stigma—a stain—upon the naval glory of all those nations concerned in it—I mean of those who had any glory to lose. With immense odds in their favor, they attacked, and killed, and murdered, hand to hand, as brave a set of men as the Sun ever shone upon. And what are we to assist the Greeks for? To build up a nest of pirates in the Ægean? They were so of old—yes, sir, of old—long before the time of Ajax and Agamemnon—pirates they are—pirates they ever have been—and pirates they ever will be. Why, sir, our force will not be able, even in that small, placid—that halcyon sea, I might call it—to protect our own commerce from their row boats and their corsairs.

In saying this, Mr. R. said, he knew that he was running against the prejudices of the country, and that philanthropy which was so much in vogue. But, said he, what was I sent here for but to oppose those prejudices whenever it is practicable?

[Here the CHAIR interposed, and reminded Mr. R. that the discussion ought to be confined to the amendment of Mr. BARTLETT, which was to strike out the last words of Mr. MINER's amendment to his resolution.]

Mr. R. resumed. If I am out of order, I submit to the decision of the Chair—what I said was only intended as illustration, in reference to the part of the amendment; which goes to assume that the slaves were illegally taken, when we have the evidence of the decision of the Court in the last resort to the contrary. Sir, said he, I will put a case, which will further illustrate this controversy. Suppose that the British Government, instead of being anxious, as they are, to vomit forth the Lazzaroni of Ireland—that wretched population who are reduced to the minimum, and the pessimum too, of human existence—to the potato, the whole potato, and nothing but the potato—was desirous of detaining them in Ireland—would it be “inhuman” in the Captain of an American vessel—it certainly would be “illegal,” according to the laws of England—but would it be “inhuman” to bring a number of that wretched peasantry, ground down to the last turn of the screw of despotism, so that one turn more must rescue them entirely from it—the human family could not multiply under a feather more of weight—to bring a number of these miserable beings to this country! Sir, I will not say how much humanity and religion I have—I will say, in the words of a very great man, on another occasion, “none to speak of;” but it would be humanity to bring them all here. Yet, as regards the interests of my country—of the State of Virginia—I would hang any man who brings one of them into it. Yes, Sir—I would make it death; for it would be inflicting a serious evil.

I was sent here to promote the true interests of this People. I think, in regard to this matter, many of my friends are radically wrong, and I think many measures we have adopted here are wrong; and though I would not abolish that sort of humanity and religion, I would certainly let it enjoy a pretty long abeyance.

Sir, if this amendment be adopted, it goes to touch not only the legal right now under consideration, but the legal right to every slave in the country previously imported: for, if these thirty-nine slaves were inhumanly and illegally taken, then, according to the reasoning of the gentleman, all the rest which were brought into this country from Africa, whilst the Constitution admitted their introduction, were inhumanly and illegally taken.

I will not trespass farther on the patience and indulgence of the House, but, as a Southern man, I will not suffer this matter to go any further, without making a solemn protest against any such preference as this, on the part of any branch of this Government, going to touch this question, or affect that right in any manner whatever. I protest against it as one of the humblest and lowest of the Virginia Delegation—and, Sir, I never will sit silent here as long as any thing is brought before the House, which touches it in the slightest or the remotest degree.

Mr. MINER begged gentlemen to remember that he had no hand in bringing this subject before the House. The case of these persons was brought here by others. In speaking of the slave trade as illegal, I did not intend to speak in the precise terms of the lawyer, nor to embarrass the question with legal technicalities. The honorable gentleman must pardon me, but, because Spain and Portugal may legalize this traffic, I cannot regard it as legal, nor consent to speak of it as legal. This point is not to be settled for us by Spain or Portugal. We should regard and speak of it as statesmen, and the question of its legality should be determined by the higher laws of God and humanity. Those are the laws to which I referred.

Mr. WEEMS rose; when the SPEAKER observed, that the debate had taken already too wide a range: that the motion before the House, of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was to amend the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. WEEMS said, he asked no further indulgence than had been extended to other gentlemen who had taken part in this debate; that he certainly was not out of order in obtaining the floor, and he should endeavor not to become so in any remarks which he had to offer, and most assuredly not more so than others who had spoken, and then inquired of the Speaker whether he was to consider himself as having the floor?

[The SPEAKER requested the gentleman from Maryland to proceed.] Mr. WEEMS said he heartily accorded with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH) in most of his remarks; and, although like that gentleman, he felt unwilling, for the purpose of increasing temptation, or extending slavery, to go into the defence of it as an abstract principle, consequently he had hoped not to have felt himself called upon to say one word on the present occasion. But when gentlemen considered themselves at liberty to rise on this floor, and, by a formal proposition, uncharitably to denounce all others, who happen to think differently from themselves on the subject of slavery, pronouncing it not only contrary to law and humanity; but in the open violation of the precepts and commandments of God, he felt himself no longer at liberty to be silent, being himself a slave-holder, and bound at all times, when properly called on, to offer reasons in justification of his actions.

[Mr. MINER rose to explain. The honorable member must have misapprehended him, as he certainly did not mean to make any attack upon those who held slave property. His remarks were strictly confined to the case of the Africans whom he could not regard as slaves, and he did not think our laws should so regard them.]

Mr. WEEMS said he had no disposition to doubt the honorable gentleman, or to reject his explanation. But he wished to be understood, in accepting it, to receive it precisely as he would an apology from a man who had first attempted to knock him down, and then declared he had no intention of injuring him. Sir, said Mr. WEEMS, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. R.] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. G.] must have satisfied, if not all, certainly the most who have listened to them, that this particular act, now under discussion of enslaving men, was not contrary to law, however it might be according to the notions entertained by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania on that subject, contrary to humanity. My object, sir, said Mr. W. will now be, to shew, that the gentleman is equally mistaken as to another law, and the Gospel, which he has thought proper to introduce to his aid; and he would here state, without fear of contradiction, so far as proof be required to meet proof, that slavery, the right of property in the human family, by purchase with your money, to be held and transferred in perpetuity to posterity, had been recognized by the Almighty himself to the fullest extent, under every dispensation which he has condescended in mercy to extend to man; after advancing this unfashionable proposition, said Mr. WEEMS, I hope to be indulged, whilst I offer in as a brief a manner as possible, a few of the leading proofs that at present occur to my mind, out of the many passages, which are to be adduced from both the Old and New Testaments. Mr. W. said he would not go back to the origin of slavery. The sin of ingratitude committed by the ungrateful Ham towards his aged father, after that father had, as the favored instrument of God, saved him and his family from that universal ruin into which all animated nature had been thrown, with the exception of what, under God's directions, he had received into his ark of safety, further than by a reference to satisfy those who will examine for themselves, that slavery was the decree of Heaven; "Cursed should be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren;" and that "Shem should be blessed," and "Canaan shall be a servant," and that "God would enlarge Japheth and Canaan should be his servant;" so said the good old Noah, and the sequel, so far as sacred and profane history are to be received in evidence, has proved that he knew and said it prophetically, as he knew and spoke of the approaching deluge before it came—and who can unsay it?

Mr. W. said he would invite the attention of the House immediately to him, who, of all others, it pleased God to style his friend—the faithful Abraham—with whom God established a covenant, that which Christians believe and acknowledge to be the prototype of Baptism; wherein he was commanded to circumcise, at eight days old, "all born in the house, or bought with money of any stranger, which is not of thy seed;" thereby recognizing the right of property by purchase, not only for the moment, but forever, "and my covenant shall be in your flesh an everlasting covenant;" and this very same Abraham must have been a vile old sinner, (agreeable to the notions of the present day) for we read that, on one occasion, he armed 318 of his servants, and wicked as he was to hold servants, God blessed him, and gave success to his arms. Again, sir, said Mr. W. we find under the Mosaic dispensation, slavery to be recognized to the fullest possible extent; nay, sir, it is commanded by him who was believed by all to be a law-giver from God; through him we received the commandments of "thou shalt do no murder," &c.; and if we respect those, we are equally to respect other commands delivered through him, the very same law-giver. Now, what was Moses' command on the subject of slavery? It was this: "If a Hebrew brother became poor, and was sold for his debts, he should not be held as a slave, but as an hired servant, and, after a limited time, and at a fixed period, should be allowed to go free. But not so of others, not Hebrews. No, sir, his words are: "Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids; moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land, and they shall be your possession; and ye shall take them for an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever. But over your brethren, the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigor." Yet, sir, the pretended philanthropy of our day can admit of no difference; all are entitled to equal rights, God's command even to the contrary notwithstanding. Now, sir, though last, not least, let me draw the attention of this House and the world as far at least as what I may humbly offer shall extend, to the Gospel of our Saviour. His self-taught followers have called upon masters to render to their servants that which is reasonable and just; and upon the servants to obey and to serve their masters in the flesh, faithfully as serving God. St. Paul, when applied to by a runaway, so successfully instructs him in this his duty, that he is found to alter his design, and to return voluntarily, to his master Philemon, with a letter from Paul: wherein Philemon is enjoined to receive him, and treat him to be sure as a brother, as he was, with his, Paul's, promise to make up or pay him what Onesimus might owe him for absenting himself, assuring his master how gladly he would have Onesimus to administer unto himself, but, without his master's consent, he would do nothing. What more, sir, need I offer to convince gentlemen of the advantage that would arise from an examination of a subject, and of authorities in proof of the truth, previous to an officious intermeddling with what they know or seem to know but little indeed about. I hope, sir, the amendment now before the House will be rejected.

Mr. MINER now withdrew his amendment.

And the question being put on Mr. BARTLETT's original resolution, viz. to have the bill recommitted, with instructions to report to the House the facts of the case, it was adopted without a division.

CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The remainder of the day was occupied in the consideration of the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive: when Mr. DRAYTON took the floor and concluded the arguments commenced by him on a previous day, in reply to those gentlemen who had opposed the amendment moved by Mr. LIVINGSTON.*

Mr. DRAYTON, of South Carolina, rose, and said he concurred with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK] who last addressed the Committee, in the wish he expressed, that the necessity should never occur of discussing the question now before the Committee. But the necessity has occurred, said Mr. D. and the gentleman from New York has contributed at least as much towards it as any one who has engaged in the debate. The Gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] requested that no member from certain parts of the Union would condescend to discuss the main question which had been raised. With the most unfeigned personal respect for that gentleman, I shall rather imitate his precept than his example: for after the course which he had recommended, in a manner the most solemn and impressive, he afterwards entered into an argument which, perhaps, exhausted the subject. I undertake to say, that, if it should ever here be seriously discussed, whether the master has a right of property in his slave, that no members would remain in this Hall, who represent the People of the States in which slaves are possessed. Rights which are secured by the Constitution must endure as long as that Constitution exists. Is it not an article of the Constitution that private property shall not be taken for public use, without compensation? Is it not another, that the citizens of each State are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States? Are these articles respected, if his property is ravished from the Southern owner, and applied to the public use, without remuneration? Is he alone to be deprived of that which is enjoyed by every other citizen? Are these infractions of legal, and moral, and constitutional rights to be even justified by resorting to abstract subtleties and sophistical refinements? Let me entreat the Committee to look at the real question which is before it. It is simply whether an individual, whose property has been impressed into the public service, is to be paid for the damages he has sustained by that act. Would the Committee, apprehending clearly this question, ponder for a moment as to the answer to be given? If it pauses, upon the ground that slaves are not property—if it pauses to investigate and decide what Congress has no power to sit in judgment upon—the pause would resemble that which precedes the whirlwind and the tempest: it would be followed by the rocking of the fabric of our Constitution to its base, and its prostration in the dust. Sir, when I listened to the sentiments which were expressed by some who have addressed the Committee, particularly by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK] when I heard them utter opinions pregnant with such baleful consequences, I shuddered. When I heard doctrines advanced, the recognition of which would dissolve the bonds of our Confederacy, I trembled for my country. It has been openly avowed, that the United States, in virtue of the compromise in the Constitution, by which slaves were represented, are entitled, in every military emergency, to take these slaves into the public service, without the consent or remuneration of their owners. Do the inhabitants of the South hold their property at the will of the United States? Are their slaves at the mercy of the Government? Can their proprietors, when it shall please this Government, be reduced to destitution and beggary? When such principles are promulgated, will our citizens calculate upon the value of the Union? If I know my countrymen, they would sooner perish; but they would perish with arms in their hands, dyed in the blood of those who would attempt to rivet upon them so degrading a vassalage. Did they submit to such degradation, they would deserve it: they would be fitter for slavery than freedom. And yet, sir, whilst professing doctrines leading to the direst issues, to the subversion of the Confederacy, to bloodshed and civil war, the gentleman [Mr. CLARK] talked, in impassioned terms, of justice, and benevolence, and religion. Sacred majesty of justice! are these thy dictates? Pure fountain of benevolence! do these precepts flow from thy source? Is this, O God of Mercy! is this the religion thou enjoimest? Though somewhat drawn from the even tenor of the discussion, by giving utterance to feelings which could not be suppressed, I will, nevertheless, now endeavor to argue the question before us calmly, or rather those parts of it which admit of argument. As several gentlemen have spoken, to whom I wish to reply, in order to save the time of the Committee I will compress the substance of what they have said in a few propositions, and trust that I shall demonstrate that they rest upon foundations which are utterly untenable.

It has been contended, that slaves, not being mentioned in the act of 1816, which provided for the payment of property injured or destroyed by the enemy, whilst in the military service of the United States, therefore, admitting them to be property, compensation cannot, legally, be made to their owners for any damages they might suffer from their slaves being injured or destroyed, when pressed into the military service of the Government.

That the Government has no power, under any circumstances, to impress a slave, therefore, that compensation for his labor, deterioration, or loss, ought not to be granted, should he be pressed into the national service.

That no peculiar hardship is endured by the owner, in consequence of a refusal to remunerate him for the labor, deterioration, or destruction of his slave, pressed into the service of the public, inasmuch as no compensation is granted to the master for the damages he sustains from the enlistment of his apprentice, or to the parent for his minor son, when impressed into the Army.

That, although slaves, under one view of their condition, are property, yet, when considered in another aspect, as giving a right of representation, they then cease to be property, and must be regarded as persons.

From the commencement of the observations of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESER] I had hoped that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] might have been disposed of, without any irritation or excitement. The gentleman from Ohio, after unqualifiedly conceding that slaves were property, accompanied by some remarks, which were kind and liberal, contended, that the petitioner was not entitled to compensation for the damages he had sustained in consequence of his slave having been pressed into the military service of the United States, because slaves were not enumerated among the particular description of property contained in the act of 1816. Although I should have thought that the gentleman's construction of the act was erroneous, yet it would have afforded me great satisfaction that this should be the ground upon which he offered the amendment. Had the debate been limited to the construction of the law, and had no other exceptions to the amendment been relied upon, no irritation would have been created; and I am confident that neither my colleagues nor myself would have exhibited any other feelings than such as are called forth by the ordinary topics of legislation, and this Committee would not have heard an angry tone of discussion, which must have been painful to it to listen to.

In the 3d section of the act of 1816, it is enacted, that if damage has been sustained by the loss, capture, or destruction, by an enemy, of any horse, mule, ox, wagon, cart, boat, sleigh, or harness, whilst in the military service of the United States, either by impressment or contract, the owners of such property shall be indemnified. In this enumeration slaves are not named, from which the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESER], from Virginia, [Mr. MCCOY], and from New York, [Mr. STROONG], infer, that they were not intended to be comprehended in it. But the 5th section of the same act declares, that where any property impressed or taken by public authority, for the use or subsistence of the Army, during the late war, has been destroyed, lost, or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof. This section is general and embraces every species of property. Had it not been inserted, the 3d section would have been imperfect : for, if a slave would not be within its meaning because not named, neither would any other species of property, which had not been named ; the effect of which would have been, that no compensation could be made for the use, loss, or destruction of any animal excepting a horse, mule, or ox : of any kind of carriage, excepting a wagon or cart : of any floating vessel excepting a boat ; or of any property which might have been lost or destroyed in a wagon, cart, or boat : nor could compensation have been made for working tools, provisions, timber, iron, &c. or any of the infinite varieties of articles, which the exigencies of the occasion might require. The mere statement of these effects, resulting from limiting the construction of the act to the specific subjects enumerated in its 3d section, is sufficient to shew the incorrectness of the inference which has been drawn from it. It is well known to the members of this Committee, to be the ordinary practice, in framing laws, in which certain objects are intended to be provided for, first, to detail these objects, and then to introduce a general provision, in order to guard against omissions, frequently unavoidable, where specifications are attempted. With this view the 5th section was inserted : under it every species of property is included ; a slave, therefore being property, which in this part of their argument was conceded by the gentleman opposed to the amendment, it follows, necessarily, that his owner is as much entitled to compensation, under the circumstances stated in the act, as the owner of any other property, in the same situation.

Case of Marigny D'Autorice.

But we are told that the Government has no power, under any circumstances, to press slaves into its service ; therefore, that compensation ought not to be allowed for their use, deterioration, or loss, where the Government does exercise this power. Sir, I can scarcely reply to this position with seriousness. A more utter abandonment of sense to abstraction ; a more perfect invasion of all the rules of logic and reasoning : a more untenable, indefensible paradox, I have never heard uttered upon this floor. What is the substance, if substance it have any ? That the commission of a wrong absolves the party committing it from responsibility. That the usurpation of power exempts the usurper from moral or legal accountability. That the wrong of seizing property, tyrannically, justifies the wrong of refusing to make compensation for its use or destruction. What, do laws protect the violators of right ? I had always thought that they were framed to protect the citizen from wrong. Does the Constitution forbid our Government from doing justice, only in cases in which our Government has been unjust ? If my dwelling has been reduced to ashes by the incendiary—if my purse has been forced from me by the robber—if my life has been taken by the murderer—shall these criminals be permitted to elude the vengeance of the law, upon the plea, that they had no right to commit the felonies which they have perpetrated ? And yet, upon no better foundation rests the argument of the gentleman, that the Government, in the case before us, is not bound to remunerate the petitioner. As has been properly said by the gentleman from Louisiana, though his meaning has been grossly misconceived, the Government has no right by the Constitution or by law, to press any kind of property, Extraordinary cases, nevertheless, happen, when imperious necessity, and the preservation of the body politic, justify such an act. Where such high necessity exists, every kind of property is equally subject to be put in requisition. Though unwilling to make any admission authorizing the United States, or any of their military agents, to interfere with the Southern slave, I yet agree with my colleague, [Mr. HAMILTON,] (though I very much qualify the application of the eminent domain and transcendental propriety, in a Republic like ours) when the enemy is menacing our Territory, and his progress cannot be impeded, without calling forth all the physical force of the adjacent country, to erect fortifications, throw up entrenchments, or to perform any other kind of military service, that the labor of the slave would be no more exempt than the use of any other species of property which could be rendered available for the national protection. There are times and occasions when the laws are violated to preserve the laws ; when the Constitution is infringed to save the Constitution ; and I hesitate not to declare, that the officer commanding the forces of the Union, who, in a perilous crisis, when the country could not be defended against an invading enemy, unless he forced to its aid all the physical force he could collect, unless he took upon himself the responsibility of an authority beyond the strictness of the law, would be a traitor to his trust and a traitor to his reputation if he shrunk from encountering that responsibility. But it is idle to reason upon the conduct to be pursued in such extraordinary conjunctures : when they occur, the enlightened soldier will take counsel from his patriotism and his valor : he will appeal to his God, his country, and his sword, and not entangle himself in the mazes of legal subtlety or metaphysical abstraction. The nation would not merely justify, but applaud such conduct ; whilst, according to the spirit of the Constitution, it would take care to provide compensation to the individuals whose property had been sacrificed to the general weal. And the very law upon which we have been commenting, was enacted for this especial purpose.

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. STOWES,) broadly denying that either the Government, or any of its agents, military or civil, can upon any principle of State necessity, or upon any other principle, press into its service, either a slave, or any other kind of property, asserts, that, whenever any property has, by a Military officer, been pressed into the public use, and compensation has been allowed to the individual injured, that he has been compensated upon the ground, that the officer was a trespasser. I will thank the gentleman to point out a single instance of such a case. Our statute book abounds with acts giving compensation to citizens, whose property was impressed, during the late war ; not one of them gives relief upon the ground which that gentleman has stated ; if he will read the act of 1816, he will not discover in it a single expression, from which the remotest implication could be drawn, that the relief therein provided for, is granted because the military officer was a trespasser. Upon that ground, precisely, would it be, that compensation would be refused. For the tortious illegal act of the officer he would be personally responsible to the party aggrieved, in a Court of Justice, by which, vindictive damages would be awarded against him. There can be no doubt that the clause in the Constitution, which declares that private property shall not be taken for the public use without just compensation, was inserted, in order to meet extraordinary exigencies, which could not be anticipated ; which under the pressure of war, peculiarly of invasive war, could not be avoided ; and without which, the country could not be defended.

It has been urged, that where a slave is injured or destroyed, who has been pressed into the public service, his owner suffers no peculiar hardship by not being remunerated for his loss, as no compensation is allowed to the master, for the damages he sustains by the enlistment of his apprentice. A single observation is sufficient to shew the fallacy of this argument. Congress passes a law authorizing the enlistment of apprentices, and this law has been solemnly decided to be constitutional ; but the United States are expressly interdicted, by the Constitution, from taking any private property to the public use, without compensation. The apprentice is as much a citizen as his master ; he may be as deeply interested in the nation's welfare : he is as much bound to defend it; and the contract between the master and the apprentice is merged in the higher obligation which is imposed upon every citizen to protect his country. Where is the analogy between such a case and the one now under consideration? Admitting it to be a case of hardship, that the master, without any remuneration, should be deprived of the services of his apprentice, the obvious answer to the complaint which he might make, would be, that neither the Constitution nor the law affords him any redress; but the Constitution requires for property of every description, taken for the public use, that compensation shall be made; and neither the Constitution, nor the law passed in conformity to it, makes any distinction between the different species of property for which compensation shall be made. The gentleman from New-York, [Mr. STORRS] asks, why should remuneration be made to the owner of a slave for the loss of his services, and not to the parent of a minor? Because the slave is property. The minor owes the same duties to his country, as his parent does; when he enlists, he does so voluntarily and legally, and is paid for his services. The gentleman [Mr. STORRS] has drawn a pathetic picture of the minor dragged by the arm of military power from the embraces of his parents, forced into a camp, and subjected to the harshness of martial law. But this is a mere creation of his fancy. No law of the United States ever existed authorizing the impressment of a minor or of any other citizen into the Federal Army.

Case of Marigny D'Aulivier.

The observations which I have hitherto submitted, are all founded upon the ground that slaves are property, which was unqualifiedly conceded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITTLER] in the beginning of his argument; although, afterwards, he distinctly stated that slaves, when viewed politically, as giving a right of representation, (in which the gentleman from New York, Mr. CLARK, agreed with him,) ceased to be property, and were to be regarded as persons; and both these gentlemen relied not only on the Constitution, but upon the language of the treaty of Ghent, to sustain their position, asserting that that treaty did not make indemnification for losses of property generally, but only for slaves; and, as indemnification was as justly due for one kind of property as another, carried away by the enemy, therefore, they drew the conclusion, that, according to the treaty, slaves were not considered to be property. The gentlemen either never read the treaty upon which they have commented, or they have forgotten what they read. Its language in the first article is, "All places, &c. shall be restored, &c. without carrying away any of the artillery, or other public property, &c. or any slaves, or other private property." The recognition, therefore, that slaves are private property, is expressly made in the treaty; and 'tis notorious, that, under it, indemnification has been obtained for losses, both of slaves and of other kinds of property. 'Tis true, that, by the Constitution, slaves give a right to representation, according to a certain rule; but does property change its nature because it is represented? In all the Governments in Europe, professing the least portion of freedom, property is represented. In many, (I am not prepared to say how many,) of the State Constitutions, property is represented in their Legislatures. There would be as much force in the argument, that persons cease to be persons, because they are represented, as, that property ceases to be property, because it is represented. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] has correctly said, that that is property which the laws declare to be so. What constitutes property varies, in some respects, in different countries; but, in every nation, ancient or modern, in which slavery existed, slaves have been regarded as property, ex utermini, slaves must be property. By all laws, by the laws of nations, the civil law, the municipal law, they are so regarded. In England, the atmosphere of which, it has been said, by some of their writers, is too pure for a slave to breathe, he is, nevertheless, considered to be property; and this view of his condition has been recognized by a decision of Lord Stowell, within a few months, even in a case in which a slave had breathed the pure air of England. In the time of Lord Mansfield, slaves were openly bought and sold in the city of London. By the laws of the United States, levying a direct tax, slaves are specified as property, and assessed as being so. By the laws of every State in the Confederacy, in which there are slaves, they are exclusively property. I make these observations incidentally, and merely as observations. I never will enter into a formal discussion, in this House, whether slaves are property. I will not even plead to its jurisdiction. I will not, in the most indirect manner, suffer an inference to be drawn from any word, or deed of mine, which, by the most strained construction, could be tortured into the semblance of an admission that the Congress of the United States has the shadow of a right to sit in judgment upon this question. If it were to assume this right, the Union would be no more. I would not use such language as this, but upon the most grave and solemn occasions—without the deepest reflection, and the most settled resolution. No one values our Constitution more than I do. I would speak of its dissolution with fear and trembling. In its prostration, I should mourn the ruins of the fairest Temple which Liberty had ever erected. I would cling to the Constitution as long as it exists; but, when its fundamental principles are violated, when, in its name, the most sacred rights are assailed, 'tis no longer the Constitution which we have sworn to support.

Upon the topic of slavery, as connected with its existence in the Southern States, I hoped never to have uttered a syllable in this House; but, as it has been forced upon me, and as, in its discussion, much feeling is necessarily mingled, in order that sentiments may not be ascribed to me which I do not entertain, I will make some few remarks upon the subject. What I have hitherto said, has been founded upon right, upon strict and unalienable right—a right which belongs to my constituents and to myself, which it is both my duty and my inclination to defend and preserve to the utmost of my ability. Slavery, in the abstract, I condemn and abhor. I know no terms too strong to express my reprobation of those who would introduce it into a nation. I know no language of crimination too unqualified to be applied to those who are engaged in the African slave trade. An African slave ship is a spectacle from which all men would recoil with horror, unless the vilest lust of lucre had steeled their hearts against every feeling of humanity. But, when we live in States in which slavery existed before we did, where it has grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength, it has become so inseparable from, and interwoven with, our condition, as to be irremediable—or, if remediable, can only be so by the slow process of time. Our consolation is, that we did not originate it; when a colony, we struggled against it; we found it at our births; it was a part of our inheritance—from which we can no more deliver ourselves, than we can from the miasma of our swamps, or the rays of our burning sun. However ameliorated by compassion—however corrected by religion—still slavery is a bitter draught, and the chalice which contains the nauseous potion, is, perhaps, more frequently pressed by the lips of the master than of the slave. All we can do, is, for our safety, to retain the slaves in a due state of subordination, and, for their sakes, and for the sake of humanity, to treat them with all the consideration and mildness which their condition permits. But, whatever we do, must be the work of ourselves. To understand how slaves ought to be treated, we must be among them—must be acquainted with their minds, temperaments, and habits. One not living among them, would be as unfit to establish rules for their government, as could be an ignorant empiric to prescribe a remedy for a disease which he knew only by name. We not only are alone capable of devising the best practicable mode to be observed towards our slaves, but we will suffer none others to meddle with them. Slavery is a municipal institution, as unconnected with any control of the United States, as our corporations, our colleges, or our public charities. We would as soon permit others to invade the sanctuary of our dwellings, as to touch it. We would as soon permit Congress to dictate to us in our domestic concerns,—in our social intercourse—to prescribe to us a system of religion, or a code of morals. We should receive any extrinsic interposition as an injury, and resent it as an insult. Much as we value this Union, we would rather see it dissolved than yield to such a violation of our rights. Much as we love our country, we would rather see our cities in flames, our plains drenched in blood—rather endure all the calamities of civil war, than parley for an instant upon the right of any power than our own to interfere with the regulation of our slaves.

Whatever violence may have been exhibited in this debate, has been occasioned by the remarks of others. I shall make no particular reply to the position of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK] that, under the compromise in the Constitution, slaves, in time of war, are at the mercy of the Government. From the general tenor of his observations, indicating kindness and good feeling towards his fellow citizens of the South, I am under the impression that, in the heat of argument, he conveyed a meaning beyond what he intended; and I am strongly inclined to think that the gentleman himself will not, upon reflection, entertain the opinion he has expressed, which I do not believe to be the opinion of a single gentleman in this House.

It has been asked by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITLSEY] whether the blood of blacks was purer than that of whites? Whether, should masters remain at home, and send their slaves to battle, this Government ought to pay for them, should they be killed? These are not arguments. If the object of the member was to excite our angry passions—to array the North against the South—to convert this hall into a bloody arena, they might be powerful arguments. Have they any reference to the question under debate? Have the citizens at the South, by any part of their conduct, in war or peace, justified such taunting interrogatories—such bitter, and, but from respect for this committee, I should say, such malignant insinuations? Sir, I envy not the feelings of any one capable of uttering them. They have been volunteered upon an occasion when we merely ask that justice should be done to a citizen, who seeks for that which has been denied to no other in his situation, and which he is entitled to demand by the Constitution and laws of his country.

[Here the debate closed for to-day.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1828.

MOBILE COURT MARTIAL.

Mr. SLOANE moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with a copy of the proceedings of a Court Martial, which commenced its sittings at or near Mobile, on the 5th day of December, 1814, for the trial of certain Tennessee militiamen; together with a copy of all the orders for the organization of said Court, as well as those subsequently issued in relation to its decisions; and to inform this House whether there is in the War Department any evidence that those militiamen were called into service by virtue of any special order of the President of the United States, or whether, in pursuance of the powers vested in him by the law of the 18th of April, 1814, the President did make any general regulation as to the period of time the militia called into service under the provisions of that act, and the act to which it is a supplement, should, be held to service; and, if so, the time at which that regulation was made. And whether the President did give, through the War Department, any order directing the length of time that the detachment of Tennessee militia, of which the men tried by the aforesaid Court Martial at Mobile form a part, should continue in service. And, also, to state under what law these men were drafted, and what laws of the United States were in force at the time they entered the service. And, also, to furnish copies of any correspondence in the War Department, between the President or Secretary of War and the Governor of Tennessee, during the late war, on the subject of the time which the drafted militia of said State should be required to serve in the armies of the United States."

This resolution was laid upon the table for one day.

CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The House being again in Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive, and the question still being on the amendment moved by Mr. LIVINGSTON, providing for the lost time of the petitioner's slave, and the expences of his medical treatment—

Mr. BUNNER, of New York, rose and said, I have listened to the progress of this debate, with a great and constantly increasing interest. At first, however, this struck me as a dry question, relating merely to an individual claim, in which we had only to inquire into the fact, and then determine the compensation. But the debate which has subsequently arisen; the manner of the discussion; the language which has been used; the high tone of defiance on the one side, the bold and reckless spirit with which the subject has been approached on the other, have forced me to contemplate it in a very different aspect. It is impossible for any individual, coming from my part of the country, to hear, dispassionately and coolly, the language which has been used by the gentlemen of the South. We have, all of us, certain habits of thought, certain feelings and associations, inseparable from our nature, which education renders indelible, and which should be mutually respected. We ought to remember, that, so fallible is human reason, and so much under the dominion of the circumstances, which surround it, and impart to it their own character, that the same exact quantum of reason, as it exists, North or South of the Potomac, exercised upon certain subjects, may perform precisely converse operations; and it therefore becomes us, when discussing any topic which thus alters the character of our rational nature, to practice a lesson of mutual toleration, of mutual forbearance. When our Southern brethren, therefore, giving utterance to the unbiassed dictates of their own judgment, on this irritating question, forbid us to touch or approach it—when, in their language of strong and indignant feeling, they warn us against the hazard of incurring the last and worst of political evils—they forget this peculiarity of our relative position. They do more, Mr. Chairman: for, arriving at the conclusion, that this House has no power to decide whether a slave be property by virtue of their own natural reason, and inhibiting us from even an approach to that question, they claim the uncontrolled exercise of reason, and the expression of opinion, which they refuse to us.

If the conclusion of the gentlemen be correct, why may they not safely submit to us the consideration of the premises? If it be incorrect, the language of menace is as impolitic as it is dangerous. I have said, that I originally considered this a dry question; I will now say, that my mind was made up to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, involving the principle of the master's right to compensation for his slave. Subsequent reflection, however, if it have not completely changed my opinion on this point, has certainly induced me to view it as a matter of the slightest comparative importance. The amendment to the report is to allow to the master a compensation for the loss occasioned by the impressment of his slave, under that article of the Constitution which provides that private property shall not be used for public service, unless upon just compensation to the owner. And it is advocated upon the principle, that its rejection will express the decided opinion of this House, that a slave is not property. Such a consequence, sir, in my opinion, is neither natural nor necessary. And I shall briefly state, for the reflection of the gentlemen from the South; why I think it is not. The question, considered in this uninteresting view of it, is, in my opinion, simply, whether the constitutional provision was intended to embrace this precise species of property? And, I confess, though with some hesitation, that I think it was not.

Mr. BURMAN then proceeded to explain, and insist upon the logical and legal distinction between the absolute right of property to material things, and that which consists in a legal title to the services, or interest in the labor of another person. He illustrated this distinction by several analogies and examples, drawn both from the Civil and the Common Law, in the course of which he observed—

There are two great divisions of property, in respect to their natures, that are separated from each other by a line as clear, and marked, as light and darkness. They are—that property which has no rational will, and that which has. Both have been the subjects of ownership from the earliest ages and the right of exclusive ownership over both, is of an origin coeval with the history of the world. The nature, however, of this exclusive right is different, vastly different in each; and the difference arises from the nature of the subject. No man who has the slightest glimmering of reason can confound them. No Legislative body ever has confounded them. The confusion, whenever it arises, has its root in passion, prejudice, or ignorance. Our natural feeling in this, as in many other matters, overmatches all the sophistries of reason. For what man can view the death of his ox and his slave, with equal indifference? If such a man there be, that man is not to be found North or South of the Potomac. We exercise over the one subject, (however uncontrollable our political right and power may be) an accountable, a responsible, a moral agency; if not responsible here, at least hereafter. Now, sir, let me ask, if the framers of our Constitution intended to blend these two subjects together in this their provision? Let me ask, if both had been intended, would not each have been as distinctly pointed out by words, as they are different in their natures? Let me ask again, what is this right of property which the master has over his slave? What but a right to his services, the right to his bodily and intellectual labor, either for life or for years, accompanied by the duties of protection and sustenance? If for either life or years, what difference can the gentleman from Louisiana, the first civilian of his country, among the first jurists of any, point out between the servitude of the slave, and that of a minor by the civil law, or an apprentice by our common law system? For the purposes of this argument, the legal duties of protection are the same in each, and the legal right to the services is the same. I know well, that there is an important difference in their respective conditions; but this is not within the scope of the present discussion.

Did it then ever enter into the imagination of a Northern man to claim a compensation for the services of his impressed son, or his apprentice? Was there ever an attempt from the South, before the one now under consideration, to claim compensation for the loss of services of a slave, or from the North, when the North had slaves, and they were employed in the service of the old Continental Congress? And if not, is it not a strong implication in favor of that construction for which I now contend? That fifty years have passed away without the agitation or decision of this question, is certainly some proof that the framers of the Constitution never intended to embrace the subject-matter. The determination of the House, therefore, on this subject, does not necessarily or naturally involve the question which has excited the warm feelings of the South. We are not even called upon to touch it, much less to decide it. [Mr. B. here briefly stated and summed up the arguments, and cited the language of the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. DRAWTON and of his friend from Louisiana Mr. LIVINGSTON.] And here let me pause; I have now briefly stated the train of thought, which has satisfied me that it is my duty to vote against the amendment. I may be wrong, but I leave that to the reflection of the House, and must now call its attention to the more important and imposing considerations, which the course of this debate, the matter, and the manner of it, have suggested—no, have forced upon me. I have said that this view of the subject is comparatively insignificant. These words, any words, are poor and feeble, to mark the difference which I perceive and feel. The claim for compensation, considered by itself, is truly unworthy of the feeling and talent which it has enlisted and excited—Non dignus vindice nodus. It neither calls for, or justifies, the asperity, the irritation, the deep feeling, of the one side, or the pertinacity of the other. The unnecessary turn that has been given to this discussion may account for the former, as the question it involves should teach the lesson of moderation to both. It is useless to deny it, we cannot deceive ourselves or others. Upon that question depends the existence of this Union.

I, for one, at least, am free to acknowledge, what I religiously believe, that, guarantied as the claimants and possessors of these rights, are, by prescriptive right, and by constitutional compact, they can expect nothing—they can hope nothing—they must lose every thing, if we attempt, by direction or indirection to make or meddle with this subject of their exclusive jurisdiction. This is a topic upon which we of the one side, may speculate coolly; because one common consequence of evil to North and South is remote; the other, peculiar to the South, is present, pressing, and fearful. It is an evil of which the Constitution has made them the only judges, as by its nature they ought to be—the only persons empowered and competent to alter, to soften, or to eradicate. They well know that any experimental tampering on our part, must be made at their sole risk, cost, and suffering. Is it strange, then, that, with the pledged faith of the nation, and the prescriptive right of ages, for the guarantees of their title, they should be jealous of our interference? This, however, is a partial consideration. There is the other common danger to us both, arising out of it, and its necessary consequence, to which I have distinctly alluded. The dissolution of this Union is an event which no American citizen can contemplate without the most intense feelings for the national interest and national glory. I need only allude to it. Other causes may hereafter endanger or destroy this family of free republics, but this is the present danger, imminent and fearful. Mr. B. then insisted warmly, and at length, upon the injurious effect produced on public sentiment, and the patriotic sympathies of the whole nation, by those ill-judged and ill-timed appeals to certain feelings, and those menaces of direful consequences; in their proper time and place susceptible of producing powerful impressions and probably salutary effects; but, if used on any other occasion only wearing out and frittering their own power and weight. He then proceeded. Let me, then, entreat the gentlemen from the South to forbear pressing the discussion of this question upon every idle occasion. Let not the brain-sick theories of speculative men, in this House, or out of it, provoke them to it. Let them not start up, on every inconsiderate resolution which may appear to involve it, to protest against its being considered, thought of, approached, or touched. Let them rest upon their title to the subject as property. It is founded upon the same prescriptive right, upon the same pledge of national faith, with our own. Do the gentlemen of the South suppose that we can sanction an attack upon their rights, which must, in its principle, endanger our own? If we respect not the rights of property, as secured to them, do we not know that the time will come when others will cease to regard or respect our parchments and muniments? But they have a stronger hold upon us than even this. We cannot forget the blood that was prodigally shed by the gallantry of the South in securing that independence which the united wisdom of all has established upon its present basis. We remember who it was from the South that led us to conquest and to glory. Let them trust something to our generous feelings—something to the tie that binds us together. Let them wait until the evil is real, and not distant, contingent, imaginary. When some bold bad man, for mean and selfish purposes, shall attempt to make this contest the ladder of his ambition, whether upon unsound notions of political expediency, or the pretences of impracticable benevolence, they will then find that the North will be true (I speak the language of experience) to them, true to itself, true to the Union. The gallant spirits from South Carolina may then pour forth, in the strong language of passionate eloquence, those truths, the force of which the coolest men will acknowledge, and the dullest will feel. Let the gentleman from Virginia then raise his clear, distinct, and thrilling voice, let him put forth his great energies upon a subject worthy of them—he will find a respondent feeling in the North. He will then discover, when the danger is real, that the sympathy is common. Men of all classes and all descriptions will answer to his call. The danger of this Union will then become a natural object of religious dread and reverence to both North and South. Embracing, as it does, recollections and events, which have both instructed, astonished, and appalled the European world, we will stamp with infamy the man, or combination of men, who attempts to hazard it by an attack upon this, one of its vital principles.

Mr. DORSEY said that, in the extensive range which this debate had assumed, principles had been presented to the committee, in resistance to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, deeply interesting to the Southern section of this Confederacy—to none of it more interesting than the district from whence he came. Experience has demonstrated, said Mr. D., that that peninsula, watered on the east by the Chesapeake, and on the south by the Potomac, from numerous bays and creeks, presents to an invading foe great facilities for carrying on its military operations. Immediately in advance of this city—it is fair to anticipate that, in any future war, the enemy will seek again to add to the lustre of their arms the sacking of the capital of this Union, and, thus it again will become the theatre of war; that, in resistance to the approaches of the enemy, the national Government will be called on to put into active requisition the physical strength of that district; that, from its sparse population and extensive water courses, slaves will be impressed into the public service to do the labor, the drudgery of the camp. Hence, the principles on which the resistance to this claim reposes, are of essential interest to those who have charged me with the vindication and protection of their rights. I cannot consent, therefore, to be a listener only in this debate; and, however reluctant to participate in the discussions of this hall, I must become an actor, and contribute as far as I can to resist a recognition, by this committee, of principles pregnant with so much danger to the future interest of my constituents. I shall not add to the excitement which has already been produced, which has increased as the discussion has progressed; neither shall I attempt to decide who were the first to produce it. In all discussions producing mutual excitement, most generally there are faults on both sides.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana goes to indemnify the master of a slave impressed into the public service, by the order of General Jackson, and wounded by the enemy while thus in the public service, for the deterioration in his value caused by the wound thus received.

This amendment is resisted by the gentlemen who have argued in opposition to its adoption, upon various grounds. It is resisted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITLSEY] upon the practice of the Government, as illustrated by various precedents recognizing the principle that slaves are not put on the footing of property, and paid for when lost to the owner, in the public service. By the gentleman from New York, a member of the Committee of Claims, on the ground that it is the right of the Government, when threatened with destruction, to use slaves for the purpose of national defence, and that, too, without being liable to be called on for indemnification. By another gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] upon the ground, that the right of the master in his slave, is a right to his services under all circumstances whatsoever, and also to the absolute, unqualified control and custody of his person; so that it cannot be taken from him for purposes of service, nor his actions regulated by any power but his own, save when the State lays its hand upon him for the punishment of crime, and the preservation of public peace. By all these gentlemen, upon the analogy between master and servant, and master and apprentice. The claim is farther resisted upon the ground of political inexpediency.

The gentleman from Ohio has, for a long time, been a distinguished and laborious member of the Committee of Claims. He knows full well the great weight which the decisions of preceding committees, and the opinions of enlightened statesmen, have on the judgment of those called to act upon analogous questions. He has, therefore, with great industry, culled from the Journals of this House, reports of various committees on questions of the like character with the one under discussion—establishing, as he argues, the correctness of the position which he has assumed in opposition to the amendment; and from which he argues that the practice of the Government has been to withhold indemnity for slaves injured when called into the public service, as D'Auterive's slave was. With great deference to the judgment of that gentleman, the reports referred to recognize no such principle. The principle recognized in these cases presented to the committee, is, that, when a slave is voluntarily carried into the military service of the country, by his master, being an officer, and substituted, by the assent of the officer commanding, for the servant which the Government was bound to provide the master with, that then the Government is not bound to indemnify the master for an injury sustained by the servant while thus employed. The cases referred to, are cases of substitution by agreement. The first case is the report of Montgomery, who was a lieutenant, who carried with him his servant as a waiter, who was killed. The committee in that report, say, if the Government should be compelled to pay for the negro, they would stand as the warrantor of the value, instead of making a reasonable allowance for him as waiter—placing the resistance to his application for relief upon the spirit of the implied agreement, which was not one of warranty, but of compensation.

In accordance with this principle, recognized in this first application to the Government for relief for slaves injured in the public service, the claims of Lawrence, Evans, and Shaw, were rejected, inasmuch as all of those claims were for indemnity for the loss of their slaves, who were substituted in the place of the waiters which the Government, by its army regulations, had itself promised to these officers, to be taken from the ranks. The application now made for compensation comes not within the rule of substitution, for it is a case of impressment, where the Government, bound with the obligation of the general defense, omitted to provide the means essential to protect the country against the invasion of the enemy, impresses or takes, without the consent of the citizen, his slave, and employs him for the general welfare.

The next report referred to by the chairman, is the case of Purkill, who was impressed by the order of General Jackson, and, when the men were called to man the lines on the 8th of January, was sent to throw up entrenchments, in the doing of which he contracted a consumption, of which he died. The committee that reported on this case, were of opinion that, as it was a case of consequential injury, the Government was not bound to indemnify the owner; and when the committee report adverse to this claim, because the injury was consequential, it does appear to me, Mr. Chairman, that, if the injury had been direct and immediate, in consequence of a wound received in battle, they would have reported in favor of Purkill's claim. Indeed, it does appear, from the distinction taken by the committee, that they admit the liability of the Government for indemnity for immediate and direct injury, but not for remote or consequential injury. If, in their opinion, the Government was exempt from the obligation of indemnity for injuries done to slaves while impressed in the public service, I can see no reason for the distinction assumed by the committee between direct and consequential injury, upon which this report reposes. Thus, sir, it does appear that this is the first case in which this House has been called on to decide if there be any claim on the justice of this nation to indemnify a master for an immediate and direct injury, resulting from a wound received from the enemy by his slave, while impressed into the public service. The whole power of precedent is thus removed. There is no practice of this House; no principle recognized by the treaty-making power; no act of the General Government, which rejects this claim.

Let us then see how it stands on principle. The gentleman from New York says, that the Constitution, for certain purposes, regards slaves as persons, and for a very important purpose. It gives to their masters, in their right, a portion of our national representation, and the equivalent yielded for this increase on this floor, is the right of this Nation to call those slaves to the general defence, in times of great national emergency, and that, too, without incurring any responsibility on the part of the Government, to indemnify their masters, for their loss in battle. It is a subject of congratulation, sir, that no other gentleman, in debate, has relied upon this constitutional doctrine, in resistance to the proposed amendment. Whenever this House shall recognize in the National Government, the right claimed for it by the gentleman from New York, it will carry alarm and dismay through the Southern sections of this Republic. If this nation is vested with this implied power of taking this species of private property, upon any great political exigency, for the common defence, without making just compensation to the owner, the citizen has no constitutional security for the acquisitions of his labor; and, if this distinction is recognized by this House, between slaves and other kinds of property, it will engender in the minds of our people, jealousies and distrust. They will be led to believe, that that species of private property which is most common in the South, will be placed within the grasp of the national arm, without just compensation to the owners; while the property and the wealth of the non-slave holding States is shielded against its power by the restrictions imposed by the Constitution in protection of private property. A recognition of such a distinction will be highly invidious, and cause much just dissatisfaction. But this branch of the prerogative claimed for the Federal Government by the gentleman from New York, alarming as it may be, is nothing, when contrasted with the terrific power, which he also says was yielded up by the Southern States, at the adoption of the Constitution, as the equivalent for an increased representation on this floor. This power, he says, thus yielded to the General Government, was the power to embody our slaves, to discipline, to arm them—in fine, the power to place the lives of the master in the hands of the slave! It cannot be that the South ever consented to yield such a prerogative to the National Government. The magnitude of the grant is of too appalling and terrific a character for this House, for the gentleman from New York, upon deliberation, to believe, that the compromising temper of the Constitution, in relation to representation, eventuated in arming the National Government with such an unrestricted control over this species of property, which, according to the gentleman's views, not only may be taken without equivalent, but which, when taken, may be so used as to produce the most horrible results!

I forbear pressing any further this aspect of his position. My object is not to produce excitement.

I will, now, sir, examine this theory of compromise in relation to representation, which, in the view of the gentleman from New York, clothes this Government with this power over this species of property. He argues that the Constitution regards slaves as persons, and that for a very important purpose—to swell the representation of a State on this floor.

Yes, sir, they are so regarded for this purpose. In that article of the Constitution, the word person is used as synonymous with "human being and inhabitant." The Constitution, in the second section of the first article, provides, that "Representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound for a term of years, three-fifths of all other persons."

The word persons was unquestionably substituted for slaves. The words free persons, including those bound to service, embraced all the inhabitants or human beings of a State, save slaves; and the delicacy of the framers of the Constitution avoided, sedulously, the introduction of the word slave, and embraced them under the general term of other persons. Yet, the gentleman says this substitution of the words "other persons," for slaves, deprives the master of that entire and exclusive control which the master, by the municipal regulation of the State, has over the person and labor of the slave, whenever the wants of the National Government demand his services in time of national danger. If this caste of human beings had then been called slaves in the Constitution, instead of other persons, they would have retained their character of private property for all purposes, and could only have been used like other private property, by the Government. If this view be correct, it may be asked with confidence, is the right of the master to his slave weakened, or can this Government assume any right to control the person of a slave, otherwise than is pointed out in relation to its use as private property, because the Constitution, from peculiar delicacy, forebore to distinguish them as slaves, but as human sentient beings? They are so; but, because they are so, and are called so, they do not cease to be slaves, for any purpose: their relations are fixed by the municipal code, and let them receive what denomination they may, or be embraced by what circumlocution you choose, their condition is not altered until their bonds are burst asunder. They still continue to be property—to be slaves, however distinguished, and can only be used by the nation, as it uses other private property, by paying for it.

Case of Marigny D'Auvergne.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK] in confirmation of his views of compromise and equivalent, has referred to the 54th number of the Federalist to show Mr. Madison's views upon this question. That number was prepared to remove the objections taken by the non-slave holding States to that feature of the Constitution by which three-fifths of the slave population are added to the free population of a State in relation to its representation here. It was objected that slaves ought not to give to their masters an increased representation: for "slaves are considered as property, not as persons—they ought, therefore, to be comprehended in the estimates of taxation as property, and be excluded from representation, which is regulated by a census of persons." In reply to this objection, it was argued in that number, that it was true that slaves were considered as property, but they were also considered as something more than property—they were considered as moral persons, liable to be punished for crime, as members of society. But that, inasmuch as the right of suffrage was regulated by the State Sovereignities, it was but just and equal that the Southern States should have their numbers also augmented by the addition of slaves, who were likewise excluded from voting, but who were "members of society." These conflicting opinions, sir, were reconciled by the compromising spirit of the framers of the Constitution, who consented to regard the slave as two-fifths of a man, and to graduate the representation upon this scale. The compromise was a compromise of the right of representation; it was not a compromise affecting the exclusive right of property and a cession of a portion of it to the Federal Government for the common defence in time of war without equivalent. It had no squinting at such unequal contributions by the different sections in time of war. But the gentlemen say that the slave is something more than property, yet they refuse this amendment; they adhere not to their theory of the relation which he holds to the nation, if he be something more than property; he still is property, and, as property, when taken, must be paid for. To resist this amendment, they ought to labor to prove that the slave is less than property (the very reverse of their theory) and being less than property, that Government was not bound to pay for it as property.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. STORRS] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESLEY] reject this power of the National Government over the slave for any purpose, and that, having no such power itself, it can delegate none such to its officers. I thank, sir, these gentlemen for this unapproachable character with which they clothe the slave, so flattering to our exclusive right of property; but, sir, I would have thanked them if they had referred to those principles of the Constitution which deny to the National Sovereignty the power of calling to the erections of fortifications, to the drudgery of the camp, to laborious and menial employment, this description of property, in times of great public necessity, paying to the proprietor a just compensation. Their opinions, however weighty, would have had more influence on my mind, if they had developed the principles and reasoning by which they come to these conclusions.

If I understand the gentleman from New York, he says that the Constitution of the United States never fixed the relation of master and slave; that that is established by the laws of the State in which they reside. This position is unquestionably true. It is, therefore, of some consequence to inquire how this relation is fixed by the States. It is the power which the master has to his horse, his ox, his ass, his any thing, recognized by the municipal law, as the exclusive right of property, to sell, to will, to give, to do any and every act of proprietorship not inconsistent with humanity. No additional character to that of property, gives to this species of property a higher dignity; it is not entrenched by the laws of the State with greater jealousy against invasions of the rights of property. It is considered as property only, guided and controlled in its conveyance, in its bequest, and its descent, by the same principles that regulated property of any other species. In looking to the municipal code, we find nothing to distinguish it from the mass of other species of property. If then the State Sovereignities class it with, and subject it to all the principles of every other species of private property; and clothe it with no other higher attributes of property; and if the United States have a right, under the Constitution, to take private property for public use, paying a just compensation; I ask the gentleman to point out a prohibition in the Constitution, differing this species of property from others, and rendering the latter subject to the public use, and exempting slaves from the eminent control over all private property for public use, for which the Constitution provides. Flattered as I may be with this panoply, with which the gentleman has invested his property in our slaves, denying to the National Government any right even to their use in time of great national danger, let alone as fit subjects for that national legislation over their condition, so pressed upon the public attention by misdirected philanthropy, my judgment cannot adopt the gentleman's conclusion, that, although they are private property, by the laws of the States, and that, although the Government may take private property for public use, paying therefor, yet that this private property comes not within the range of the constitutional right to take private property for the public use, paying therefor.

The opinion of the treaty-making power has been brought to bear in opposition to the amendment. A little reflection will convince us, that the treaty-making power has uniformly considered slaves as property, and not as a part of the physical strength liable to be called by the National Government to fill the ranks of the army. Both of the gentlemen belonging to the Committee of Claims, have referred to the treaty of Ghent, as illustrating their position. The gentleman from New York says: Why did the Government of this country claim of Great Britain indemnity for slaves captured during the war? Was it on the ground they were 'property?' If so, the Government has made an odious distinction between the citizens. On this principle, it should have claimed indemnity for property of every description, captured or destroyed. I may be permitted to remark, that the principles upon which indemnity has been claimed from the British Government, for slaves and other private property, has been misconceived by the gentlemen who have alluded to this topic. The American Government has not pressed an indemnity from the British Government, for slaves, and other private property, captured and carried away contrary to the usages of civilized war, but for slaves, and other private property, deported from the United States by his Britannic Majesty's officers, in violation of the first article of the treaty of Ghent. The contracting parties assumed, as a basis of this article, the "status ante bellum," and stipulated to restore all territory, or places taken during the war, without distinction, or carrying away any public property originally captured in the said places, and which shall remain there at the time of the ratification of the treaty; or any slave or other private property. This article is a literal transcript of the definitive treaty of peace, of '83. The Government of the U. States sent, upon the exchange of the ratification of the treaty, agents to receive from the British officers commanding at those places stipulated to be restored, the public property, slaves, and other private property remaining there. The officers offered and did deliver all the slaves and other private property captured at the places restored, but refused to make restitution of the slaves and other private property brought to those places from elsewhere, after the places had been taken, and remaining there at the time of the exchange of the ratification—giving to the article a restrictive construction, imposing upon the obligation of restoration of slaves and other private property, the same limitation and restriction as to public property originally captured at the place to be restored. The Executive of the United States denied this to be the fair interpretation of the article, and gave to it the construction which imposed the duty of restoration of slaves and other private property, from whencesoever taken, if they were within the waters of the United States at the time of the ratification. In contravention of this construction, the officers of the British Navy deported slaves, which, under the spirit of the article, ought to have been restored, and the able and efficient representative of the American Cabinet to the Court of St. James was instructed to press the British Government for an indemnity to the owners, for slaves thus deported in contravention of the treaty. This demand was most pertinaciously denied, and was the subject of a protracted negotiation between the able diplomatists of that day; and eventuated in a submission of the obligation of restoration of slaves, and other private property, thus deported, to the Emperor of Russia. The gentleman from South Carolina is mistaken, when he says the question referred was the question whether a slave was private property. Great Britain had never denied that character to them; they are classed, in her treaties with us, as private property—slaves, or other private property. Her pledge for restoration sprung from the consideration that they were private property, and, as such, ought to be restored, as originally not liable to capture, from the pervading exemption of private property from capture, according to the rules of civilized warfare.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK] considers them as combatants, to be called into the armies. The Ministers of Ghent never viewed them as such—if they had, they would have come within the range of the second article, which provides for the restoration of prisoners, and there would have existed no necessity for a special provision providing for their restoration. Thus the stipulations of the treaty and the treaty-making power, not only disclaim the views of these gentlemen, but may be invoked to the support of the amendment, and of the principles upon which it is based.

I approach the doctrine of analogy between the case of master and apprentice, and master and slave. We are asked with great confidence to point out the difference upon the point of just compensation between the two cases. They are obvious. Sir, the apprentice is a free man—liable, on the very first principles of Government, to contribute to the Government that protects him, his support; but it is not necessary to recur to these first elements of society, to shew that the Government has a right to control the service of the apprentice. Among the enumerated powers conferred on the General Government, by the Constitution, is to be found that which authorizes it to provide for the organization of the militia. Under this express power, they have a right to say at what age a citizen shall be enrolled and compelled to do duty. The limitation of age is a question of expediency; they have a right to raise armies; they can say at what age a citizen may enter into the service. The right of the master is conventional between him and the apprentice. It is a Lilliputian tie, which may be rent asunder whenever National danger or policy shall require the Congress of the United States to interpose. It is not so with slaves—as persons, they enter not into the calculation of those who bear arms against the foe; over them as such, we may look in vain for our chartered license to legislate.—Hence springs the difference: the Constitution gives us the right of legislation over the apprentice—withholds it from us over the slave. But a most essential difference is to be found in another aspect between their relations to the Union: Slaves are considered as property for all purposes of taxation. Apprentices are not considered as property for any purpose of taxation whatever. Yes, sir, slaves are considered as property for taxation: for, in 1813, among the war tax, a direct tax was laid on slaves, and the assessors were directed to value them at their full value; and, at the very time when this petitioner was in the ranks of the army, resisting the invasion of the enemy, he was paying a tax upon this very slave, which you yourselves had determined was property—as such, liable to be taxed, and being thus liable to be taxed as property, liable to be taken for public use, paying a just compensation. I put it to liberal gentlemen, if it be either consistent with the dignity or justice of National legislation, to say that, for purposes of taxation, when the public coffers are to be filled, and the impositions on other species of private property are to be lightened, we will consider slaves as property; and that, when we take them for common defence, we will suffer ruin to overtake their owners, by denying that they are property, and thus let the losses which the American Government ought to sustain from the National resources, fall, with a ruinous oppression, on its citizens.

But suppose, for a moment, that the Government has a right to the services of slaves in time of imminent peril, without equivalent, has it a right to the service of any particular slave? If it has a right, it may be a right to claim from the slave holders a fair contribution from the slave population. Distributive justice rejects with promptitude the idea of forcing one individual of a community to contribute his wealth, his resources, for the general defence, without a corresponding contribution from other citizens, alike interested in the national glory—in the general prosperity.

As to the danger from the exercise of such a power by the National Government, I thank the gentlemen for their warning voice. We fear no abuse of this power. It does not enter into our conception that any such danger is to be apprehended; that, "if this power is recognized, the General Government may fill its rank and files with slaves." That step would be a dissolution of this Union; it would fail in its object of providing for the general welfare and for the common defence, and the States would be dissolved from all allegiance. We ask for the delegation of no such power to the Federal Executive, but we are willing that our slaves may be called to that service of the country which does not jeopardize our own security, while it gives strength to the military arm, by enabling it to carry into battle the

"Had the British Plenipotentiaries asked of us an explanation of our proposal to transpose the words, we certainly should have given it: we evidently had an object in making the proposal, and we thought the words fully disclosed it, viz: 'our object was the restoration of all property, including slaves, which, by the usage of war, among civilized nations, ought not to have been taken. All private property on shore was of that description: it was entitled, by the laws of war, to exemption from capture: Slaves were private property.'"—[Note by Mr. D.]

free citizens. We wish not—we fear not—that the eagles of this country will be borne in battle or sustained in the fight by bond men; when that time shall come, so degenerate shall we be, that this Union will not need preservation.

The gentleman from New York tells us, that, if a Southern President would not thus fill the ranks, a Northern one might. As to a Southern one, I entertain no fears: as to a Northern one, I tell the gentleman I am as equally free from apprehension. Does he not know that the law is gone forth, that we of the South have resolved that there shall be no future President north of the Susquehanna? The gentleman knows me too well, to suppose that in this rule of exclusion I participate. I am with him. Therefore, when he talks of a Northern President, he attempts to frighten us with an imaginary personage, which, in no time to come, is again to be seen. The committee will pardon me for this badinage; and I trust, that, when we recollect the great and glorious achievements of that day—the results which then and now attends it in our national and even social concerns, there will be no difficulty in this committee voting in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, now obtained the floor but yielded it to

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, who said, that arguments had been suggested in this discussion, which he could not have foreseen. He had not the least idea that such a spirit could have been excited as had been manifested in the House; and, so far from having deserved the reproach of unnecessarily stirring an important and delicate question, the amendment he had proposed could not, as he thought, hurt any honest prejudice, or give the slightest shock to the most sensitive mind; on the contrary, in itself, it involved nothing but a question of plain obvious justice. He had, however, with deep regret, perceived, that it had been made the occasion of introducing the most dangerous and destructive doctrine; and, having no desire to prolong or to increase the excitement growing out of this debate, it was his intention, before he resumed his seat, to withdraw the amendment he had offered. Justice to himself, however, required that he should state his reasons for so doing.

It had been said that the excitement had been unnecessarily raised by those who had introduced and supported the amendment, and that there was nothing in the report of the Committee on Claims which in any wise called for it. It was on this point alone that Mr. L. said he wished to be heard. Gentlemen have said, "You have, without reason, raised a commotion, which the subject did not call for; you have grown warm, and have insisted that this is a most serious question, but, if it is a serious question on your side, it is no less so on ours." This was what he wished to examine. He held that, while the principle involved in the amendment was a most serious one, indeed to the slave-holding States, it was absolutely nothing to those States where slaves were not to be found; and so certain was he, that it would be so considered, that he would have been willing to submit it to William Wilberforce, or to the Apostle of Abolition, Caleb Lowndes himself. Gentlemen from the Northern States might, with some reason, have had their feelings of humanity roused, had it been proposed either to increase the number of persons in slavery, or in any manner to aggravate the hardships of their condition. So far as this, he fully entered into their feelings, he agreed, and he felt with them. But what is the case here? A man has had his slave injured, while taken by force to labor in the public service. The facts are settled, and the amount of damages ascertained. The only question is, shall we pay the demand? Now, sir, asked Mr. L. how are the feelings of humanity involved in such a question? Will the miseries of slavery be any lighter if we do not pay it, than if we do? Will the number of persons in slavery be increased by our paying, or diminished by our refusing? What good feeling will be gratified by our refusal? None that I can conceive of. Sir, is this a fair view of the case, or is it not? Be the prejudices of gentlemen ever so inveterate, even prejudice itself cannot be injured, by doing an act of manifest justice. And gentlemen must pardon me for saying, because I state what is the fact, that I have not heard so much as the shadow of a reason for refusing the payment.

Setting aside the argument drawn from approximating the condition of a slave to that of a minor or an apprentice, which I have fully answered, and which, if allowed, would only prove that the master of the apprentice was entitled to remuneration, not the master of the slave was entitled to none—setting this aside, the argument may be considered as comprised in the speeches of the two gentlemen from New York, the one a member of the Committee of Claims [Mr. CLARK,] the other, who followed him, on the other side of the House [Mr. STORRS.] The one tells us that slaves are property, but that they are something more—they are moral beings; that they increase the representation of the whites; that they may legally be called on to form part of the military force, and defend their country, and, therefore, ought not to be paid for. The other gentleman takes directly the opposite ground, but comes to the same conclusion: he says that they are property, in the broadest sense of the word, but that no one has a right to take them for the public use, and that, therefore, when they are so taken, they ought not to be paid for. Now both these gentlemen cannot be right. It will be no difficult matter to show that both are wrong. The difference between them is this: the one draws his false conclusion from incorrect facts; the other more inexcusably, from a correct statement.

That slaves, because they are moral beings, are liable to be called on to do military service, will now for the first time, and I trust for the last, be heard within these walls. Gentlemen who use it do not, cannot perceive its consequences, or they would not on any occasion, employ it; and if warmth of feeling has been excited, and warmth of language used to express it, we need look no farther for complete justification, that a doctrine that asserts the right of Congress to put arms in the hands of our slaves, to deprive us of their use, is little in importance compared with this dreadful doctrine, unsupported as it is by any law, any principle, or any constitutional provision; and I allude to it, not because I think it needs refutation, but because it accounts for, and completely justifies, any warmth which on our side may have been elicited. The conclusion, that, because they are moral beings, they are not property, or property of a kind that ought not to be paid for, has been justly exposed by the gentleman from Virginia, opposite to me, with his usual felicity of expression and strength of argument, to be, in fact, saying that they are not property, because they possess that quality, which alone makes them such—because they are human beings.

But what shall we say to the reasoning of the other honorable gentleman from the same State? The master, he says, has the most unqualified property in the service of his slave; no power can legally deprive him of it; and, therefore, when it is taken for public use, it ought not to be paid for. This is certainly a most impotent conclusion, to which the high reasoning powers of the gentleman would never have brought him, if he had not been led astray by the great interest he takes for the Southern planters, for which we can never be too grateful. He fears, that, if we pass this bill, military officers may be encouraged, by the passport of indemnity which it offers, to fill their ranks with our slaves; that we, ourselves, if I understood him, might trust too much to that force, and become indifferent to its employment, if we were insured against loss. The Gentleman need not fear. Our slaves have never been employed as soldiers—never have been impressed as such—our foes are to be repelled non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis. To defend our country is too honourable an employment to be trusted to, or divided with slaves. We claim that function for ourselves. The same gentleman asks, shall an officer of the United States, because he has epaulettes on his shoulders and a sword by his side, be permitted to take the slave from his master, and shall we indemnify him for the illegal act? Sir, this is not a bill of indemnification, and the act, though an invasion of private property, is one of those cases in which such invasion is allowed by the Constitution, under the obligation of giving compensation—which obligation it is the intent of the amendment to fulfil. It is not an illegal act, done with a good intent, against the consequences of which Congress have generally thought it right to indemnify their officers; but is in case of property taken for their use, applied to their use, and lost in their service, by their act. It was not because the officer had epaulettes on his shoulders that he took this property, but because he had a head thereon that had formed the unbending resolution to use all the means in his power to defend his country; because he had a heart in his bosom that could feel and provide for the wounded soldier, whom this negro, and the cart which he drove, were employed to convey from the field where their blood was shed for their country.

This is the case which my amendment was intended to provide for; one that could excite with propriety, no warmth, and could hurt no prejudice; but it had been encountered with arguments that were indeed dangerous, and could not fail to produce the greatest excitement. Seeing, therefore, a disposition to protract the debate, and delay, by the discussion of this item in the claim, the larger amount to which it was acknowledged the petitioner was entitled, he thought he would be serving his interest in withdrawing the amendment, with the intent of renewing it when the cooler reflections of members should shew the justice of this claim, or of others depending on the same principle. In doing this, [said Mr. L.] I yield to the request of friends, for whose opinions I have the highest respect; but I yield nothing to the dangerous doctrines to which I have alluded, and which, I trust, a consideration of their consequences, and their injustice, will induce those who now support them to abandon.

Mr. GURLEY expressed his regret that his colleague had withdrawn the amendment. It was now too late to prevent excitement; and, as he apprehended that a majority of the House was prepared to pass the amendment, and as other cases resting on the same principle would, in all probability, arise, he felt himself bound by duty, and he did it with reluctance, to renew the motion for amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that he rose with the intention of making another motion. As (said he) the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has done us the favor to take away this bone of contention—for it is but a bone—from the House, I trust we shall have no more trouble from that quarter. But I feel myself called upon to state, with regard to the gentleman from N. York, [Mr. BURNES] who has spoken to day, but whom I do not now see in his place, and whom I sincerely thank for his remarks, that it was not the amount in dispute, but the principle involved, which brought about that contest with the British Government, which ended in our Independence. For that gentleman I have every kindly feeling. I knew him (and this puts me in mind of a disagreeable subject—and that is, how old I am) when he was hardly more than an infant: but if that gentleman had been as long or even half as long as I have been, a member of this House, he would have seen the necessity of acting on the old maxim "principiis obsta, venienti occurrere morbo."

I remember the first time this question was stirred. I was in the lobby, and was an attentive auditor—it was under the first Congress—and my venerable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MACON] would support me in the recollection—he was a member of that Congress—no—he was not at that time—for North Carolina herself was not then a member of the Union—it was in the first Congress—and I believe I remember almost every time it has been brought forward since—for this has not been attempted once—or twice—but a thousand times—not by storm—but by sap. Sir, we ought to remember the sentiment—non vi, sed sæpe cadendo, and not permit it ever to pass, no matter in how demure and apparently trivial an aspect it may be presented.

I do not intend to abuse the indulgence so kindly accorded to me by the Committee, both now and on a former occasion—but I must remind the gentleman, (Mr. BURNES) that, when, in the words of Hotspur—or rather of his uncle Worcester—"this heat was struck up"—some gentlemen were doing here—what has been tried elsewhere—to establish the principle that there is a law of God, which supersedes the laws of the functionaries of the land—that the legality or illegality of a measure is to be judged not by our social compact, but by some other code—of which there are as many different interpretations as there are sects. With a view to allay the excitement which has been produced, I now move to lay the amendment on the table.

The Chairman having reminded Mr. R. that no such motion could be received in Committee of the Whole, Mr. R. then moved that the Committee now rise. Understanding, however, that Mr. GURLEY, of Louisiana, wished now to address the Committee, he withdrew the motion; when

Mr. GURLEY rose, and said, that he regretted exceedingly that his colleague should have been induced to have withdrawn his amendment. It was now too late to prevent the excitement that he appeared to deprecate. That he believed the amendment was in accordance with the opinions of a majority of the committee; and as other cases rested on the same principle, would in all probability arise; and as it proposed merely an act of strict justice to the petitioner, he felt bound by a sense of duty (although he did it under existing circumstances with reluctance) to renew the motion that had just been withdrawn. In doing this, he could assure the House and his honorable colleague, [Mr. LIVINGSTON] that the excitement, if, indeed, any existed, should no longer continue by his agency.

Sir, said Mr. G., I wish at the outset to make an explicit declaration of my opinions on this subject; and I do so that my sentiments may not hereafter be doubted or called into question here or elsewhere. My constituents and myself are holders of slaves, and we have been accustomed to consider their property, and belonging to us by a title as perfect and absolute as the soil they cultivate. Any question, therefore, involving even a doubt upon this subject, and much more when that doubt is found in the report of a standing committee of this House, can never fail to produce a deep and intense interest. But the report in this case goes further; it expressly denies the master the right of property in his slave. If this proposition be established by the adoption of the report, you take from us one-half of all we possess. If this novel and monstrous doctrine, boldly asserted here for the first time, be true, then, said Mr. G., the South have labored under a strange and fatal delusion from the foundation of the Government to the present time; and the framers of the Constitution themselves, instead of meriting their reputation for wisdom and sagacity, would have left behind them only a monument of their stupidity and total unfitness for the stations they occupied. Does any one believe that this confederacy would ever have been formed without securing this great and important interest in common with other rights equally interesting to the United States? No one will hazard the assertion: it would contradict the letter and spirit of the Constitution, which subjects them to the taxing power of the Government; which power has been claimed and exercised by the Congress of the United States, and cheerfully submitted to by the citizens of the South. I mention these facts for the purpose of shewing that the principles for which we contend, are those of the Constitution, and have been recognized as such since its formation, both by the Government and the People of the United States.

Sir, I freely admit that slavery, in the abstract, is an evil, but one which I contend is not in our power to avert, and with which the General Government has no right to interfere. As to the right of property, therefore, of the master in his slave, it is neither more nor less than that which he has in his horse, in his ox, in his cart, in his barn, and the grain which is in it. He has the same unlimited control over the one that he has over the other, subject, in all cases, to the municipal regulations of the place in which he lives.

Gentlemen say, he cannot kill his slave as he can his ox. This depends entirely upon the laws of the State in which he lives, and in no case can be urged against his right of property. Property is the creature of the law, and is controlled and regulated by it. You may kill your ox, for the law allows it; but even in regard to domestic animals, there are laws in many of the States which limit the right of the proprietor without affecting his right of property. Gentlemen should not forget that the civil law, somewhat modified by statute, is the common law of Louisiana; and that by the law of Rome, the master had absolute dominion of life and death over his slave, as he had also over his child.

If, by the progress of christianity, or the prevalence of more humane feelings, the condition of slaves in Louisiana has been bettered, are we to be told that this has deprived us of our right of property in them?—a right, perfect, absolute, and unlimited.

Sir, I have said that slavery is an evil—I repeat it: but gentlemen, indulging their feelings and prejudices, are deceived both in relation to the circumstances of their original importation into this country and their condition in it. These persons were slaves in their own country. They were not illegally brought here; for it was expressly allowed by law and the Constitution. Many of them were liable to death for crimes committed in Africa, which punishment was commuted to slavery; and we have heard much about the humanity of such a change. When made captives in war, or condemned for offences, they were no longer burnt and massacred as they once were; but, in lieu of this, were sent from their native wilds to this fertile and happy country; and, although it is true that they do not here enjoy the rights of freemen, their condition has been greatly bettered by the change—and I take this occasion, once for all, to avow it as my fixed opinion, that this Government has as much right to take from me my horse, or any other property I possess, as to take away my slave; and that the obligation is as perfect to pay for the one as the other, when destroyed or injured in the public service.

I will now proceed to shew, said Mr. G., that the amendment I offered ought to be adopted. It appears from the testimony, that during the invasion of Louisiana in 1814, a cart, horse, and slave, the property of the petitioner, were impressed into the public service by order of the commanding general. The Committee of Claims, in the bill under consideration, propose to pay for the cart and horse. The amendment proposes to pay for the injury sustained by the slave from wounds received while in service, and upon medical attendance consequent for those wounds.

Let us examine for a moment the question upon the grounds advanced by those opposed to the amendment, and I think it must appear evident, that, according to the gentleman's own arguments, the bill and the amendment must stand or fall together; that they cannot refuse payment for the slave, if they consent to pay for the other property taken the same time under precisely the same circumstances.

The chief reason, said Mr. G., why this subject has assumed an aspect of so much interest, is to be found in the language of the report of the Committee of Claims. If that report had not unequivocally denied that slaves are property, I should not have offered the amendment that I have had the honor to submit: the sum is small in amount, and in that point of view unimportant. But the principle involved in this question is of deep and vital interest to the peace and safety of a large portion of this Union, if not to the existence of the Union itself.

It is this principle that I feel bound now and at all times, here and elsewhere, to resist and oppose to the utmost of my ability. It is true that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLER] who I believe is the author of the report, does not consider its terms as warranting the inference I have drawn from it; but I appeal to every candid and intelligent man who has read it, if such is not the fair interpretation of its meaning. What is the reason assigned by the committee for rejecting this item of the claim? Because, they say, the Government never considered slaves as property. Can language be more explicit? And am I to be told that the purport I have given to it, is not the only true legitimate one of which it is susceptible?

This report has gone before the people; it is so understood by them, and has been made the subject of executive communication to State Legislatures, protesting against the principle that I have ascribed to it.

The arguments urged by gentlemen against the amendment, do not sustain, I admit, the report of the committee. The ground on which the report is based, appears to have been abandoned even by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLER.] We are now told that slaves are property in one sense, and not in another; that they confer political power in the quality of persons, and, therefore, cannot be considered absolutely as property. The fallacy of this reasoning consists in supposing that persons cannot be property. If they were not persons, they could not be slaves; and it is only upon the ground of slavery that we claim them as property.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. STORGE] expressly admits that the master has an uncontrollable right to the service of his slave, under all circumstances, and the absolute custody of his person. What other power can we possess over any property? The gentleman's definition is correct, and places the slave on a footing with any other property, subject to barter, sale, and the will of the proprietor. We contend for nothing else.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLER] discovering that his report could not be defended, has changed his ground of hostility to the amendment, and now informs us that there are precedents adverse to this claim, and has referred the committee to several decisions of this House on former occasions. Although I am not a believer in the binding effect of legislative precedents, yet the committee will at once perceive, by a reference to the cases cited, that they all materially differ from the present, inasmuch as they are cases where the property was in the service of the United States by contract of hire, or where the slaves were voluntarily carried as servants by their masters. In these cases the proprietor is the insurer. He charges in proportion to the risk, and the premium is included in the wages. But this is not the case, where the property is taken without the consent of the owner. In that case the obligation on the part of the taker is to save the owner harmless; to restore the property in as good state and condition as when it was received; if lost, injured, or destroyed, to pay its value; and in all cases to make just compensation for its use.

It has been contended by some gentlemen, who have taken part in this debate, that a distinction exists as to the kind of property; and, while they admit the general principle of liability on the part of the United States, would exclude slaves from its operation. Sir, the Constitution recognizes no such distinction. It says that private property shall not be taken without just compensation.

We have also been told that every taking without the consent of the owner, is not only a trespass, but that impressment is never rendered so far justifiable by circumstances of necessity, as to create any obligation on the part of the Government to make indemnification for losses occasioned thereby. To this doctrine I cannot subscribe; and, if the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. SPOONER] intended to be understood, that no public exigency whatever was sufficient to justify the impressment of slaves, I cannot agree with him. I hold that it is justifiable whenever the public safety requires it; whenever the property seized, and the use to which it is put, are adapted to that purpose which the danger of the country calls for; then an officer is not only excusable, but is praiseworthy, if he takes it for the public use. We cannot foresee what emergencies may happen: let me put a case. Suppose that on the 23d of December, 1814, it had been necessary for the defence of the city of New Orleans, to throw up a breastwork within a given time; that this necessity was so obvious that nobody pretended to deny it: suppose, also, that there were at the camp no force sufficient to effect it, but that there were in the neighborhood one thousand slaves, whose masters refused to allow them to be employed in this necessary work, would not General Jackson have been justifiable in compelling the services of these slaves; and should we not have been bound in justice to pay their owners for their labor and time? Most undoubtedly. And General Jackson would have deserved a severe rebuke had he abstained from impressing them. He would certainly have had as much right to take the slaves as to take the carts and horses requisite to the operation. True, there was no written law to justify it; but it would have been justified by that great first principle of society, which requires a surrender of a part to preserve the whole.

Permit me, for a single moment, to advert to some of the circumstances under which this great power of impressment was exercised in the present case.

I know, Mr. Chairman, with what honest jealousy the American people view the exercise of doubtful powers, or even those expressly delegated, when exerted beyond the absolute necessity of the case. I rejoice that it is so. The true theory of free Government requires that the people should never delegate powers which they can efficiently exercise themselves; nor tolerate its exercise in others, except so far as necessary for the public interest.

Vieking, therefore, my assent to this wholesome and republican principle in its broadest latitude, I do not hesitate to say that there are situations in which an individual may be placed, in which it would be treason to his country to withhold the application of any power he might possess, necessary to command the means within his reach, either to avert great national calamities, or secure to his country important national blessings. Sir, the exercise of this power in the present instance, was under circumstances of no ordinary occurrence. The unexpected advance of the enemy upon Louisiana in 1814, found that important section of the Union wholly unprotected.

On the 23d of December, when the enemy appeared on the banks of the Mississippi, within six miles of New Orleans, to the number of three thousand men, the flower of the British army, and the boasted invincibles of Lord Wellington, you had not a breastwork, nor a fortification of any description—not a solitary cannon planted to sound an alarm, or check their progress to that great and all-important emporium of the West. The whole of the disposable force of General Jackson, at this time, did not exceed fifteen hundred men, and more than half of that number were militiamen who had never seen a field of battle. What was to be done? Delay was ruin, and an attack almost certain defeat. Under these trying circumstances the commanding general did not hesitate. He instantly resolved to meet the enemy; and this small, but gallant band, collected at the beat of the drum, were led by him to the field of battle. The contest was long and bloody. The combatants were at last separated by the darkness of the night; and the remnant of this little corps were planted on that memorable line which was destined to be illumined by the glory of the 8th of January. This sudden and desperate attack spread consternation and alarm into the ranks of the enemy. He resolved to wait for reinforcements from his fleet. General Jackson knew well the importance of this delay, and he lost no time in strengthening his position, and fortifying himself in the best manner time and circumstances would permit. Breastworks were to be thrown up, fortifications erected, and the whole means of the country were requisite for these operations, on which depended the salvation of the city. It was under these circumstances of high and pressing necessity the property in this case was taken. I now submit the question to the committee, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the impressment was not justifiable. If there be one individual in the nation who doubts it, I envy him not his candor or patriotism.

An attempt has been made to liken the case of slaves to that of apprentices and minors; but there is no analogy whatever between them. The military power of this nation is confided by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States. They have the authority to enlist, to arm, and to organize the militia. Apprentices and minors are citizens; they form a part of society, and are enlisted by the delegated authority of the whole. They, like others, must consent to part with a portion of their natural rights; and, like other freemen, are bound to protect themselves and their country; but this is not the case with slaves. Slaves are no part of the militia; and if the Government have the power alleged, one thing is certain, they have never yet exerted it. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK] will shew me an act of Congress for the enlistment of slaves, I will shew him an act which he will admit to be a dissolution of this Union. But there is no such act. Apprentices are taken according to law; slaves are not, and cannot be.

Gentlemen deceive themselves, therefore, in supposing that this slave was taken as a part of the military force of the country. He was no more taken as such than was the other property; and there is no power in this Government that could authorize the employment of slaves as soldiers.

Mr. Chairman, I have stated briefly my views on this subject, and the motives that induced me to offer the amendment; and it is, in my opinion, due as an act of justice to the claimant—it is due to the character of the Government—to the transactions with which it is connected—and more especially it is due to the reputation of that gallant and distinguished individual, who, in the most gloomy period of the war, and under the most pressing and desponding circumstances, had the moral courage in defence of his country, to exercise the power which produced the individual injury proposed to be compensated by the amendment. By rejecting the amendment we virtually declare this meritorious act a wanton exercise of usurped authority.

Case of Marigny D'Aulricre.

[JAN. 11, 1838.]

Sir, it was not so. It was called for at the time by the supreme law of necessity, and was used in defence of the country, and in advancing its honor and glory.

I am aware that subjects of this character are calculated to produce excitement in this House—at least, I have found by sad experience that they do so.

No one can regret this state of things more than myself; but I implore gentlemen to recollect that we are forced into this discussion, in defence of our property and rights; neither of which we can surrender without a shameful dereliction of duty and a cowardly abandonment of the prerogatives of freemen. All that we ask, is, that the rights and obligations of this people, both in relation to themselves and the Government, may be left where the compact of confederation has placed them, and that no invidious distinctions may be made in regard to either.

When we are admonished by gentlemen from certain sections of the country, to discuss these subjects without feeling, may we not ask, in turn, that they may decide them without prejudice?

I cheerfully admit that their prejudices are honest, and that those who entertain them will, at all times, and under all circumstances, endeavor to remain faithful to the Constitution, which is the common property and the common safeguard of the whole American People. But, sir, if there is any portion of this country more ardent than another, in their devotion to the principles of our institutions, and in their attachment to them, it is the Southern. They furnished evidence of both in the last war, and received a rich reward in the glory that attended the success of their arms, and the approbation of their fellow-citizens. The spirit that animated them will be inherited by their descendants; and in all time to come, they will be found ready in peace to sustain the Union against domestic faction and civil discord, to secure a faithful administration of the Government, according to the theory of the Constitution—and in war to offer their treasure and their blood upon the altar of their country, and in defence of its honor. I ask pardon of the committee for this seeming digression, and trust that the amendment will be received, and that thereby we may preserve our consistency and do full justice to the claimant.

Mr. INGHAM said, that he regretted the motion should have been renewed, but as it had been, he hoped it would be discussed with calmness; and that, if the House could discover the principle which ought to bind them, they would be willing to do whatever justice might require. My object, said Mr. I., in rising at this time, has been, if possible, to narrow the ground of discussion. For I apprehend, with all submission, that the true point in this case has not yet been touched at all. If I understand the claim intended to be provided for by this amendment, it is for the loss of time and expense of medical attendance of a slave, who was impressed shortly before the battle of New Orleans. The demand was opposed by the Committee of Claims, on the ground that slaves do not constitute a species of property, which is to be paid for at the public expense, when pressed into the service of the United States; and farther, that slaves are not liable to impressment, and, therefore, ought not to be paid for when impressed. The fallacy of the argument embodied in the report has led to all the embarrassment, as well as to all the excitement, which has taken place on this occasion. I think it has been shown that the war-making power is an attribute of sovereignty, (if there be any sovereignty in Government at all,) in order that all may be preserved for whose sake the Government was instituted. And if this attribute of sovereignty is in the Government, shall a city, threatened with capture, pillage, conflagration, and the violation of women, not be defended till those charged with the defence come down and chaffer with perhaps a disaffected partisan, whether his cart, and horses, and slave, may not be used in the construction of a breastwork for the defence of that city? Yes, Sir. Whether the public demand affects his cart, or his horses, or his slave, or his son, or his brother, or himself, all must be surrendered, and the country must be defended. But we are told that, though his horse and his cart may be impressed, and if injured, must be paid for, that slaves are not that species of property for which compensation is ever to be made. But, Sir, do we read any thing about species in that article of the Constitution which declares that private property shall not be taken for the public use, without just compensation? If I understand the word property, it is a generic term. The Constitution does not say that a certain species of private property shall be paid for, if taken, but it says, "that private property must be paid for, if taken for the public use." It was also said, that apprentices, minors, and persons held to service, constitute a kind of property, that ought to be paid for. Now, my principal object is to satisfy this Committee, that these two descriptions of property may be brought under the same rule, and justice done without any difficulty.

The right of property to a slave and to an apprentice, if not identically the same, are as nearly alike, as two things can possibly be, and they should be paid for under the same circumstances, and in the same way. There is no incongruity whatever between them. I maintain, that the right of impressment is a perfect, and not a qualified right; that it is a necessary attribute of sovereignty, and applies equally to a slave, an apprentice, a brother, or a son. But when this right is exerted, what is to be the rule of compensation? This is the gist of the question. The Constitution says, that when private property is taken for the public use, just compensation shall be made. Now, what is just compensation? It is a payment for the services of the person, or for the use of the things impressed. If a horse is taken, you must pay for the use of the horse; if a slave is taken you must pay for the services of the slave; there is no distinction in principle. All property, pressed into the public service, is, in this respect, of one and the same character; and distinctions between different species of property, tend only to entangle the question.

The friends of the amendment are contending for a principle—a principle which deeply concerns them, and hence the excitement which has been produced. To test that principle, let me put a case. An officer is charged with the defence of a city threatened by the enemy. To effect that object, he is bound to exert all the powers of the Government, so far as they are entrusted to his hands. In the neighborhood of that city, there are two different persons, both owning slaves: he applies to both for the use of their slaves, to be employed in the public defence. One of these slaveholders willingly consents: he says to the officer, take my People in welcome; it is true, I expect hereafter to be compensated, but I will not chaffer now. They are wanted, and let them go. The other slave-holder, traitorous in heart, or having, perhaps, a mistaken notion of his rights, refuses his slaves, and they are taken by force. What is to be the rule of your compensation to these two persons? The rights of the General extended alike over both. Will you adopt a different rule of compensation in one case, from what you adopt in another? Is not one entitled to the same rate of pay with the other? Will you acknowledge that you were, in the one case, a trespasser, and will you therefore pay the last slave-holder, and not the first? Surely not. The rule of compensation must be the same in both cases: for the Constitution requires, in both, that you make just compensation? And what is just compensation? Need I discuss it farther? Whether the General contracts for the slaves, or takes them with the consent of the owner, without special contract, the rule of compensation must evidently be to pay the same price as would be paid for the same services in a transaction between man and man. Can there be any other rule? In private contracts, the employer is bound to compensate according to the kind of service performed, and the length of time during which he employs it. It is precisely so with impressment. The Government impressing is bound to compensate the owner for all descriptions of property whatsoever, and according to the time during which it was employed in the public service. This, I think, is too clear to be disputed.

But there is another point in this case. When the Government presses persons into its service, or living animals, of any kind, does it thereby ensure the life, or the health of such person, or animal against all risks? Is this common between man and man? Certainly not. When private parties hire persons into their service, they neither ensure their life, nor health, nor the payment of their Doctor's bill; and the same rule must apply to persons impressed by Government. You are to pay for the use of the thing, or person pressed, but that is all; and if the Committee of Claims had allowed pay for the time of this slave, they would have allowed all they were bound to allow. In private life, if a hiring employed by you, falls accidentally from his cart, and is disabled, are you to pay for the injury he sustains by that fall? If you hire a horse, feed and use him properly, and, while in your service, he is taken sick, or dies, must you pay for him? Surely not. You are not bound to ensure either his life or health. If, indeed, he perishes from your mal-treatment, from a want of provisions, or from any criminal neglect of yours, the case is different. But, if he dies by casualty, or disease, the loss must be sustained by his owner. Now, there is no difference, as to the principle between death by a fall, and death by a bullet from the enemy. You must pay for his service during the time he was employed, and you must pay for no more. The doctrines from the report of the Committee—I repeat it—are fallacious, as might be shewn from the decision of former claims by that Committee. When claims were advanced, for horses lost in Kentucky, during the last war, compensation was resisted on the ground, that the risk of the horse's life did not enter into the contract, nor form any part of the consideration for which the price was paid: but this practice was afterwards broken down, not because the principle was doubted, but because it was proved that, in some cases the horses died from the neglect of Government to provide them with suitable food. These cases formed an exception to the general rule, and thereby confirmed, instead of interfering with it.

Mr. J. concluded his argument by declaring, that, if in this case, the Government have taken the property of a private individual they are bound to give him compensation, and to measure this compensation, by the time that property was employed, and the rate at which it could have been obtained by private contract. He regretted that this discussion should have excited any thing like irritated feelings. He repeated his conviction, that whatever of such feelings had been produced, was to be attributed wholly to the fallacious doctrines advanced by the Committee of Claims. The Committee had looked at precedents, but not at the reasons on which they were founded. The Government of our country was a fabric of justice, and he was persuaded that deliberate and calm investigation, must ever discover, to those entrusted with it, the principles which ought to guide them. He trusted the discussion, on this occasion, would be conducted with calmness, and not with the spirit of an incendiary, who would throw a fire-brand into this House, to alarm a large and important portion of this country. He trusted that this was not the disposition of any gentleman on this floor, but such, he was sorry to say, had been the conduct too much pursued.

On motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, the Committee of the Whole then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1828.

CASE OF THE CAPTURED AFRICANS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, "to authorize the cancelling a bond therein mentioned," with instructions to report the facts upon which the bill was reported, made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SLOANE, from the Committee on Elections, to which was referred the memorial of sundry citizens of the Second Congressional district of Pennsylvania, contesting the right of John Sergeant, the sitting member from that District, to a seat in this House, submitted the following report:

"This case presents the following state of facts, viz: That an election was held in said District, on the tenth day of October, 1826, for a member to represent it in the 20th Congress. After a canvass of the votes given, it appeared that John Sergeant and Henry Horn had the highest, and an equal number of votes. This fact was officially reported to the proper officer of the State, by the returning officers of the election. It appearing by this report, that the People had failed to make a choice, the Executive of Pennsylvania seems to have considered the case as a vacancy, but not to the extent sufficient to warrant him in directing another election, until both Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Horn informed him, in writing, that they relinquished all claims to the seat in virtue of the election of 1826. In consequence of the receipt of these letters, the Governor of Pennsylvania did, on the 5th day of September, 1827, issue his Proclamation, particularly referring to the circumstances of the case, and directing an election to be held, to supply the said vacancy, on the 9th day of October, 1827: at which election it appears that John Sergeant was duly elected. Official copies of these letters, and of the Governor's Proclamation, are herewith reported. The memorialists, who contest Mr. Sergeant's right to a seat, allege, that, at the election in 1826, "on counting the votes contained in the Coroner's, and other boxes, there was found a number of votes in favor of Henry Horn, over and above those given for John Sergeant. Clearly" (as they say) "indicating the intention of a plurality of the electors, to choose Henry Horn." This memorial was unaccompanied with any testimony, whatever. The committee, at their first meeting, directed their Chairman to notify the memorialists, that, on a certain day named, they would take up the subject for consideration, and that any testimony they might wish to present, would be duly considered. Several letters have passed between the Chairman of the committee, and one of the memorialists; and sundry depositions have been forwarded, all of which are ex parte, having been taken, for aught that appears, without any notice to the sitting member. These depositions the committee consider entirely insufficient to invalidate the rights of the sitting member. But they think it quite unnecessary to go into an investigation of the rights of the parties, under the first election; because, whatever those rights were, they have been voluntarily relinquished. They, therefore, beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Sergeant is entitled to a seat in this House."

The report, and the two letters to which it refers, of Messrs. Sergeant and Horn, being read—the question was put to agree to the report; and passed in the affirmative, unanimously.

MOBILE COURT MARTIAL.

The resolution submitted by Mr. SLOANE, on the 11th instant, "directing the Secretary of War to furnish the House with a copy of the proceedings of the Mobile Court Martial, for the trial of certain Tennessee militiamen, &c." was taken up and read, and, being under consideration—

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Ky., said, that the subject referred to in the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SLOANE] had given rise to much acrimonious discussion in the newspapers of the day, and about which much misrepresentation had been employed. When the resolution was first read, it had arrested his attention; he had since examined it, in order to ascertain, if practicable, the national object, legitimate national object, to be attained by an answer from the Department of War, to the gentleman's resolution. He had in vain sought for that object, by an examination of the resolution itself. The gentleman from Ohio had not informed the House for what purpose he had made the call, and he [Mr. WICKLIFFE] had risen, not to oppose the adoption of the resolution, but to express his desire that the gentleman would be good enough to state what object, Legislative or otherwise, he proposed to accomplish, by the adoption of the resolution. Mr. W. said, he was ready, on all occasions, to yield his assent to a call upon any of the Departments, for matters of fact, or copies of documents, which might be necessary to enable this House to do the Legislative business of the Nation, and thereby promote the public interest—farther than that, he was not disposed to go.

Mr. SLOANE observed that the gentleman from Kentucky had very truly remarked, that the subject of this resolution was one that had greatly attracted public attention. It was a subject in relation to which the public of all parties felt a very great solicitude. And it was with a full knowledge of that fact that he had submitted the resolution. The subject is an important one, and the facts necessary to a full understanding of it are said to be in the War Department. On the one hand, it is averred that these facts are of a particular, and on the other hand, that they are of a very different character. He wished, for himself, to know exactly what they are. He would make no assertion—he would not even allow himself to conjecture. He considered them important for public information, and therefore wished to see them. Whether any legislative measure will necessarily grow out of their being communicated, must depend upon what they are. The personage most intimately connected with the transaction has informed the public that all the facts are in the War Department. To that Department let us apply. Let us see on which side of the question truth is to be found.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, in reply, that the object of making the call had now been distinctly avowed by the mover. That object, if I understand the gentleman, is this: that it was an important subject—one about which there had been a great difference of opinion, and he wished to get at the truth, and inform the public correctly. The gentleman farther remarked, that he did not know but possibly some legislation might be necessary upon the subject. To settle controverted facts, (which have been placed in bold relief before the public by one of the great political parties in this Union, with a view to tarnish the fame of a distinguished benefactor of his country,) seems to be the main object avowed by the gentleman. Is this an object worthy the grave consideration of this House? Has it come to this, that the House of Representatives is to be the vehicle through which the facts connected with this subject, for purposes purely political, shall be conveyed to the public? I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. W.) that no subject would have been introduced into this House, by either party, at the present Session, calculated to exasperate and embitter party spirit, and excite the public feeling, beyond its present irritable condition. I had indulged the hope that the Members of Congress would have been permitted to legislate on the legitimate business of their constituents without having in view the advancement of their favorite candidate for the high office of President, or the destruction of the moral or political standing of their opponents.

I make these general remarks, Mr. Speaker, not with a view to defeat the call for all the documents and papers touching the subject, which may be on file in the Department of War. No, sir, the distinguished individual whose reputation is assailed, upon this and other subjects, will not shrink from investigation. His friends will not do it for him. And, however unpleasant to them, or unprofitable to those who force it upon us, we will meet the attack now—we will meet it here or elsewhere. Therefore, with a desire that the House, (I ought to say the public; for it is for them they are sought) shall have the documents, the whole documents, and nothing but the documents—no speech—I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "divisions," and inserting the following:

"And also to furnish copies of all papers, letters, and documents, relating to said Court Martial; copies of all orders, general or special, made or issued by the President of the United States, or by the Secretary of War, concerning or relating to the length of service of the detachment of the Tennessee militia, detailed under the order of the Governor of said State, issued on the 20th day of May, 1814, and afterwards placed under the immediate command of Lieutenant Colonel Philip Pipkin; also, copies of the muster and pay rolls of said militiamen, which may be on file in the Department of War."

Mr. SLOANE said, that he should have been very happy if the gentleman's amendment had been such an one as he could have accepted, and made part of his resolution, but this he could not do, inasmuch as it cut off an important part of his resolution. The latter clause of his resolution called for all the correspondence.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, that, if the gentleman would examine his own resolution, and compare it with the amendment proposed, I am sure (said Mr. W.) he will admit that all the documents connected with the subject on file in the Department of War, are, and will be embraced by the resolution, if amended as proposed by me. The amendment, sir, extends the call—it goes farther than the original resolution. It embraces the muster and pay rolls of the detachment of Tennessee militia, to which these six militia men belonged. The resolution and the amendment both refer to a particular detachment of Tennessee militia, which entered the service on the 20th of June, 1814, under the immediate command of Lieutenant Colonel Pipkin. One object is to ascertain the length of time they were bound to serve in the army of the United States. To ascertain this, copies of all the orders, general or special, made by the President, or issued by the Secretary of War, in reference to this detachment; copies of the muster rolls and pay rolls are called for; if furnished, they will enable us to fix the time their service commenced and terminated; and a reference to the acts of Congress, regulating the militia, from 1795, to 1814, inclusive, which are accessible to the members of this House, will enable every one to decide for himself, without the aid of a learned commentary from the War Officer of the Government upon the question.

One other object of the original resolution, which the gentleman from Ohio thinks is not embraced by the amendment proposed, is, he wishes the Secretary of War to tell us whether the President did make any order or regulation under the discretionary power vested in him by the act of 1814, which authorizes the President to call out the militia of the United States, for a term of service, not exceeding six months in any one year. The amendment certainly embraces this very object. It calls for copies of all orders, general or special. If such orders were made, it is but fair to presume records of them are preserved, and copies of them will enable us to judge of the import of them for ourselves, as well, and perhaps better, than if we had the opinion of the Secretary of War upon the subject.

My objection to that part of the resolution which I propose to expunge, is, that it does not call for copies of papers, and official documents, but it seems to invite the Secretary to furnish us with his opinions, his arguments, and his conclusions. I want the documents, and the nation will make up an opinion for themselves. The gentleman calls upon the Secretary of War to inform this House under what law these men were mustered into the service of the General Government, and what laws were in force. When you get the copies of the muster rolls, which will fix the date of the commencement of the service, (which will turn out to be the 20th June, 1814,) can it be desired by the Congress of the United States, that the Secretary shall tell us what laws were in force on that day? Do we not understand our own laws? Your Statute Book is better evidence of what laws were in force, regulating and governing the militia in the service of the United States, than the written opinion of any Secretary of your Government.

The effect of the resolution, in its original shape, must be to call in the Secretary of War, to settle, as umpire, which of the two Editors in this City was correct in the opinion which each have expressed, upon the law of the case. I prefer that question, if it be important to the happiness and prosperity of this Government, to be decided by the tribunal before whom all the great questions are depending. If general legislation be the object, why confine the inquiry to the Tennessee militia? Why not call for information of the practice of the Government, in reference to the militia of other States, under the law of 1814, and the length of time they were held to serve, and the laws in force under which they served?

Believing, as I do, the object most to be desired is full and complete information upon the subject of the detachments of Tennessee militia, to which the six militiamen belonged, I have confined my amendment exclusively to that subject, and I have endeavored to embrace every thing which belongs to the subject-matter. I repeat, sir, let us have the documents, the whole documents, and nothing but the documents.

Mr. WEEMS called for the reading of the original resolution and the amendment.

They were read accordingly, when the SPEAKER announced that the hour allotted to the consideration of reports and resolutions had expired.

AMENDMENT OF RULES—STENOGRAPHERS.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that, like the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] he came here with the hope that nothing would be introduced to disturb the harmony or interrupt the business of the session. I had come to the understanding with myself (said Mr. R.) that I would introduce no measure which might in any degree retard or impede the execution of that business. But I am constrained, by peculiar circumstances, to throw myself upon the attention of the House on the subject of its Rules and Orders. Without some alteration in them, we shall not get through the session with that convenience and despatch which the public interest requires. We have adopted the Rules and Orders of the preceding Congress—but we have power to alter them. I had intended to call the attention of the House to this subject before the difficulty which arose this morning, and I shall now move a reference of the Rules and Orders of this House to a Select Committee.

[The CHAIR here pronounced such a motion to be out of order at present.]

I rose (said Mr. R.) only to give notice of the motion which I intended to make. We have voluntarily placed ourselves in a situation which enables a few members of the House to forestal any subject, whether they are for or against it.

[The SPEAKER here said that Mr. R. might get at the object he desired by moving to postpone the Orders of the Day, &c. with a view to take up this subject.]

Well, sir, said Mr. R., then I make you that motion.

The orders of the day and business on the Speaker's table were then postponed, upon Mr. R.'s motion.

When first I was acquainted with this Assembly, said Mr. RANDOLPH, the Rules and Orders hung up, in fair, large round text, on a single placard; but now they are grown to a volume. I was at that time acquainted as perfectly with the Rules and Orders as with the alphabet, and I should as soon have made a mistake in the one as in the other. But I have grown grey in the business of this House; I have been a member of this House until I have grown out of all knowledge of the rules of our proceedings; and why? Because they are complicated in the extreme, and highly unparliamentary. Now, sir, as on taking that chair you have restored one good old rule, the practice of which prevailed under the administration of the Muhlenbergs, the Trumbulls, the Daytones, the Sedgwickes, the Macons, and the Varnums—under every Speaker, I believe, but one—that of calling us over by our Christian names, as well as our surnames, which enables us all to know each other, so I hope to see restored some other good old rules. I shall at present confine myself to two items in the account. The first is, the practice which has just occurred—it is unheard of—that a motion shall be snipped off in this way; and it never was practised until the change in the rules. The other rule to which I will call the attention of the House, is one on the consideration of which the character and dignity of the Congress of the United States, at home, as well as abroad, materially depend. I will read the rule as it now stands. Mr. R. then read the following rule:

“Stenographers, wishing to take down the debates, may be admitted by the Speaker, who shall assign such places to them, on the floor or elsewhere, to effect their object, as shall not interfere with the convenience of the House.”

This may be a presumption so strong as to the will of the House, that no Speaker of this body, having a due reverence for public opinion, will refuse an application made under it for admission—I might say, can refuse. But then, by adopting this Rule, we make whatever these Stenographers may choose to publish, our own: we stamp it with at least a semi-official authority. I happen to know—I was informed of it but yesterday—I was informed of it by a distinguished foreigner, attending the debates of this House, that the gallery is a better place for hearing than any other part of the House—and that he had retired to it for that purpose. I know that the debates in the House of Commons are taken, and faithfully taken—for though they are compressed, it is a miniature likeness—by persons whose seats are in the gallery.

The public mind, at present—it would be folly, and worse than folly to deny it—is in a state of great excitement. A reaction of public sentiment is fondly predicted in some quarters, and as fondly looked for—a new advent—and this House is made—I do not say by the members of it—that would be disorderly—and more, it would be indecorous—but it is made the theatre of electioneering. And I ask you, sir, what more powerful lever would you demand—what firmer fulcrum would you have for such a purpose, than to give to the People of this country the debates of this House in such a manner as to throw a shade on one side, and, at the same time, to cast a light on the other?

I should not have stirred in this, did I not feel myself personally aggrieved. I have no purpose, whatever, of entering into a contest with the press—I have not lived to my time of life, without knowing how vain a thing that is—and with what fearful odds it is undertaken. I only use my privilege to rescue myself, as far as I can, from misrepresentation—nor is this at all on my own account. I could bear it—as I have bore a thousand misrepresentations from the same quarter: it is only because it injures the cause—the good cause, with which my humble name has been very humbly associated. I say, sir, and I bottom myself on what we have all seen—that it does not comport with the dignity of this House, or the interest of this People, to lend even a semi-official sanction to that which is notoriously false.

For what purpose are stenographers admitted to the places assigned them? It was not surely that we might figure in the newspapers, or rather be disfigured in them, but it was for the information of the sovereignty of this country, the good People, our constituents. Now, when a member feels himself misrepresented, and asks for a correction of the error—after much slow, reluctant, (but not amorous) delay, he is told, that if he will send his representations, they shall be admitted into a certain book, which these persons happen to be publishing. Sir, do we admit stenographers on this floor, that they may first sell us in detail, and then sell us wholesale? Or, do we admit them for the information of the People of the United States? I ask, for which of these two purposes that I have mentioned, are they admitted? Sir, I have seen that book—and I have seen myself caricatured in it. I have seen these prints on the other side of the Atlantic—and have there seen words put into my mouth, which I never could have uttered, unless when I was asleep. I have seen them on the tables of the most respectable club-houses in England—I have seen them at Galignani's in Paris.

In the debate of Friday last, I did say that I would punish with death any man who should violate the law forbidding the introduction of Africans into the State of Virginia. In the report of what I said, as “the learned gentleman from Louisiana,” was transmuted into “my learned friend from Louisiana,”—(there never has been any hostility between us—but there has been no particular friendship—and, as I said in another place, I will not permit friendships to be made for me by any one—I choose to make them myself—I was, and I take pride in saying it, a humble coadjutor with that honorable gentleman—the youngest in the corps—in putting down an administration thirty years ago, and I should be happy to aid in doing the same now—and I should be proud of what I am sure I should receive, his aid and comfort in the process)—so these blackamoors have been whitewashed—and they are all converted into Irishmen! A more mischievous, or a more wicked misrepresentation was never sent abroad than that. We all know there is an immense population of Irish, and descendants of Irish among us—and why do we know it? Sir, we have felt it; they have fought our battles in the field—they have filled the ranks of our army; they have distinguished themselves, in our Revolution, at Brandywine and elsewhere; and these men are to be insulted, and their feelings lacerated, that this House may be made an electioneering theatre, and the cause on one side may be put down, and that on the other side may be propped up.

I regretted to see the proposition introduced by the gentleman from South-Carolina, the other day, against which I was compelled to vote; and I regret now to see a proposition introduced, which must lead to effects, of which I will not now speak. I came here thoroughly convinced, that this was not the hour for reform; that the disease must run its course—and that, on the 4th day of March, 1829, the doctor or the patient must die—the safety of the one implies the dissolution of the other. I feel constrained, however, to endeavor to have the rules and orders altered, in the point I mentioned, and in some others.

I will call the attention of the House to another rule, which I wish to see altered. [Here Mr. R. read the following:]

“The Speaker shall examine and correct the journal before it is read. He shall have a general direction of the Hall. He shall have the right to name any member to perform the duties of the chair, but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.”

The adoption of this rule was contemporaneous with the change in the manner of calling our names.

This is a dispensation which the Muhlenburgs, the Dayton, the Sedgwicks, the Macons, the Varnums, never claimed or enjoyed, nor was it ever enjoyed by Chairmen in Committee of the Whole. I remember that I saw John Cotton Smith sit in the Chair for seventeen or twenty hours—I don't recollect which—and I have been glad to see that you, Sir, are content not only to receive the salary, and enjoy the patronage and honor of your high office—for high it is—but deign also to perform its duties. This rule, also, I wish to see altered.

I thank the House for their politeness and attention, and I conclude with moving that the Standing Rules and Orders of this House be referred to a Select Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

OLD SEDITION LAW.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he had some time since given notice that he would on this day call up the resolution he had had the honor to submit on the subject of the Alien and Sedition Laws; but in consequence of having learned that the appropriation bills introduced by his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. McDuffie] would be taken up on Wednesday next, not wishing to impede the course of those important bills, he would, for the present, postpone his resolution, but would embrace the earliest opportunity of calling it up after those bills should be disposed of.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose, and said, that it would be recollected by many gentlemen upon this floor, that, at the last session of Congress, when the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road, which provided for the erection of toll gates within the jurisdiction of the States through which it passes, was before the House, the session was so far advanced, that time did not remain to discuss and settle the important principles which it contained. Some days after that bill had been reported, I presented an amendment to it, which I gave notice I intended to offer, when it should come before the House for discussion. This amendment provided for the retrocession of the road to the States through which it passes, upon condition that they should keep it in repair, and exact no more toll upon it than might be necessary for that purpose.

Captured Africans.—Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[H. OF R.]

As the Cumberland Road then required immediate repairs, there was a general understanding throughout the House, that a simple appropriation should pass for that purpose; and that the decision of the question which would have arisen upon the bill, as reported, and upon the amendment which I had proposed, should be postponed until the present session. The same bill for the erection of toll gates under the authority of Congress, which had been reported by the Committee of Roads and Canals, at the last session, has been again reported, at this Session, by the Committee. For the purpose of bringing the whole subject fairly before the House, and of preventing any unnecessary delay, I, therefore, again present the amendment which I intended to offer, at the last session, and move that it may be printed; and I give notice that I shall offer it, when the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road shall come before the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted to the House a paper containing an amendment to the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road; which was ordered to be printed, and will be taken into consideration when that bill comes before the House.

Mr. SMYTH, of Va. gave notice that on Monday next he would call up the resolution he had laid on the table, respecting an amendment of the Constitution.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1828.

THE CAPTURED AFRICANS.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to refer the bill from the Senate to cancel a certain bond therein mentioned, [case of Mr. WILDS] to the same Committee of the Whole House to which was referred a bill of a similar tenor and title, reported to this House by the Committee on the Judiciary. He did this, Mr. T. said, in order that an amendment to the bill proposing an appropriation might be moved in Committee of the Whole, as it could not, by the rules of the House, be moved in the House until it had first been considered in committee.

The motion was opposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, who wished the mover would postpone it until to-morrow, as he had given notice for calling up the bill on that day. The delay occasioned by going into Committee of the Whole, might possibly defeat the very purpose of the bill, by retarding it beyond the time to which the condition of the bond extended.

Mr. TAYLOR insisted on his motion as reasonable. The bill was important, and ought to take the usual routine of business, to which even the smallest interests were subjected. If a bill provided the allowing of 40 dollars in payment for a horse lost on the Western frontier, it must pass through a Committee of the Whole; a bill involving principles so important as this did, ought surely take the same course.

The motion prevailed, and the bill was referred accordingly.

Mr. HALL submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to enquire into the expediency of settling, by law, under what rules and regulations private property (if to be taken at all) shall be taken for public use.

Mr. H., in explanation of the object of his resolution, said, I have risen to present a resolution to the House which has been suggested to me by a debate, some time, nearly a week or ten days, carried on in this House, upon one of the simplest, most plain, and circumscribed questions which I have ever known to engage the attention of any deliberative body, for any length of time. I am still more astonished that the debate should have been so protracted, after hearing from all sides (if my memory serves me rightly) the admission, that the article in contestation was property. After this admission, I conceive, the door was closed against debate, beyond the mere question, whether that which was sanctioned by the Constitution and law, should be done in this case? I am not certain that legislation on this subject is necessary or practicable. I should, however, suppose that it was competent for Congress, by some declaratory act, explicitly to recognize the principle, that what the State laws decide to be property, shall be so recognized by this House, in its legislation in relation to property. It is a question which peculiarly belongs to the States. But, as things now stand, we are placed in this most anomalous situation: Acts expressly recognized by the Constitution, or within its contemplation, may be performed by certain persons, and yet such acts are contrary to law, and the actors, or performers, subject to punishment for them.

Mr. TAYLOR hoped that the gentleman from North Carolina would not press the consideration of the resolution this morning. During the late war, a resolution of nearly the same tenor had been introduced into the House. It had been decided at that time with great unanimity, that impressment was a violation of all right, and could only be excused by the extremest necessity. It was, therefore, not a fit subject for regulation by law. It did not become Congress by a law to provide for the violation of all law, nor to provide for the exercise of rights, if rights they were, when all law is silent.

Mr. HALL, in reply, said, I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether I perfectly understand that clause in the 5th amendment to the Constitution, which declares that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation. It appears to me to mean, that, under certain circumstances, private property may be taken for public use. But, if taken, must be paid for. These are circumstances which must necessarily sometimes occur. They did occur in our last war, in every war we ever had, and, in all probability, they will occur in any future war in which we may be engaged. If this interpretation of the Constitution is correct, then, as I said before, the country is in a strange and anomalous situation. The self same act is allowed by the Constitution, and is nevertheless punishable by law. The resolution proposes a mere enquiry, and is introduced solely with that intention. My past conduct, (having been so long in this House,) I think, furnishes a sufficient pledge, that I have no disposition unnecessarily to consume its time. I hope the resolution will be permitted to go to the committee.

The resolution was then agreed to.

CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The House having again gone into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CORRIËT in the Chair, on the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive, and the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. GURNEY, (to allow the claimant for the time of his slave while engaged in the public service during the attack on New Orleans, and also for the hospital charges after he was wounded)—

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR rose, and said that, as the Committee of the Whole, when this bill was last before them, had been good enough to rise upon his motion, and thereby to afford him an opportunity of expressing his views in relation to the proposed amendment, he could not make a more suitable return than to fulfil the promise which he had at that time made, of occupying their attention for as short a time as possible, and he should, therefore, now compress what remarks he had to make into the smallest compass, which would be consistent with rendering his meaning intelligible. At the outset, said Mr. B., I fully reciprocate the sentiments so well expressed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BUNNELL] who addressed us on the subject, and I assure him and this committee, that it is no part of my purpose, in the slightest degree, to fan any flame of excitement which may have been kindled in the course of this debate; on the contrary, it will be my earnest endeavor to extinguish the last ember which might contribute to feed it. In any remarks which I shall make on this occasion, it shall not be, as it certainly has not hitherto been, my intention to make any appeal whatever to passion or to prejudice, which I consider as the worst possible guides to a right decision in this or in any other tribunal on earth. My appeal shall be made to the sober judgment of the committee, and to that alone. And in presenting it, I ask a candid and impartial investigation. Nor shall I attempt to discuss a question which has been alluded to by, I believe, almost every gentleman who has spoken in this debate, and which has been discussed, in part, by some who have spoken—I mean the question whether slaves are property. I should as soon think of instituting a grave inquiry, whether or no the citizens of the Northern States have a just title to those ships of theirs whose sails whiten the ocean, or whether the inhabitants of the South have a right to that soil which yields them at this time but a slender revenue. It was truly as well as forcibly and beautifully said, that all property is the creature of law. It is so. It is the creature of municipal law. The Constitution of the United States has been referred to by some gentlemen, as bearing on this question. I know of but two provisions in that instrument which refer at all to the subject-matter of the present discussion. The first is that which declares, that, in taking the census of the United States, a certain portion of this species of population shall be included. This it does for a two-fold purpose: first, to fix the relative proportion of representation of the different States in this branch of the Legislature; by which arrangement the Southern States get somewhat of an addition to their numerical representation on this floor; but then, by way of offset or equivalent, for this advantage, the Constitution fixes the same ratio for the direct taxation of those States: so that, while on the one hand they enjoy the benefit derived from an increased representation, by the same provision of the Constitution they labor under the corresponding disadvantage of an increased taxation. The other clause having reference to a slave population, proceeds on the idea that they are property; that the question is settled by the municipal legislation of the States; and it speaks of them as "persons held to service under the laws thereof." Neither of these articles in the Constitution professes to establish the point, that slaves are property. The one looks merely to representation and taxation, and by the other their being property is assumed.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

I shall, therefore, proceed on the principle, as being unquestionable, and substantially unquestioned—as being a concession by all who have engaged in the debate, that slaves are property. Two simple questions will then present themselves on the amendment to this bill. The first is, shall the claimant be compensated at all, and if he shall, then, secondly, to what amount?

Every citizen of this country owes to the Government one common obligation, viz: to contribute his fair and equitable proportion of his property to those public burdens which are constitutionally imposed; he owes this, and he owes no more. On this fundamental principle of society rests the tax-laying power in this Government. The Government levies a contribution upon the citizens in proportion to their respective ability to pay, and the advantages which they derive from it, to enable them to meet its demands. The ordinary operation of raising taxes proceeds upon the principle that each man shall pay his fair proportion toward the general amount, and this is a principle which, as soon as mentioned, challenges the assent of every mind; and yet, all I ask is, that the committee will apply this obvious principle to the present demand. I need not detain the committee with those provisions of the Constitution and the laws, which ensure the observance of this principle, both among the different States and among the People of the same States. The first provision in the Constitution on this subject directs that taxation shall be proportioned according to the census, and no direct tax shall be levied by the Government, unless in the same ratio.

We further find a declaration that the imposts, duties, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States; that no export duty shall be collected, and that no preference shall be given to one port of the United States over another. These provisions, taken collectively, enforce the utmost equality on the subject of contributing to the public burdens among the different States of the Union. In reference to the People of the same State, taxes on consumption are said to act upon the volition of those who pay them, and the presumption is, that, in general, their payment will bear proportion to the ability of those who pay; and, as to direct taxes, the laws provide every precaution to render them as equal as possible. I say, then, that, in the ordinary operation of Government, when it draws to itself the wealth of the People by taxation, the principle with which I set out is open and palpable, and no mind hesitates to assent to it. But the difficulty in the present case arises, because that case is under peculiar circumstances.

Besides the ordinary power of taxation, there is another power, which, for the sake of distinction, I will call an extraordinary one. It arises from the transcendental power of the Government, or what has been denominated by writers, the eminent domain. This they define to be a power in the government of a country, to appropriate the wealth of that country in cases of necessity, and with a view to the public safety. This definition shows at once the origin of the power, and its proper limitation. It must have its source in necessity, and for the object of its exercise the public safety. The power, therefore, is co-extensive with the necessity which gave it birth, and reaches no farther. When that conjunction of circumstances which produced the necessity has passed away, this right which grew out of it falls with it. An attention to the character of this power, will, I think, quiet the apprehensions which have been expressed by some gentlemen during the present debate; but, in saying this, do I mean in the least to admit that Congress may regulate the right and title to slave property? No more than I mean to admit that they may regulate the right to the soil of the several States.

To illustrate my meaning, I will take the liberty of presenting a few examples. Suppose that you had an army which was suffering for the want of food, and that, owing to an accidental position of the ordinary commissariat, (or by whatever other name the subsistence department of an army is distinguished,) provisions are not to be had, may not the commanding officer, under this pressure of immediate necessity, take, wherever he can find it, so much food as is absolutely requisite? Or, suppose your troops, when in some important position, should be destitute of ammunition—the army wants powder and lead—may not the commander take it if a supply is within his reach? Or, suppose again, that your army is in a state of difficulty and embarrassment, in regard to the saving of its baggage, and the bringing off of the wounded; and that, for these purposes, necessity calls for the use of a cart, or wagon, the horses which draw it, and the slave who was their driver—(for I presume the wagon would be of little use without the driver.) Under these circumstances, the act is done: the cart, horses, and driver are impressed for the public use—none can believe that the title to any property is affected beyond the duration of the indispensable necessity of the occasion. So, if it become necessary to occupy a building, or domicile, as a deposit for military stores, the effect of even that would be but temporary. No title to that domicil would be at all affected. No more would the title to a slave. There is none who will say that this temporary use of any of these things, transfers to the Government any farther power over them. Now, when this power is thus exercised, what is the language of justice? It is, that compensation be made to the owner. The case has been aptly compared to that where merchandise is thrown overboard for the safety of a vessel. In the fifth amendment of the Constitution, this principle is acted on, and the power thus to take private property for the public use, is virtually affirmed, by denying its existence under some particular circumstances. What are those circumstances? They are expressed by the words, "without just compensation." To ascertain the meaning, we need not go beyond the terms. "Compensation," in my apprehension, means an equivalent; and the term "just," signifies (among other things) that it be full and complete: "Just compensation" is, therefore, to be understood as a full and complete equivalent for the loss or injury sustained. I ask, if it were declared as between two individuals, one of whom had caused a loss to the other, and the proposition was, to determine what should be "just compensation," whether there is a court or jury on earth that would stop short of measuring the compensation by the measure of the loss? Can it be pretended that some paltry allowance for the use of the cart and driver, is sufficient to satisfy this principle? In answer, let me put a case: Suppose this slave had been impressed, and, before he had been one day in the service, he was wounded, and the wound was such as might disqualify him for subsequent labor, or even destroy him altogether, and his master should then be allowed 50 or 100 cents for his day's labor, how would the question stand? I need only appeal to the culpable principle of ordinary justice. The claimant, through the tax laying power of the Government, has already contributed his share to the public burdens. If you, after this, take this slave, worth, I will suppose, $ 500, and that slave is killed or disabled, and you make him no compensation for the value of the slave, will he not present a singular spectacle in society? He has paid his share, with others, of the common contribution to Government, and, at the same time, under an extraordinary exercise of the power of that Government, he has paid, over and above this, to the full amount of the value of his slave, if killed, or a part of his value if partially disabled. I will put to the committee this proposition: when it is your purpose to make just compensation, do you not mean that the compensation shall be equal to the loss sustained? And if you do not do this, does not the individual lose to the amount of all the excess of what he has contributed beyond his share to the public burdens of the country? And if you do mean to compensate him, must you not enquire into the actual amount of his loss? This principle, if once admitted, leads to the conclusion that the proposed amendment to this bill ought to be adopted. The whole argument may be reduced to one or two syllogisms. The Constitution says that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation—but private property has here been taken for the public use; therefore, just compensation ought to be made. Again: compensation to be just, must be equal to the loss sustained—but the loss sustained has been that provided for in the amendment; therefore that amount ought to be allowed.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[H. or R.]

One or two arguments have been employed by gentlemen on the other side, which I feel myself bound to meet. One of them, which was first brought forward by the member from New York, [Mr. STORRS] and which has since been iterated and reiterated, I confess, surprises me. It is this: If a slave is to be paid for because he has been killed or wounded, why must you not pay on the same principle for an apprentice, or a son? To me it is wonderful that a gentleman of the acuteness of mind which all allow to that gentleman, did not at once see that there is a conclusive answer to this argument. A son and an apprentice are citizens of the State—they are members of the political community; and, in that character, they owe, in their own persons, a share of service to the public. This obligation is paramount to any subordinate individual contract. The contract between master and apprentice, and the power of the father over the son, are subordinate to the public duty which they both owe to the country. If an apprentice, who has entered into a contract with a master, shall subsequently enter into another contract with another master, before the first has expired, may not he with whom the first contract was made, insist on its execution, and set aside the second? Though the corpus of a slave be a person, yet he is nevertheless property; and on this great principle I found my argument. The parallel attempted to be established is wholly untenable. The slave, as an item of property, is not a member of the body politic; he owes no service on his own account to the Government. The Government knows him only as the property of his master, and it can get at him only in two ways—the one is by the ordinary process of taxation, and the other is by the extraordinary exertion of power, under a pressing public emergency. In that case, compensation must be made—it must be just—and to be just, it must be equivalent. This is an answer to the argument drawn from the analogy of a minor or apprentice.

Another argument was advanced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STORRS] which also calls for notice. That gentleman labored to prove that the Government, in no circumstances whatever, may take a slave for the public military service.

I have already endeavored to shew that slaves can, in no case, be considered or treated as militia—as troops. That is out of the question. Such a proposition cannot even be received for discussion. There is no man who can doubt that the People only are fit to compose the army. But a slave, considered as property, may rightfully be taken for the Government service, when extreme necessity requires. But, placing the question on the gentleman's own ground, and admitting, for argument's sake, that the Government acted wrongfully in taking this slave, I ask this committee if they are prepared for the conclusion that the sufferer is entitled to no compensation, because, in inflicting the loss, the Government did wrong? Is the Government not to pay, because it acted wrongfully, when it would be bound to pay, even if it had acted rightfully, in taking this slave? If you once maintain that the Government acted wrongfully in this matter, you must then compare the case to that of two individuals, one of whom has wrongfully injured the property of the other. Is not the wrong doer bound to make compensation to the full extent of the injury? The argument of the gentleman comes to this: that Government is not responsible, because it has done wrong. Now, I say, with all deference for the acknowledged talents of that gentleman, if ever there were a non-sequitur this is one. The case is not at all altered because the act was done by an officer of the Government: for, besides the argument that the act itself was right—supposing it to have been wrong, I appeal again to the gentleman himself, whether, if one party commit on another a tort or trespass by his agent, the principal is not responsible for all consequences?

[Here Mr. STORRS replied, I agree with the honorable gentleman that, when the act of the agent is within the lawful line of his agency, the principal is responsible.]

Mr. BARBOUR resumed. I put it to the gentleman whether, if one trespass by order of another, the latter is not responsible. But there is no need to discuss the question in that view of it. Where the case of extreme necessity exists, the extraordinary power of the Government may be exercised. The officers for the time being, are only its agents, and the responsibility devolves on their principal. I do not, indeed, wish to carry this principle to an extraordinary and unreasonable length. If the officer, wantonly or unnecessarily, invade the property of the citizen, he is a trespasser. But then this must be shewn, and, in the present case, not so much as a doubt has been suggested of the existence of such a case of necessity. If the necessity exist, then that case has arrived, in which the Government may take private property for the public defence. The Government did this. They did it through their officer, and the result has been a loss to this claimant of so much value as that for which he asks us to indemnify him. If we do so, we must restore him to an equality, as to his contribution to the public service, with others—his fellow-citizens. If he had but this one slave, and lost this, then he would have contributed more to the requirements of government, for the public defence, in proportion to his ability, by perhaps ten or twenty times, than his neighbors had done. This surely ought not to be. I conclude, therefore, that we ought to make him compensation, and that the compensation ought to be equal to his loss. And shall, therefore, vote for the amendment.

H. or R.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[JAN. 15, 1828.]

Mr. ARCHER said, he had not risen with any view of entering into the present argument, nor, to any extent, into that of the real question from which the debate had wandered. I have, said Mr. A. a higher purpose. I thought, when the amendment was offered, that the debate ought not to have been raised; but as it has proceeded thus far, it ought not, I think, now to be repressed. Some remarks appeared demanded of gentlemen from the South, by various considerations. We owe it to ourselves to shew, that, when what we consider as our most vital interest has been brought into discussion, we have not been more remiss in our duty to our constituents than others. We owe it to Northern gentlemen to respond to the liberality they have evinced. We owe it to the public, and the Southern public in particular, to shew how that question has arisen, in the devious course of this debate. The mention of the word slavery in this House (as evinced by this debate,) is calculated to waken a high degree of sensibility in the quarters in which it prevails. This was no subject of reproach. We know it to be the most delicate of all interests—we feel that it is a nerve that cannot be struck without communicating the shock to every function of our social system. The Constitution gives us the exclusive right of judging, in all questions affecting this interest, and we well know that any foreign interference can but aggravate the evil, whatever it may be. We fear that interference—and why? There is a belief (whether well or ill-founded, makes no difference as to the effects) in all the slave-holding States, that a fanatical spirit exists in many of the non-slave-holding States, which would interfere, and interfere fatally, in this matter. No matter whether this apprehension be just or not, its influence on Southern feelings is a fact not to be disputed—and it has produced, and produced justly, in the South, a sensibility, amounting, it might be, to ferocity, on this point. And here he would take occasion to say, of the People of the slave-holding States, that they were as loyal as the subjects of the Kings to the authority which they recognize, and to which they assented by the Constitution—they are restive under all other authority—and he hoped they ever would be so.

The subject of this amendment has gone abroad to the country, as in itself a subject of excitement. At a distance, people do not make nice distinctions—and it will be so considered. Now I think it ought not have such a character, and regard it as an act of justice and utility to place it in its true character. There is no excitement here which can be justified, and I shall be discharging a very gratifying duty if I can succeed in impressing that opinion on this Committee, and on the Country. Sir, is there any man here who has attempted to maintain that slaves are not property? There is not one. All the gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, have expressly disclaimed such a position. How, indeed, can any man maintain it? If any one would attempt to maintain such a position to me, and I considered him worthy of being treated with the decency of a reply, my only answer to him would be—"Look at the fact. Who contributed to form this Constitution? Those who at that moment held slaves—they held them under it when it was formed, and they continue to hold them now as they did then." If any man doubted that slaves were property, in the contemplation of the Constitution, he was a fool. If he denied this, not doubting it, he was a knave. I believe there is no such man here. There may be an inconsiderable class who affect to believe so, that they may make this subject a handle to produce excitement: Their purpose was for their own selfish ends—to disturb the harmony of the Union. But I owe it to the non-slave-holding States to declare, that, as far as I have been able to obtain information on the subject, this class is as much despised there, by all the most respectable classes, as they can be among us. Sir, the proposition that slaves are not property, has not been maintained, as I consider, in this debate. It is the supposition that it has been advanced by implication, that has excited the warmth that has appeared. I certainly did not so understand the report of the Committee of Claims. They did not say so. They say, only, that this kind of property has not been put upon such a footing by the usage of this Government, as that, if lost or injured, it is to be paid for from the Treasury. Does this amount to a denial that slaves are property? The Committee say that this kind of property is subject to a certain usage. Does this deny the existence or validity of the property? If that were established, then all property whatever must be annulled: for all kinds of property whatever, are the subjects of peculiar regulation in some form or other. The committee and gentlemen, in debate, have, in effect, maintained, not that we have no property in our slaves, but that this is a kind of property so peculiar, as that it stands distinguished from all other property in this important respect—that the Government may, in no case whatever, lay hand upon it by impressment. Sir, instead of complaining, we ought to be much obliged to Northern gentlemen—their doctrine I hold indeed to be wrong—but we owe them every obligation, and every acknowledgment, and I tender to them my thanks for the liberal ground they have taken. What they contend for is, that this is a higher species of property than any other; that the sweeping power of the Government must here stay its hand; it cannot even touch it. I consider it just, therefore, to give the true character to this debate: to let the Southern States know that there appears no design to call in question the title or jurisdiction of their property. The committee have not questioned it; none but fools could deny—none but knaves will impeach it. The doctrine maintained, is no leaven to sour the daily and necessary bread of our harmony. Its propagation is no sowing of the dragon's teeth, to spring up in civil discord and conflict. It is a liberal doctrine, though not a sound one.

If it were true, that there exists no power in the Government, at any time, or under any circumstances, to impress slaves, then it is also true, as contended, that the officer who took the slave in question committed an irregular act, is liable to an action for trespass, and the Government is not bound to pay for what he did, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORAS] has inferred. But, the transcendental right of the Government over all property whatever, has never been contested. If an extreme exigency occurs, all the property, and all the Pec-ple of the country may be taken and employed for the public defence. But, the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] maintains, that, in regard to slave property, this power is limited, and must be so, on account of the danger which would follow from it. If slaves are to be taken for soldiers in the Southern States, and the apprentice and the minor may be taken in the Northern; if the son may be torn from his father's hopes, and from his mother's anguish, then, says the gentleman, there is an end at once to every thing like freedom. But, this danger has no ground, either in fact or in construction. Not in fact: for, when soldiers may be legally demanded of us, we will always be ready in the South to furnish better than our slaves—ourselves. If the time should ever come, when South or North, Government or People, shall tolerate the idea of filling their ranks with slaves; all questions of legal power will be speedily at an end. We shall all be slaves together, to the first master who will assert his authority. The doctrine is equally unsound, as a doctrine of construction; because you may take slaves as property for the public use, it does not follow that you may use them as soldiers. You may impress property, men, too, by draft, according to the measure of public exigency. But neither, without abuse, can be employed, except in a function and manner adapted and referable to its proper character. May you employ a drafted man as a mere beast of burthen? No! You can as little employ a mere article of property, a slave, in the proper function and capacity of a citizen. You may not employ any object which you take for a use which disagrees with the character in which it is taken. You may take citizens, you may take property; but citizens must be put to the employment of citizens, and property to the uses of property. You cannot enlist, though you may impress a slave. Why not? Because enlistment is a contract, and imports a free agent. The distinction as to the case of an apprentice, which has been spoken of, is, that he labors only under a temporary disability to make this contract. The disability is not inherent and incurable—law may remove it, and then he becomes a citizen capable of making this contract. Not so with the slave. His is an incapacity, as distinguished from a disability: that is to say, is permanent. It is inherent in him as a slave, and no law can remove it until he ceases to be a slave. The idea that slaves are to be distinguished in any manner from other property, grows out of a misapprehension of the character in which slaves are regarded by the Constitution. The framers of this instrument evinced a studious desire to avoid introducing the name. Whenever allusion became necessary, periphrasis has been resorted to. But no point of the Constitution, in its true intent, sustains the idea of their being regarded in a light different from property. When it speaks of them as persons, reference is intended to their condition as human beings, and not to the artificial legal acceptance of that term, as importing something different from things as the ordinary subjects of property. In relation to the clause in which restraint on the importation of "certain persons" is intended for a term, this is the uncontested import. By persons, are intended those who were to be introduced as slaves only, and on whose importation a duty might be imposed, as is ordinarily done on property. Human persons are meant, but not legal persons. Legal persons have rights, duties, and obligations. These attributes are of the essence of a legal person. Can a slave ever have these? Certainly not. The constitutional regulation in respect to the census, has been adverted to by some gentlemen, by which three-fifths of the slave population are to be added to the number of free persons in the slave-holding States. Does the Constitution by that provision recognize slaves as persons in the legal acceptance? I say that it does not, and that the consideration of the true purpose of that article disproves such an idea. Under the old Confederation there was no ratio of representation. Each State was entitled to one vote. By the Constitution, both the rule of representation and the rule of taxation were altered. Under the Confederation, the rule of taxation was derived from real property only. But the value of real property will always be relatively greater, amid the denser and more active population of countries, without slaves as compared with those which have them.

This was the case in the Northern States, and made a change of the rule desirable. With them there could be no objection to the adoption of a rule from population. The same rule, applied to the South, would extend only to our free population—the component elements of our political society. There could be no right to look to any other except in the character of property. Here, then, the rule would become unequal, and another must be resorted to. Writers differ whether the ratio of representation should be drawn from taxation or population. The framers of the Constitution adopted population as the general standard, but when they came to the Southern States they found that justice required them to adopt a mixed rule, founded partly on population and partly on property, and it was for this reason, and not because slaves were regarded as legal persons, that three-fifths of the number of slaves was allowed to be taken into account for the purpose of representation, to be added to the number of the free inhabitants. What is the proof? If population solely had been made the rule, what would have been the result? Surely they must have gone the whole length of the principle, and all the slave population must have been included. There was no conceivable reason why three-fifths only should be admitted, if representation was to be founded on population merely. The regulation would have been absurd, as well as unjust, but the authors of the Constitution allowed to the slave holding States all their population, and added to this three-fifths of the amount of certain description of their property. I hold, therefore, that the peculiar immunity which has been contended for in favor of our slave property is not countenanced by any just construction of the Constitution.

Another topic has been urged—the usage of this Government. On this I have only one word to say. It has, I think, been clearly shewn, that the gentleman from the Committee of Claims, who introduced the report, [Mr. WRIGHT], was mistaken in point of fact, when he endeavored to prove that there were precedents, shewing it had not been the usage of this Government to pay for slaves, when impressed into the public service. All the cases which he cited as precedents, were inapplicable, because no impressment took place, with the exception of one, and even in that case the damage was not direct, but only consequential, which makes it no fair precedent. But, agreeing that such has been the usage, the Constitution declares that compensation shall be made for property, without any exception, when taken for public use; and if, in relation to this species of property, the usage has been otherwise, the maxim applies, malus usus abolendus esse, and there is an end.

Some of my Southern friends, for whom I cherish a high personal regard, [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. DRAYTON] have been hurried in advance on this subject—a position in which they will always be found, in the discharge of the trust reposed in them. They have said, truly, that, if the question of slave property were made here, it ought not to be debated by Southern men. But, neither is there occasion to allude to it with sensibility, when the question is not made, but disclaimed.

My chief purpose in addressing the Committee, has been, to show that there is no necessity whatever for the least excitement in discussing the amendment. I have enjoyed ample opportunities, from service here and other sources of information, in regard to the North especially, to know the sentiments prevailing there, on this subject. I render no more than justice in saying that, in no respectable quarter, have I ever discovered any disposition to raise a question as to the validity of slave property, or as to our right of undisputed and exclusive control over the subject. Nor are they unaware of the mischief which would result to themselves, no less than us, from any interference with this control. Should the efforts of a desperate and frantic fanaticism ever be so far successful as to produce this interference, the disastrous consequences will not be confined to the Southern States. An atrocious banditti would infest our swamps and fastnesses, but so would a Lazaroni, scarcely less pernicious, their streets. The evil would pour into the free States in a torrent. All that industry which now supplies consumption and material to the enterprise of the North, will be paralyzed at once, and the blow which was directed at us, will quickly be found to have recoiled on those who gave it. The Southern States cannot, indeed, claim to be the arms—the strength of the Union—but they may, to be its breasts; and Northern gentlemen in general, and Yankee gentlemen in particular, know their own interest far too well, ever to desire either to cut off, or to dry up, this fountain of their prosperity.

A word in conclusion, only, on the real question—the claim involved in the discussion. It is not contested that the injury alleged has been sustained, and by regular impressment, on the part of a public officer. The right to compensation stands then equally irrefragable on the letter of the Constitution, and the higher and more authoritative constitution of justice.

Mr. MITCHELL, of S. C. said, that, when he addressed the Committee the other day, from an observation dropped by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. OWEN] he was led to believe, that the impressment of the slave by the Government had not been ascertained, and he then considered, as he now considers, that this was the important fact on which the decision of the House must ultimately turn. But all his doubts on this point had been cleared up by examining the report of the committee. The case there was fairly made out. It was admitted that the slave of D'Auterive had been impressed—that he was wounded—that the owner incurred the expense of employing a surgeon—and that, by the consequences of the wound, the slave had been depreciated in value to the amount specified in the amendment. With these facts in possession of the House, Mr. M. said, he was not only surprised at the length of the debate, but at the excitement manifested on both sides. For his part he considered it a mere legal question, to be decided by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and by the decisions and practice of the Supreme Court, and in itself neither exciting nor deserving either collision of feeling or intemperance of language. In this view he considered the case, and so he should endeavor to argue it. The 5th amendment of the Constitution is in these words. "Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." Mr. M. said that this clause did not confer any new right on the citizen, but was merely declaratory of a pre-existing right, which would have been possessed if the amendment had never been enacted. He held that our right of property was inherent and absolute, and alienable only with our own consent. If our right of property was not inherent and unalienable, why did the People of the States think it necessary to give to Congress, by express grant, the power of taxation, and to limit and restrain the exercise of that power? For what is the power of taxation, but the power of disposing the property of the citizen to the public use? Who would think it necessary to give another a title to a small part of a fund, when he possessed a full right to the whole? It is clear, that, under this Government, the right of property is inherent—as sacred from the invasions of Government as from those of individuals. Our only inquiry then is whether a slave is private property? And can this be doubted for a moment: what right, what power, what dominion has an Eastern man over any personal chattel, which a Southern man has not over his slave? Why, sir, he can sell his slave—he can hire him—give him, and bequeath him. The slave is liable to be seized and sold for his debts; if a ruffian attempts feloniously to take possession of him, the owner can, with his rifle, defend him as his property; and if a citizen should tortiously get possession of him, the owner can recover him by an action of detinue, or trover, to maintain either of which actions, two things are necessary—first, that the object claimed should be a personal chattel, and next, that the party claiming should have a property in it. Gentlemen may admit that this is the law of South Carolina, or Louisiana, but deny that it is the law of the United States. This, Mr. M. said, he would endeavor to establish. By the 34th section of the judiciary act, it is enacted that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be "regarded as the rules of decision at common law in the Courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." Now, what is this, but adopting, as the laws of the United States, all the constitutional laws of the several States? Are they not, by this section, incorporated into, and made a part of the jurisprudence of the Union? South Carolina, by a similar enactment, has made of force as much of the common law of England, as is consistent with her Constitution. Now, is not that common law of England made, by that enactment, as much a part of the code of South Carolina as her legislative statutes? None can doubt this. The laws of the States, adopted by the Federal Courts, are as much, then, the laws of the United States, as the act of Congress. In which light, then, have the Courts of the United States considered our slaves? Precisely as those of South Carolina—as mere personal chattels—as, legally, nothing more than goods, wares, and merchandise, and liable to all the rules which govern the possession and alienation of inanimate chattels. To prove this, Mr. M. said, he would refer the committee to the case of Williamson and Daniel, reported in the 12th of Wheaton, 568, originating in the Circuit Court of Georgia, but finally decided in the Supreme Court. The substance of it is as follows: A testator left by will sundry slaves to A and B, with a provision, if either should die without lawful heirs of his body, the survivor should heir his estate. The following was the decree of the Court, pronounced by Chief Justice Marshall: "We think these words convert the absolute estate previously given, into an estate tail: and if so, since slaves are personal property, the limitation over is too remote." It is an old maxim of the common law, that an estate tail cannot be created in a personal chattel: for, if it be, the previous estate becomes absolute in the first taker. This rule applies to all property of a moveable nature—to money—goods, wares, and merchandise—to domestic animals, &c. Do not the above circumstances, from first to last, prove, that the Supreme Court views the slave precisely in the same light as the State Courts—that it considers the slave no more than a personal chattel, in which an absolute property may vest, and liable to all the rules which attach to chattels of that description? Again, Mr. M. said, he would refer the Committee to the case of Shelby vs. Grey, reported in the 11th Wheaton, 361. This was carried from the Circuit Court of Tennessee, to the Supreme Court, at Washington. It is only necessary to my purpose, to give the preliminary statement of Judge Johnston, who pronounced the decree of the Court. "The plaintiffs here, were defendants below, in an action of detinue, brought by Thomas Grey, to recover sundry slaves. The defendants pled non detinet, and the act of limitations of the State of Tennessee, which bars the actions of detinue, is three years." Can any one say that slaves are not viewed, by the Courts of the United States, as private property—as nothing but personal chattels, by these two cases? In the first, they are disposed of by will, liable to become the property of the first owner, when the limitation over is after an indefinite failure of issue; and, in the second case, they are recoverable by action of detinue, and become the absolute property of the holder after a tortious possession of three years. By way of illustration, Mr. M. said, he would state a case, and apply the foregoing rules. Suppose the unfortunate D'Auterive had been indebted to the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. WHITLSEY] in the sum of $600; and he either would not, or could not pay. What course would the honorable gentleman most likely take? Why, as a citizen of Ohio, he would commence an action against him in the Federal Court of Louisiana, and, as the debtor would have no defence, judgment would be obtained, and execution follow of course. This execution would be a writ of feri facias, tested in the name of the President of the United States—sealed with the seal of the Clerk of the United States Court—lodged with the Marshal, the Executive officer of the same tribunal—directing him to levy on the lands, tenements, hereditaments, and goods and chattels of D'Auterive; and, under this authority, the Marshal would seize negro, horse, and cart, and, after having advertised them the legal time, knock them off to the highest bidder at the same moment, and pay over the proceeds of the sale to the honorable gentleman. Now mark, sir, this is a proceeding entirely of a United States' Court—created by the Constitution—regulated by the laws of Congress—and in which, the sovereignty of Louisiana would have no more concern than in a procedure of the Court of King's Bench, or Guildhall, in London. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK] told us that a slave was an amphibious, anomalous creature, in the eyes of the Constitution: but if I am right, our highest judicial authority (the Supreme Court) decides that a slave is neither amphibious, nor anomalous, but a legitimate chattel, and nothing but a chattel. So much for the decisions of the United States' Courts on this subject.

But let us now consider the light in which slaves have been viewed by Congress; and for this, Mr. M. said, he would advert to the act of 1813, imposing a direct tax: and it is not unimportant to recollect that this act was ratified by James Madison. No man was better acquainted with all the provisions of the Constitution, their relations and dependencies, than this illustrious statesman. The hallowed charter of our rights may be almost called the fruit of his creation; and if the memory of Washington is enshrined in our adoration for having obtained the independence of the States, and created them an empire—the imperishable monument of his disinterested patriotism—let us not forget the milder glory of him, whose pith and prime were spent in establishing that Constitution, which dispenses liberty without licentiousness, and restraint without oppression—and where the mind, free to think, to speak, and to act, develops all its powers, and enjoys a happiness no where else attainable. The 5th section of that act reads as follows: "That, whenever a direct tax shall be laid by the authority of the United States, the same shall be assessed and laid on the value of all lands, lots of ground with improvements, dwelling houses and slaves, which several articles subject to taxation, shall be enumerated and valued by the respective assessors at the rate each of them is worth in money." Could Congress have employed words more emphatic—more minutely descriptive—to signify that a slave was private property, than are contained in the above paragraph? Is there any distinction made in it between lands and slaves? Each is liable to be taxed—the tax is to be assessed on the value of each—and that value to be estimated by the worth of each in money.

Again. Let us advert, said Mr. M. to the 24th section of the same act, and this idea is still more strongly expressed—is painted in still more glaring colors: "That, where any tax, as aforesaid, shall have remained unpaid for the term of one year, as aforesaid, the Collector in the State where the property lies, and who shall have been designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as aforesaid, having first advertised the same for sixty days in at least one newspaper in the State, shall proceed to sell at public sale, so much of said property as may be necessary to satisfy the tax due thereon, together with an addition of 20 per cent thereon. If the property advertised for sale cannot be sold for the amount due thereon, with the aforesaid additions, the Collector shall purchase the same, in behalf of the United States, for the amount aforesaid." Now, here Congress not only expressly admits that a slave is property, but directs the Collector to purchase the slave in their behalf, if he is not bid up to the value of the tax, and thereby becomes a slave-holder. Yes, sir! The Congress of the United States acknowledges, in the plainest and strongest language, that it will not only tax slaves as other property, but that it will sell and buy them. Can any one say, after this, that the Legislature, the Judiciary, or the Executive of the United States, do not consider slaves as private property!! And if, in the act of 1818, Congress says a horse, a boat, a cart, comes within the meaning of the words of private property, in the 5th amendment, and is to be paid for, by what ingenuity, under what construction, can they exclude slaves? These authorities, said Mr. M. prove incontestably, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] ought to be adopted, and made part of the bill.

Before I conclude, said Mr. M. I must reply to some of the positions of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITLSEY.] He asserts that slaves cannot be impressed. And why, I would ask? It can be for no other reason than because slaves are private property. It cannot be because they are persons: for all persons are liable to be impressed, under particular circumstances. The liability to be impressed does not arise from the possession of civil and political rights. Aliens, who have neither, unless they are gratuitously given by the Government, are liable to be impressed. Under the Law of Nations, for the temporary protection which they enjoy, they owed temporary allegiance. The gentleman, therefore, admits, what he set out with denying, that slaves are, to the fullest extent, private property, and not persons, and admits them also to be private property of a more sacred nature than we are disposed to acknowledge, because we hold, and have ever held, that their services were at the call of the Government, when necessary. I agree fully with the doctrine of my honorable colleague, [Mr. HAMILTON,] that any and every thing may be impressed, when the exigencies of the Government requires it. The salus populi creates a supreme necessity—paramount to the Constitution—paramount to the law—to which life, liberty, property, every thing which is most cherished, most estimated, must yield. To preserve the sovereignty of the States, to secure the freedom of the People, a commanding General might put a torch to our beautiful city of Philadelphia, and make it in the language of the most illustrious and most unfortunate man of the age, "an ocean of flame." But this he does at his peril—he assumes a vast, a tremendous responsibility. In so doing, he stakes his life on the event, and either lives his country's saviour, or dies its martyr. But even this necessity, great as it is, will not, when peace is restored, suspend the operation of the 5th amendment of the Constitution. Government may not be able, under such a crisis, to make compensation, but it will owe it.

Again, said Mr. MITCHELL, the gentleman relies on the act of 1818, authorizing payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, &c. And because slaves are not included among the enumerated articles, he concludes that we are not bound to pay for them. But can this, or any act, restrain the Constitution? When that instrument employs the words "private property"—the most universal phrase which can be used, embracing every thing which is subject to the dominion of man—can we, by an act, confine our relief to a few selected articles? Surely not. But, if that gentleman had extended his researches, he would have found that Congress had put a different construction on the act; that it had felt itself bound to pay for the loss of every sort of property, when that loss was sustained under proper circumstances, and manifested by proper evidence. And here I beg leave to refer the Committee to the act passed on the second of March, 1821, for the relief of Rosalia P. Deslonde. Here the sum of $2,227 was appropriated, according to that act, "in full for damage done to her house and plantation, by the troops of the United States, at the invasion of New Orleans by the British." In the report of the Committee of Claims, we have the items, with the value of each, which make up the amount appropriated. They are as follows:

H. OF R.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

"28 arpens of four and five rail fence, destroyed or burned.	$343 00
200 feet of close garden fence,	254 00
5 negro houses,	400 00
1 kitchen frame, on sills, weather-boarded, shingle roof, two rooms, and a double chimney,	400 00
1 coach-house, two rooms,	120 00
Damages done to the mansion-house,	500 00
1 large gate,	60 00
An out house damaged,	150 00
	$2,227 00

It will be seen that the compensation granted in this act was for the loss and destruction of articles not enumerated in that of 1818, and under circumstances the reverse of those required by it to justify relief. In the act of 1818, the building must have been destroyed by the enemy; here it was destroyed by our own troops.

Again: In the act for the relief of Pierre Dennis de la Ronde, compensation is allowed for the destruction, by our troops, of sugar-cane growing in the field. Again, in an act passed on the 27th March, 1816, for the relief of the executors of John Ross, compensation is allowed for the occupation of their lands by our troops, and the loss of the rent of a farm attached thereto. Again, in an act passed on the 3d of March, 1817, compensation is allowed Peter Kendall, for merchandise captured by the British forces in the late war, in consequence of having his team and wagon impressed by order of General Brown. Now, all these cases form exceptions to the act of 1818, not only in regard to the articles, but to the circumstances under which they were lost or destroyed. These prove that Congress did not intend that the act of 1818 should form the boundary of relief: on the contrary, that it will consider the special circumstances of each case, and grant compensation according to the great principles of equity and expediency.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ICHAM] has, however, advanced a new doctrine, with which he appears to be much delighted. He says, that the owner of property impressed can only demand compensation for its use or service; that, if it be lost or destroyed by any of the dangers incident to the situation or employment in which it is placed, that the Government is not liable. If you impress a horse for the use of the cavalry, and he be killed in battle; if you impress a slave to throw up a breast-work, and he lose an arm or a leg, by the sabre of the enemy; if you occupy a house, and it be burnt by the carelessness of the troops, or by the hot shot of the enemy; or if it be destroyed for your own safety—as these are all circumstances which are incident, and may be reasonably expected to happen—the property is not to be paid for. But this is answered by referring to the act just quoted. Congress have, in every instance, paid the full value of the property, and not the value of its use.

Mr. M. said, he would now conclude, with one or two observations. Many of my Southern brethren shrink with horror from any approach by this House to the subject of slavery. He confessed that he felt no such sentiment. He considered slavery as much a part of the Constitution, as the great right of representation: for, though the word slave is not used in that instrument, the condition is admitted—it is clothed with rights, and protected; and the laws of Congress, and the decisions of the Supreme Court, are practical and living illustrations of its being an integral part of our system of Government. Now, when we approached the Speaker's Chair, and swore that we would support the Constitution—all of us, North and South of the Chesapeake—East and West of the Alleghany—bound ourselves to respect and protect the rights growing out of this institution, by a tie as strong as to respect and protect the personal liberty of the Freeman. Nor, sir, have I the least apprehension that the rights of the South, in this respect, will be disturbed. I care not for the affected philanthropy of certain politicians in this House, nor for the ravings of religious enthusiasts out of it—the first are influenced by a cold, selfish, and heartless ambition—an ambition, which, for the sake of self-promotion, would involve millions in the horrors of civil war; and the last are evidently labouring under the severest of all calamities—the delusions of a perverted understanding. My confidence for the security of these, and of all other constitutional rights, is in the good sense of the People of the States—is in their intuitive knowledge of their own true interests—is in their devotion to the Constitution—is in their strong conviction, that the countless blessings, moral, civil, and political, which they enjoy, are derived in a pre-eminent degree from the Union of the States.

One observation more, sir. From my describing the slave as a personal chattel, I do not mean to deny him the feelings and reason of a human being. He is entitled to all our sympathies, and in the South he enjoys them all. There is no relation, except that of blood, productive of warmer, more animated, or more lasting affection, than that of master and slave; nor is there any laboring poor on the face of the earth, who work less, or enjoy more of the comforts of life, than the slaves of the South.

Mr. STORRS said, that he had not intended to have said another word in this debate. He did not now mean to enter upon the particular merits of the claim. On a former day he had so fully stated the reasons for the final vote which he should give on this particular amendment, that it was useless to go over that ground again, and he would not now have thrown himself again on the indulgence of the committee, if he had not heard some principles advanced, in the course of the discussion, in view of which, the amount of compensation claimed by the petitioner sunk into utter insignificance, and was not worth a moment's reflection. If I thought, said Mr. S., that they could be sustained by the laws and constitutions of the country, I would not sit here for a moment, and represent a People whose rights would be no longer worth the protection or defence of any man. I said, sir, the other day, that, in every case in which we had indemnified officers of the army for the impressment of private property, we had indemnified them in their character of trespassers. I have voted for several acts of that kind, but we have never acknowledged the legality of any seizures of that sort, and I have always considered them as violations of the personal rights of our citizens. I meant to assert this doctrine in its broadest sense, and if it cannot be sustained here to the most unqualified extent, then I have learned nothing from books, and have profited nothing from the history of other countries or my own. I could now have felt that I had done my duty here, if I had not risen to re-assert it. There can be nothing in the Constitution that sanctions, by the remotest implication, the pernicious doctrine that, in time of war, the officers of the army can exercise any power over the property of our citizens, that is denied to them in time of peace. The change of our amicable relations with a foreign power, does not work such a distraction of civil government among us, or destroy any of the securities of our civil liberties at home. It is true that the Constitution declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation. But so far does this clause fall short of any implication that would sanction such a principle, that it directly asserts the very doctrine that condemns it. It was placed there to repel the assumption of such an extravagant and despotic claim on the part of this Government, in any case. The same clause is found in many of the State Constitutions; and if I have any knowledge of the uniform course of decision in the courts, private property cannot be touched, even by the Government itself, until the compensation is actually made, or provided for. I will not even speak of the officers of Government. I say the Government itself: for the clause has no reference whatever to any subordinate agents of Government, acting on their individual discretion. The Legislature of a State, which finds this clause in its Constitution, cannot authorize the agents of a Turnpike Company, or the servants of the pettiest corporation, for any purpose of public utility, to place their foot on the land of any man, before his damages have been ascertained and paid. It would be a fearful clause indeed, if it had been placed there to sanction, by implication, a doctrine that might shelter an officer of the army from the retribution of the law for the seizure of private property. It neither legalizes it by implication, nor even acknowledges it as the act of the Government. Nor is there, in my judgment, any analogy between the appropriation of private property for public use, under this clause of the Constitution, and the exercise of the general power of taxation. The process cannot be assimilated to that of taxation in any just sense, nor is property so taken appropriated at all, by way of assessment, in the nature of a tax for the public use. The compensation is strictly of the nature of an equivalent for its value, and the only operation of such a power, even when lawfully exerted, against the will of the owner, is to fulfil the most obvious dictate of natural justice. I do not think an instance can be found, where the Government itself, in the exercise of the high and transcendental power which pertains to it, has taken the lands of any man, even for fortifications, without his consent, or ventured to dispossess him of his freehold before his damages have been assessed and provided for. But to whom does this clause relate in any case? "Private property shall not be taken." By whom? By the officers of the army, or any other mere agent of the Government, acting at his own will and on his own judgment or pleasure? No, sir—by the Government itself. I am yet to learn that a Commanding General, or any other officer, can exercise any of the powers of this Government, in time of war, or at any other time, except over the army. I am not about to say that, in a case of extreme and uncontrollable necessity, when the safety of an army, or the security of a post requires such an act to be done, a commanding officer may not be morally excusable by his Government for the impressment of private property, on a sudden emergency, nor that, if he acted with discretion,
